"The play is about learning how to respect relationships," said Penny Annedeus Cullers, cast member and director of the play and a co-coordinator of Graphic Art Theater. More directly, the play focuses on a woman's relationship to herself and to society, she said.

Completing the cast of "Calm Down Mother" is Shirlyn Henry Brown, a graduate student in theater, and Valerie Marsh, also a graduate student in theater. Brown is a co-coordinator of Graphic Art Theater.

The three women portray a variety of characters throughout the one-act play. They characterize everything from elderly women battling the isolation of a nursing home to prostitutes proclaiming they have discovered their inner selves. The characters come to realize that they own themselves and are in control of their lives, said Cullers.

"It is a tribute to women and their search for themselves," Brown said.

The play presents its message in a different way than what the troupe is used to.

"This work is very metaphorical rather than realistic like our first play," said Cullers. "It may be a little strange, but it does make people think."

"Calm Down Mother" is the second complete play the troupe has performed.

"Mostly we perform monologues that are either written in verse form or are excerpts from plays," said Cullers. Last semester the troupe traveled to Dallas to perform monologues at a violence prevention conference.

Graphic Art Theater has been in existence for one year and brings together volunteers, graduate and undergraduate students and alumni, to present performances that address the violence of contemporary society.

"The Graphic Art Theater was created to educate and enlighten the campus community about sexual violence," said Judy Davis, founder of the theater program and director of the Women's Resource Center.

Art is remarkably persuasive, making the performances an excellent means to communicate a message, said Davis.

"Audiences are moved by the work they do," she said. "They touch us in our hearts and inspire us to change."

PROPERTY TAXES

Exemptions key to Finney's proposals

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Gov. Joan Finney on Wednesday tossed two new proposals to legislators hungry for alternatives to her property tax relief plan.

Both new plans concern the heart of her relief package, eliminating exemptions to the state sales tax to raise money for property tax relief.

Finney even said she prefers the new ideas to the original plan she outlined in her State of the State address Tuesday. Some legislators expressed skepticism about the new proposals.

Under one, the state would impose a 1-percent tax on 32 items that are now exempt from the 4.25-percent sales tax. Under the second, the state would eliminate the 32 exemptions, then lower the sales tax rate to 3.5 percent.

Finney had proposed raising $105 million by eliminating some of the 32 exemptions and keeping others. She wants to raise a total of $217 million and compensate school districts that would be forced to cut property taxes.

The governor and Revenue Secretary Mark Beshears met with 21 of the House Taxation Committee's 23 members in Finney's Statehouse office.

"We've got to lower property taxes, and we've got to do it now," Finney told the legislators.

The committee's chairwoman, Rep. Joan Wagnon, D-Topeka, said the meeting indicates Finney could be more involved in the tax debate this year. Last year, many legislators criticized the governor as too distant.

"If the governor wants to put all of the muscle and all of the clout that goes with that office behind this proposal, she can get it through," Wagnon said.

THROCKMORTON HALL

Topeka firm chosen to finish expansion

JOE VADER
Collegian

Ferrell Construction Co. of Topeka was chosen Thursday as the general contractor to complete the Phase II expansion of Throckmorton Hall.

"We received very excellent bids," said Vincent Cool, associate director of K-State Facilities Planning. "Our contracts at this time will bring us in excess of $20 million for the completion of Phase II."

The expansion will add two wings to the existing Throckmorton building. Cool said construction will start in April if the weather is favorable. Each new wing will have four floors and together will triple the the size of Throckmorton. The building will be occupied in the fall of 1994, he said.

The first part of the Phase II expansion was completed last April with the expansion of the greenhouse facilities.

The sealed bids for the contract to complete Phase II were opened in Topeka Thursday at the office of the state director of purchasing in accordance with state law. K-State then made its choice from the bidders.

In addition to Ferrell Construction Co. as the general contractor, Central Mechanical Construction Co. Inc. of Manhattan was awarded the contract for heating, cooling, plumbing and other mechanical facilities.

B&W Electrical Construction Inc. of Salina was awarded the electrical contract, and two out-of-state contractors were chosen to equip the laboratories and growth chambers the new wings will house.

George Ham, associate director of the Agricultural Experimental Station, said the new facilities will be a tremendous asset to the college.

"These will be first-rate facilities that will be helpful in attracting first-rate scientists to do research here," Ham said. "We're very competitive with the leading schools in the country. We have to compete for faculty and graduate students, and this will give us a big boost."

CENTRAL AMERICA

U.S. policy toward El Salvador "a failure"

Independent study clashes with last week's peace agreement

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — An independent, Pentagon-financed study concluded that, despite last week's peace agreement, U.S. policy toward El Salvador for most of the past decade was a failure because it was based on false assumptions.

For all but the final 20 months of the Salvadoran conflict, the U.S. goal was "a clear victory through a combination of military and reform measures," said Rand, a California-based non-profit research organization.

"In these terms, American policy failed," the study said.

That conclusion contrasts sharply with the official view of the conflict. The State Department said the peace agreement signed between the government and the rebels last Thursday is a large step forward toward the achievement of a Central America "wholly democratic and at peace."

The study, authored by Benjamin Schwarz, assesses the results in terms of U.S. goals during the previous decade. Research for the study was completed last September, about three months before the peace breakthrough.

"Since 1981, policymakers believed that victory in El Salvador could be won by influencing the regime to do what was necessary to win its people's hearts and minds; and the United States believed that the $6 billion in support it provided bought considerable leverage in that effort.

"But the Salvadorans had America trapped. They realized that the United States was involved in their war for its own national security interests."

The study said U.S. threats to withdraw aid from El Salvador if the country did not undertake fundamental reforms lacked credibility because Salvadorans realized the United States could not accept victory by the leftist FMLN guerrillas.

As a result, the Salvadoran military and the far right remained remarkably immune to American blandishments for reform in many areas, especially human rights, the study said. It asserted that the army, rightist death squads, rightist legislators and the court system have been systematically able to block efforts to punish rights abusers. Some of the same forces also have been able to emasculate land reform efforts, the report said.

As a result, the FMLN was able to sustain its insurgency even in the face of large-scale U.S. assistance to the Salvadoran military, Schwarz said.

U.S. officials were unavailable for comment Monday because it was a government holiday, but the administration has said repeatedly that the human rights situation has improved dramatically in El Salvador over the past decade.

Optimistic despite odds

MILT RICHARDS FACES LONG HAUL AS ATHLETIC DIRECTOR

PATRICK OBLEY
Collegian

In another life, his name could have been Dan Quayle.

As it is, when Milt Richards accepted the job as K-State's Athletic Director last August, charges he was too young or he was a pawn for the central administration were raised.

Richards' hiring came on the heels of the atrocious announcement of a $5.5 million athletic debt and the resignation of Steve Miller to accept a position in the Nike corporation.

The one major prerequisite for being an athletic director at K-State was to know how to balance that department's checkbook.

Richards had served for 10 years in Temple University's athletic department. For many of those years, he was the chief financial officer in charge of a $10 million budget and had handled numerous internal affairs related to the department, including budgeting, marketing, personnel, ticketing and network television appearances.

"Balancing the budget and eliminating departmental debt in a way that allows us to achieve excellence will obviously be a high priority," Richards said in August. "My experience these past 10 years tells me that this is attainable and that it will require the energy, creativity and teamwork of everyone pulling in the same direction."

One semester later though, no definitive progress has been made toward reducing the debt, causing people to wonder if everyone is pulling in the same direction.

■ MAIN GOALS

1. Balance athletic department's budget.
2. Eliminate $5.5 million athletic department debt.
3. Improve football stadium press box, add 17 VIP skyboxes and 250 club level seats and build indoor football practice facility.
4. Get K-State football on national television.

■ UPCOMING PROBLEMS

■ LOSS OF BIG EIGHT REVENUE
Because the Big Eight is distributing conference money with a new formula, K-State will lose $100,000 over the next three years.

■ WOMEN'S AND OLYMPIC SPORTS
All women's sports programs and Olympic sports programs will lose money. Women's basketball will be the worst, losing $370,000 this year alone.

Athletic Director Milt Richards sits next to his associate athletic director at Saturday night's game against Oklahoma.

CAMPUS CRIME

Backpacks stolen at Union

SARA JAAX
Collegian

When Jeanette Krueger returned to the shelves outside the K-State Union Bookstore in December, she realized she was the victim of a maddening finals-week crime.

Her book bag, containing textbooks, an entire semester's worth of class notes, completed papers and a copy of her friend's graduate thesis, had been stolen.

"I couldn't believe my book bag wasn't there after I had been away for only a few minutes. All I could think of was all my work and research would never be seen again," said Krueger, a graduate student in journalism and mass communications.

Last year, 22 of the 35 reported campus book bag thefts occurred in the Union, according to K-State Police records.

Because of the Union's social atmosphere, students often leave their belongings unattended, without thinking someone might steal them, Campus Police Chief Charles Beckom said.

The Union provides patrons with lockable bins to store their book bags or satchels. The lockers, located at the entrance of the bookstore, may be accessed after making a 25-cent deposit, which is immediately returned when patrons retrieve their belongings.

The morning Krueger's book bag was stolen, however, all the lockers were occupied.

"I usually put my bag in the lockers, but they were all taken. If there were other means to secure my book bag, believe me, I would have used them," Krueger said.

Beckom said book bag thefts usually increase during optimum times for quick textbook resale, such as the first few weeks of classes and during finals week.

When a book bag theft is reported to campus police, the staffs of the Union Bookstore and Varney's Book Store in Aggieville are notified.

At the Union, the student completes a theft form used to help identify stolen books during buyback, Union Bookstore Manager Kay Farley said.

Varney's has also developed an effective system to identify stolen books.

"We catch a lot of people," Dan Walter, Varney's textbook manager, said. "We usually catch from three to five individuals a semester who are selling stolen books."

The campus police recovered Krueger's book bag the day it had been stolen, and with it her research work.

But many students aren't as fortunate.

Beckom said the best way to avoid such a disaster is for students to keep book bags in sight at all times or, when possible, locked safely away.

He also said books marked with the student's name or number are 100 percent more likely to be identified during buyback.

"What's unique about this theft is that it's totally preventable," Beckom said.

▶ MOTHER ARRESTED IN DRUG RAID ON DAY OF SON'S DEATH

The mother of a 4-year-old boy, who was found dead Wednesday at Fort Riley, was arrested that night in a drug raid.

Jennifer Ments, 27, was charged with possession of cocaine and possession of drug paraphernalia, said Geary County Sheriff Bill Deppish.

Four Junction City residents were also arrested in the raid.

Mark Meseke, Fort Riley spokesman, said Ments is currently in the custody of the Geary County Sheriff's Office. A preliminary hearing is set for Jan. 23.

Spec. Kevin Ments, 1st Personal Services Company, and Jennifer Ments live in an apartment on Custer Hill at Fort Riley. Meseke said Kevin Ments was not arrested.

Although an autopsy has been performed, the cause of death of the Ments' son, Jamil, has not been released.

Jennifer Ments found Jamil unresponsive in his bed Wednesday morning.

Richards

People wondered if someone else was pulling the strings in the athletic department, in particular President Jon Wefald and Vice President for Institutional Advancement Bob Krause.

"That's a fallacy," Richards said of the accusations. "My training is such that intercollegiate athletics is one of the most visible things on a college campus.

"To prove that point, the new president at Iowa University proposed to make freshmen ineligible for athletics, and it almost cost him his job. So I think any central administration has to understand the lesson of Iowa.

"Bob Krause has supported me," Richards continued. "I've been here for six months and have never been told what decision to make by Jon Wefald or Bob Krause. They have helped me, counseled me, provided guidance. They've helped me as the new person coming in to understand Kansas politics."

Richards said Wefald and Krause have not been calling on him to make any particular decisions and said they probably will not.

"Those two are who I work for," Richards said to clarify his relationship with the two administrators. "So, I keep them abreast on what I'm doing. The central administration needs to be involved in what we're doing, and if I was going to make a major policy decision on athletics, I would seek their opinion."

Such a major policy decision would include actions to balance the athletic budget and decrease the debt.

"Coming in here, the first thing I wanted to do was get a handle on the financial situation," Richards said. "I had a little bit of a disadvantage in that (K-State's) business manager went to another institution."

Filling the vacancy was Jack Key, former Oklahoma University business manager.

"Jack Key is a CPA, you know, a big-league fiscal guy," Richards said. "Having Jack here, we're very comfortable with our financial situation now. At worse case, we'll have a balanced budget this year."

But Richards admitted a balanced budget doesn't necessarily make a dent in the debt. Currently, $2.6 million of the debt is made up of the loan used to build Bramlage Coliseum and run the football facilities.

"The other $2.9 million is an investment made in the various programs," Richards added. "We upgraded them, brought in a new football staff and paid some people off."

Richards, though not being specific in who was paid off, clarified the statement saying the payments were made to complete various contracts with people no longer associated with K-State — one of those not being Steve Miller, who is being sued by K-State for a breach of contract.

"As far as the athletic debt is concerned, we will not add to the debt," Richards said. "Let me rephrase that — it will be very unlikely that we will add to the debt during my administration."

In order to keep that vow, Richards said, the two revenue sports — football and men's basketball — will have to become bigger moneymakers than they were in the past.

"You have to understand that for at least the forseeable future, men's basketball and football will be the only two programs that will generate sufficient dollars to not only pay for themselves, but pay for the other programs," Richards said.

If the programs fail to produce enough money, then the debt will grow. The biggest money loser is women's basketball.

CLOSED CLASS LIST

Hello Mother, Hello Father

MARGARET CLARKIN/Collegian

A second grader from Ogden Elementary School waves energetically to his parents as he and his classmates recite poems and songs, calling themselves the Honeybee WordPlayers, at the Multi-Cultural Fair Monday afternoon in the Manhattan Town Center.

MARTIN LUTHER KING JR. DAY

USD 383 students, employees get King holiday off

STEPHEN MCKEE
Collegian

Not only did K-State students celebrate Martin Luther King Jr. Day free of classes, but for the first time, students of USD 383 enjoyed the same holiday.

After negotiations between the Manhattan/Ogden Board of Education and the National Education Association, the calendar for the 1991-92 school year designated the day as a holiday for the students.

Dr. James Rezac, Manhattan High School principal, said it is a good idea, because all school employees can also have the day off.

"The significance about this holiday, in my opinion, is that the schools are closed," he said. "For some holidays from school, such as spring break, the students have no classes but the school is still open and the employees of the school have to work.

"But for Martin Luther King Jr. Day, it is a non-work day. The school is closed, and everybody has the day off."

Several of the students of Manhattan High School said observation of the holiday was a long time in coming.

"It's about time. We were the only school in the city last year that had to go to classes and we were mad," Melanie Coffee, Manhattan High freshman, said. Fellow freshmen Krishna Carson and Nikolia Whitaker agreed.

While some students said it was about time the district recognized the holiday, other students have been observing it for years.

"I never came to school on Martin Luther King Jr. Day anyway. It has always been important to our family," Elatt Spiller, Manhattan High sophomore, said.

Some students enjoyed the day off by participating in local events.

"As a member of the Ebony Queens of Ambition, we are going to perform and sing at the Manhattan Town Center Monday in celebration of the holiday," Nakia Glaspie, Manhattan High junior, said.

Even though classes were canceled Monday, several events were still scheduled to take place.

"There were several sporting events scheduled," Rezac said. "In that respect, Martin Luther King Jr. Day will be like a Saturday with certain events taking place."

Students will have the opportunity this semester to share their concerns about classroom instruction while receiving confidential assistance.

The deans from each of the eight colleges have designated a specific person to offer assistance to students who have formal grievances or problems such as discrimination or sexual or ethnic harassment. They will also address issues such as instructor preparedness, instructor availability outside the classroom and issues dealing with students' rights to political and religious views.

Before this semester, many students went to the Office of the Provost without any idea of where to find help for their particular problem.

Lavon Wells, assistant to the provost, said there wasn't much her office could do for the students, because each of the colleges have different guidelines for instructors and students.

"About all we could do when students came in here was to refer them back to their colleges," Wells said. "This measure will give students a name of someone they can use as a contact person if they are having problems in classrooms. It also will save time for students. It saves the student some extra hassle."

William Feyerharm, assistant dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, is one of the designated persons to offer assistance. In a college of almost 6,000 students, he is confronted with concerns varying from issues dealing with advising and graduation requirements to those dealing with instructor complaints, grading grievances and cheating.

"There is just about every conceivable problem that comes into the door or on the phone," Feyerharm said, "But as far as I am concerned, I think academic performance is the critical issue."

The contact person's job is to solve students' problems by directing them to the right University department or office.

But there is more, he said.

"The kind of assistance that I personally offer is to sit down with students and help them think out the problem," Feyerharm said. "It is them giving me information that is important — not me giving them information.

"I ask them what the problem is and how they think they are going to solve it. I see my help as a sort of diagnostician. My job is to raise these issues and help them to resolve these problems. It's a two-way street," he said.

On a busy day, Feyerharm sees about 25 students and receives about 15 phone calls. Because he sees so many students, he said simply doesn't have time to do any long-term advising or counseling.

"At times, I am critical to students who come here and sit and want me to solve all their problems," he said. "I tell them that they have to be part of the discussion."

Janice Wissman, associate dean of the College of Education, will also be a contact person.

"I think it's important that students know that, in addition to professors and advisers, there is someone who can help them with some of the problems they experience in their academic lives," Wissman said.

STUDENT MURDER

Soldier pleads no contest in Heintze case

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Collegian

One of the Fort Riley soldiers charged in connection with the murder of K-State sophomore Catherine Heintze pleaded no contest and was found guilty of felony murder and kidnapping during his arraignment Friday.

Jason Lee Turner, 21, made his plea in Geary County District Court. He will be sentenced Feb. 25.

The other soldier charged, Nathaniel Wayne Ellibee, made a statement that was read in court which revealed Turner shot Heintze in the head with a high-powered rifle when he saw her hit some switches.

Ellibee said he ran out the door before the shooting.

Ellibee's trial is scheduled for Feb. 27 on charges of aiding and abetting felony murder, attempted aggravated robbery and conspiracy to commit aggravated robbery.

Heintze, 20, was shot in the head during the robbery of Pate's Convenience Corner north of Junction City on the evening of Sept. 20.

Athletic department needs to get on the ball

There's not much to say about the athletic department that hasn't been said before.

K-State Athletic Director Milt Richards was brought in to steer our debt-ridden athletic department out of troubled waters, but he looks more like Exxon Valdez Capt. Joseph Hazelwood than Captain Nemo.

Richards originally said athletics would lose no money this year, leaving our more than $5 million debt standing at more than $5 million. That may not work.

Richards negotiated a new "revenue generation formula" in 1991 in which those teams playing bowl games will get a bigger portion of the pie.

Richards

This package will cost us $30,000 this year.

That total on that package will be $60,000 next year, and $100,000 by 1994.

This pact was made on the fear that Oklahoma was thinking of splitting the Big Eight scene. If Oklahoma stays, K-State can make the big bucks by playing in Oklahoma's football stadium. That is why for the past two years we have played Nebraska and Oklahoma on their home turfs. We make more money there than we do playing them here. So maybe the pact does make a little sense.

But women's basketball at K-State stands to lose $370,000 this year and doesn't look to improve.

Bill Snyder wants a couple of nice little indoor practice facilities for the football team. The administration looks to be right behind him in this request, because what is K-State football nowadays without Snyder?

All of these add up to a loss on the profit statement. How then can Richards expect the athletic debt not to increase?

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics needs to quit dreaming up ways to spend money and focus their attention on saving money.

Jax stands up to ASK

Good.

At the meeting, McClaskey demanded capital improvements be placed ahead of financial aid on the priorities list ASK uses to guide its lobbying of the Legislature. By placing capital improvements first on the list, she was carrying out the referendum mandate from the last election to improve Farrell Library.

McClaskey's non-cooperation upset several other representatives from regents schools at the ASK meeting. ASK is about cooperation — they argued.

ASK has been cooperative over the years. It's cooperated with the Board of Regents, seemingly at times to the detriment of the students who finance it through campus fees.

By being uncooperative, McClaskey shook up ASK and demanded that it represent the interests of the students who created it in the first place. ASK needs more of that if it is to counter the bureaucrats in Topeka, of whom little accountability is demanded by the Board of Regents. More should be demanded, especially of those regents who find it difficult to stay awake during the meetings, much less keep up with the discussion.

McClaskey did her job by not cooperating. As she put it, "I was elected to represent K-State, not ASK."

Way to go, Jax.

Love, hate and the next generation

I believe in love. I'm not talking about the kind of love involving excited bodies rubbing together in ecstasy.

The love I'm talking about involves compassion and caring, along with a healthy dose of respect.

It's the kind of love we're supposed to have for the young and old and everyone in between. It's the kind of love you observe, and absorb and grow kinder and wiser because of. It's the kind of love my parents taught me to have for my fellow human beings.

EVE WILSON

I guess that's why I get so upset when I hear so much about hate these days. You know, it's true. Love does make the world go 'round. But have you really thought about what hate does to it?

First allow me to clarify which hate I'm talking about.

This hate encompasses every race, pigmentation and hereditary difference. It includes both sexes. It can be direct or indirect, and it affects the young and old. It's waged within and between families, neighbors, schools of thought, religions and races. It's everywhere; there's no escape from it.

In its early stages, hate can begin as suspicion. With so much diversity among people, it's fairly easy to observe. One of the easiest places to see it is in shopping malls.

Last weekend when my fiance and I visited one of Topeka's malls, the clerks at one pricey clothing shop watched us while we browsed, but no one offered any help.

I was a little surprised, because even though we were dressed much like the others in the store were, they looked upon us with distrust because of the colors of our skin. (Even though I may be called "black," I am brown and not the same color as all other blacks.)

Fear and avoidance are descendants of hate.

I am 5'4" and closer to 100 lbs than 200. Yet people (especially white females), have crossed streets or even left rooms if I was the only inhabitant. I am also routinely looked over by other students in class, especially the ones seated nearest to me when it comes time to pass something around the room.

Hate causes violence.

These days, as in the early days of desegregation, even youngsters can be targeted as were the African-American brother and sister and Hispanic youth in New York City this month.

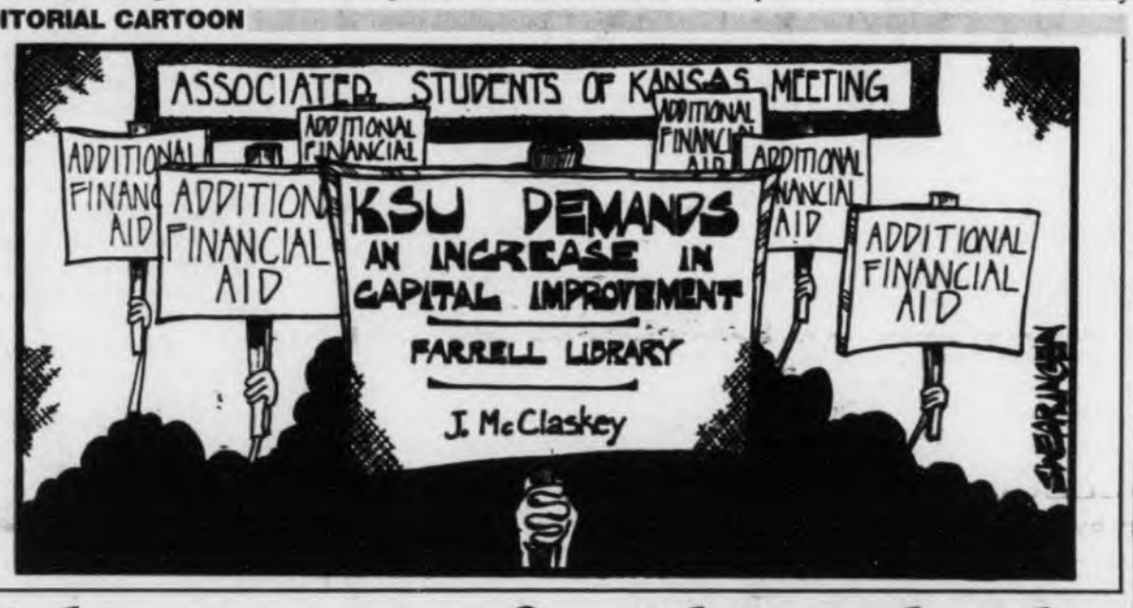
These three were attacked by white teenagers. The girl's hair was cut, and all three children were painted with white shoe polish and told, "You'll be white today." This act of violence has incited retaliation on the part of several of New York City's African-American youth, who have attacked youngsters thought to be white.

Once it's experienced, hate causes mental and physical scarring.

If you don't believe that, check in on those kids who were smeared with the shoe polish. Even if the paint didn't scar them, I'm sure memories of the attack will. I'd even be willing to bet they're becoming a bit hateful now themselves, if they weren't already.

At its most heinousness, hate causes death.

Of course everyone can look back on Adolf Hitler's murderous actions toward the Jewish people as proof of that point. But you don't really need to look back at all to see people being killed because of their religion, beliefs or color. You merely need to read periodicals or watch the evening news.



As I sit here thinking about my own life, I realize that some of you will never experience or witness hate the way I have. You probably don't have reason to believe that you will. Many of you will continue your lives oblivious to the pain hate has brought to many others.

My main concern about hate is what it could mean for future generations.

What kind of world will be left for our younger brothers and sisters, children or even grandchildren if we continue letting our differences escalate from misunderstanding to hate?

My answer — a world desolate and deserted by compassion, care and respect. A world devoid of joy but full of pain. A world that won't go 'round anymore.

A lost message found in a book

Few things are as sincere as those found.

I know it's quite spleenless of me to launch unreservedly into this thing with the moral of my story on the proverbial doorstep, but I'm operating under what I'd like to think are special conditions here. And if you would bear with me through a couple of wordy and overburdened paragraphs, I'd like to explain. (Besides, I like to think of my first sentence as glaring enough to be wearing a cozy vest of hunter's orange, so anyone who would shoot it would have to plea a color blindness of some kind.)

ROBLIN MEEKS

But to the chase:

I have a sizable chamber in my heart set aside for bookstores and old books in general, and I've found after several hundred book exchanges that often times the most interesting authors write just inside the front cover, leaving messages as hopeful and heartfelt as the most profound poet or playwright. The majority are simple quick bursts of wishings: "Happy Birthday," or, "There's nothing like a good book."

But once in an overdue while, a special something comes along. A something worthy of a wider audience than it was intended, and seeing as how you've decided to read this far, and I can let you in on it, I see no reason why I shouldn't share.

A few weeks ago, I purchased a used copy of E. E. Cummings' "The Enormous Room." I won't go into the details of the novel itself, but inside the back flap of the dust cover I found (after bringing it home, whistling) a stained envelope, bearing only the name "Martin," taped carefully to the binding. Inside, (Yes, I opened it; wouldn't you?) was the most remarkable letter, one that I will not hesitate to reproduce verbatim:

November 29
3:17 a.m.
Dear Martin:

I'm writing this letter after the latest and least prodigious in our long series of elliptical phone conversations. We seem to have a penchant for saying bushels of nothing, however Manly that nothing might be. It seems to me that somewhere between that Saturday you pushed my tricycle into a busy intersection and your first day of classes at Penn, the waxed cord between our cups snapped. And as your acting youngest brother, I'm prepared to exercise full privileges under my title as family rambler (card carrying, in fact), quite unceremoniously, in order to at last unpack some baggage that I've been carrying around Atlas-like for many Thanksgivings before this past one. (I've also armed myself with quite a slew of metaphors, analogies, and other such snowballs that I'm not above chucking at you while hidden behind my postal fort.)

Don't worry, I'm not going to confess some latent homosexual tendencies, or anything that earth-shatteringly scary for you to handle (however tempting that may be for me). It's much more non-partisan than that. I want to talk about direction, or rather, my supposed lack thereof.

As you well know, my aimlessness was again a hot topic of conversation around the Archer household (after the once-a-year Grace, but before the mincemeat) during the past Thanksgiving holiday. And it was, incongruous as always, an unbridled pleasure to see you and Sabrina in the process of living someone's happily-ever-after, Elizabeth and her new Harvard Med bo-hunk (I didn't know they sold that many different sweatshirts), and Tomas, still dateless as usual, but bending curves regularly in his graduate physic courses. What do I have to show after five years of college: a few rejection slips from minor publications and a prayer for a raise in the minimum wage? OK, so I'm exaggerating, but my point is still slouching in here somewhere, so please let me hope to give it a backbone.

What I'm trying (slowly, calmly) to get around to is that our relationship has lapsed into something equivalent to, say, a bad day of ice-fishing. We are both sitting in some makeshift shack, watching our breath fog, staring at a ragged opening, waiting for a nibble, but the bobber never dips. Well now I'm nibbling, or more accurately, belaboring. (Did that well-packed snowball find its mark? I took such careful aim.)

Our directions may be different, or totally opposite in this case, especially since you think I don't have one, but who's to say I must follow you? I want to be comfortable saying that. Maybe I don't have a particular direction — and no, I don't intend to make the word cheap. Directions become useless when you've no desire to go anywhere — or can't go anywhere. Take the main character in this book, for instance. He's caught between prison and freedom. In a large room, a person can walk from one corner to another and not have left really. I'm not prepared to say that this book's hero(?) isn't going anywhere, but I am prepared to say (in full ramble) that I am perfectly comfortable in going nowhere — I've got a few more corners to explore of my own yet. Besides, as I see it, the world needs fewer heroes and weightlifters. Am I making any sense whatsoever?

I guess what I really want is some sort of nucleic familial ideal, some way out of our enormous room, or out of our enormous fishing house, if I may be so bold. It's too far-fetched, I know, to simply stand up, leave our poles baited, and shake hands — our mittens won't allow it. OK, I'll stop, but as Woody Allen rightly said, "Art is always trying to make everything perfect," I'm paraphrasing this, "when life doesn't really work that way", and I still have too much artist in me and I've never really cared for fishing.

Give me a call, I'm listening. And I know you've got a good arm.

Much love,
Little Z.

Postscript: I apologize for all the things tabled for your digestion; you might want to floss tonight.
Hope you call soon,
Zackary

LETTER

▶UPSET AT ATHLETICS

K-State has a very rich history in both men's and women's basketball. On the women's side, the Lady Cats lead the conference in both Big Eight championships and in all-time wins and are sixth in the nation in all-time wins. The men lead the conference in all-time Big Eight standings and no team has more NCAA tournament appearances.

Beginning in the 1990-91 season, that tradition is slowly being murdered by some of the worst college basketball coaching I have ever seen. Although Susan Yow's Lady Cats had a winning season her first year, the major reason for that was the individual talent of players like Diana Miller and Nadira Hazim. Despite being the only conference school to have two players on the All-Big Eight first team, the Lady Cats barely scraped by with a winning season, finishing only five games above .500. Although recently there has been some improvement with a road victory this past weekend, I don't think that trend can continue with such poor coaching.

Inadequate is the word I would use to describe the coaching ability of head coach Dana Altman. His first season here, the Cats had a 13-15 record, ending the season dead last in the Big Eight. Word is that Altman can recruit but not coach.

The man chosen to lead K-State athletics into the '90s is Milt Richards. Richards came from Temple University, serving as the athletic department's chief financial officer. The main reason he was brought to K-State was to reduce the department's deficit. He has not taken steps to reduce this deficit. In most areas, particularly non-revenue sports, K-State is competing with one hand tied behind its back. Trying to compete with a budget that is sometimes half of that of its conference counterparts. One area where the athletic department is not undermanned is the all-important area of associate athletic directors. K-State has six associate directors while Oklahoma, which has a greater number of sports, needs only four associate athletic directors to fulfill the job.

In addition to Richard's inability to improve the financial situation, his overall demeanor is an embarrassment to the entire university. Showing up for non-revenue events in a maroon sweatsuit for the first couple of months after his hiring was a nice way to make a first impression. It would be like a governor going to address the legislature in aerobics wear. As for his ability to speak, suffice it to say that Richards and President Jon Wefald command about the same amount of respect in front of the microphone.

The only bright spot in K-State athletics is two-time Big Eight Coach-of-the-Year Bill Snyder. We can only hope that he will overlook the shortcomings of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics and stay to lead the Cats to more winning seasons.

If drastic personnel changes are not taken soon, K-State athletics could fall into an abyss of which there may be no return.

Study to determine equity among GTAs

KIP BEASLEY
Collegian

A study by a committee of the Student Association of Graduates in English is attempting to determine equity and fairness among University graduate teaching assistants.

"I think there are some departments (with GTAs) that aren't being treated fairly, and the English department is one," said Frank Douglas, SAGE president.

Some English GTAs said they were overworked last semester.

Rebecca Albrecht, English GTA, said each composition class increased by five to six students, intensifying the number of papers to be graded. She said composition papers take longer to score than scanner tests given by other departments.

"The study is to evaluate how we stack up to other departments," Albrecht said.

The study has three parts to it, Douglas said. The first is a survey given to all K-State GTAs. It is to ensure everyone wanting to participate in the survey does and to chart the results.

The second part of the study is to compare GTA salaries in different departments and on focus on salary patterns.

The final part of the study will look at how other universities' English departments deal with GTAs.

"The whole purpose is to look for equity problems throughout the University," Douglas said. "Hopefully, we'll be able to propose changes."

So far, SAGE has a 37-percent response rate from the surveys handed in before Christmas break. However, they have been unable to calculate results yet, Douglas said.

Last semester Douglas informed Peter Nicholls, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, that some GTAs were contemplating walking off the job or withholding grades if the University did not cooperate. That same day Nicholls promised to improve conditions, Douglas said.

No grades were withheld, nor did any GTAs walk off the job. A cap on composition class sizes and an additional office were two results of Nicholls' promise, Douglas said.

Dean Hall, head of the English department, said "The real extreme pressure is off now. At least they (the GTAs) don't have to share desks."

Results from the study will be available by spring break at the latest, said Jeff Henry, head of the committee conducting the study.

Symposium calls for change

BRIAN KRATZER
Collegian

"King's Legacy for Education," a symposium calling for non-violent change in racial relations will be at 11:30 a.m. today in Bluemont 016.

The event is in accordance with the University-wide celebration of Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week.

"This is a time for us to reflect on the individual to make society more humane," Gerald Hanna, professor of education, said.

"Martin Luther King was a leader in the area of equality and justice with a philosophy of non-violence," said Hanna, one of the four panelists who will start the symposium with brief presentations.

Also on the panel are Linda Thurston, associate professor of special education; Bart Mann, senior in elementary education; and Audrey Todd, graduate student in student counseling/personnel services.

"Violence can occur in the forms of hatred, societal and psychological," Hanna said. "The panelists are free to present ideas on non-violent change. I see a non-violent, peaceful coexistence."

"This is a panel discussion followed by open discussion," said James Boyer, co-chairman for the Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week Committee.

"We try to call the symposium during King week to help the University be aware of King," he said.

Todd said he hoped people will attend the symposium and that it will be beneficial to them.

"I hope the symposium takes on an educational composition in terms of making people sensitive to Martin Luther King and informing people of what needs to be done," Todd said.

"We want to add depth and breadth to those who attended," Hanna said, "so they can come away with a little more knowledge and sensation to the plight and perception of others.

"My personal view about how to reverse these 'us-isms' and 'they-isms' is get rid of anything that divides us," he said. "We'll try to get the audience to ask how to get rid of these problems such as ethnic jokes, for example."

MACINTOSH POWER BOOKS IN STOCK

Notebook convenience, Macintosh power.
Introducing the Apple® Macintosh® PowerBook™ computers. Three fully functional Macintosh computers, weighing between five and seven pounds.
Think of the PowerBook as a very small, very efficient, totally portable office. Its ergonomically designed recessed palm rests, full-size keyboard, and centered trackball relieve stress and make typing easier, wherever you are. Communicating is easier, too. Altman on OU: "We got destroyed"

CHRISTOPHER T. ASSAF/Collegian

117-76 loss
second worst of post-WWII era

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

Prior to Saturday night's game against Oklahoma in Bramlage Coliseum, K-State coach Dana Altman could have performed first aid on his team with a simple adhesive bandage.

Now he needs a tourniquet.

The final, scary numbers: Oklahoma 117, K-State 76.

The Sooners, now 11-2 overall and 1-1 in the Big Eight, rode in to Bramlage with a two-game losing streak in Manhattan, and a two-game skid in 1991-92.

They rode out having scored the most points ever against a Cat team, and having become the first team ever to top the century mark in Manhattan — Nichols Gymnasium, Ahearn Field House, Bramlage, anywhere.

"We got destroyed by a team that played harder and fought harder," Altman said. "We were flat out whipped in every phase of the game."

Altman, whose team is now 8-5 overall and 0-2 in the conference, had a firm grasp of the obvious.

The 41-point thumping tied the early-season, low-water mark at Lamar — a 116-75 loss — as the third-worst margin of defeat in Wildcat hoop history.

The worst came in the first game ever played by K-State, a 60-7 loss against Haskell. The second-worst — and the one acknowledged by the K-State hoop media guide as being the worst (it happened in the modern, post-World War II era) — was an 88-42 loss to Marshall in 1945.

So what happened?

That depends on who you talk to.

Listen to Sooner coach Billy Tubbs, who is, as usual, not at a loss for words.

"I don't think we had played Sooner basketball in a month," he said. "That's my fault. We had drifted into being a very conservative team.

"But we're dedicated right now to playing hell-and-high water. We're going to play like we know how. We're doing some things that may really get us burned, but we're willing to take that chance and get after it."

Tubbs's players got the message their coach was trying to impart and delivered.

Break opportunities and a Sooner offense running on all cylinders — 32 assists will tell you that — left OU with four players who scored 20 or more points.

"We just played Oklahoma basketball," said Sooner guard Brent Price, who scored a game-high 28 points and handed out 10 assists. "We got out on the break, pressed and got turnovers."

Jeff Webster scored 27 points, Damon Patterson had 23, and Bryan Sallier chipped in 20 as the quartet had 22 more points together than did the entire K-State team.

And, yes, K-State did turn the ball over frequently. The Cats lost the ball to Sooner pressure on 23 different occasions.

"We just didn't execute. When you don't execute, things like that happen," Altman said. "We knew they would press us, but we had a hard time deciding when we had an advantage and when we didn't."

The play- by-play told a rather sickening tale.

OU scored 14 of the game's first 16 points to lead 14-2 with just 4:20 gone.

The lead swelled from there, with the biggest Sooner advantage in the first 20 minutes coming when Webster hit a 17-footer from the left of the circle with six ticks left on the clock to give OU a 26-point, 59-33 edge at intermission.

It was never any closer. In fact, only a Gaylon Nickerson lay-in with one second left kept the margin from becoming the third-worst in K-State history all by itself.

So where does K-State go from here?

"I think it's like a gut check," said Nickerson, who had 18 points to pace K-State. "We've just got to be tough. It's not the coach's fault. It's the players'.

"It's up to the K-State Wildcat players — not the coaching staff — to do what's expected of them as a team."

Nickerson conceded that the only place they can do just that is on the court.

"I think it's to the point where a meeting isn't going to do it," Nickerson said.

INSIDE STUFF

Billy Tubbs vents some frustration at a call Saturday.

Rare Manhattan win a big one for Oklahoma

PATRICK OBLEY
Collegian

Manhattan was once a scary place to visit for Billy Tubbs and his Oklahoma Sooners. No more.

Not after the Sooners proved there are actually 117 ways to skin a Cat in their record-shattering destruction of K-State Saturday.

In the past, such a Sooner stomping was unthinkable. The Cats had built a commanding 47-24 home series advantage on the Sooners over the years, including 95-70 and 66-51 wins the past two years.

"I think we'd actually like to play some more games here," Tubbs said after his Sooners became the first visiting team to score more than 100 points in Manhattan.

Manhattan was the last stop on a month-long road trip for the Sooners, a tour which had already yielded two losses. With state rival Oklahoma State looming on the ESPN Big Monday horizon, coming into Bramlage Coliseum was about the last thing the Sooners wanted to do.

Although claiming historical superiority, Tubbs did admit there was a monkey on his team's back. Two years ago, OU shot a miserable 29 percent from the field. Last year, they shot 36.5 percent.

"We've played about as badly as any team could play here in the last two years," Tubbs said. "We knew we would be in for a helluva battle."

"We had the right attitude going into the game tonight. K-State is a good team. We had a lot of respect for them. We couldn't afford to look past this game."

Sooner sparkplug Brent Price, whose 28 points led four Sooners scoring more that 20, agreed.

"Last year and the year before was mentally and physically tiring for our team," Price said. "It had become a mental thing. The larger it got, the worse it got. Last year, we just didn't play well.

"We had a week off, and we worked hard," Price continued. "It's hard to score that many points here in Manhattan, so we knew we would have to play our brand of basketball.

"Hell, I took the starters out with 1:40 left in the second half. I'm not going to run the score up on anybody. I like K-State.

— Sooner coach Billy Tubbs

"Hopefully, we broke it this time. We shot the heck out of the ball."

A year ago in the same house, Price scored just four points, making just one shot from the field. Saturday, he made 11 of 16 shots.

"Really, I think it's a pretty good shooting gym now," Price said tongue in cheek.

Shooting good or not would not matter if it weren't for the Sooner defense — Oklahoma converted 23 Wildcat turnovers into 41 points, the exact margin of victory.

Perhaps the key to that outcome was brought about by Coach Dana Altman.

"I had heard that coach Dana had said we were weak defensively," Tubbs said.

Really, Billy?

"Well, that's what someone told me. I didn't hear it myself. Still, that gave us a point to prove."

"A lot of people think we're not a great defensive team," Price said. "Maybe if we were a good defensive team, we'd score more."

Sooner starters remained in the game long after the outcome had been decided, raising allegations Tubbs was trying to run up the score. Tubbs emphatically denied the charge.

"I had been taking them out, but I decided we had started to slip in the second half," Tubbs said. "I won't allow that against any team, no matter what the score is. That's why they were out on the floor.

"We came down here with only 10 players," he said. "We played more people tonight than we have all year.

"I made some great moves," Tubbs concluded. "Hell, I took the starters out with 1:40 left in the second half. I'm not going to run the score up on anybody. I like K-State. I hope they win every one of their games for the rest of this year."

LADY CATS BASKETBALL

Same story, different ending

Miller scores 35 points in 91-86 comeback win in Norman

ERIC BROWN

Had the Lady Cats' date with the Oklahoma Sooners Saturday afternoon taken place in Bramlage Coliseum, and the opponents been wearing orange and black, those in attendance might have thought they were seeing a replay of last Wednesday's game versus the Cowgirls of Oklahoma State.

Miller

But after this affair in Norman, Okla., K-State was left with an aftertaste that can be rivaled by only the sweetest morsels.

The Lady Cats evened their conference record at 1-1 and moved to 4-11 overall by defeating the Sooners in the Lloyd Noble Center, 91-86.

In a near-mirror image of the Oklahoma State game, the Lady Cats fell behind 20-11 at the midpoint of the first half and the Sooners expanded their lead to 14, 37-23 at the five minute mark.

"It was very similar to the Oklahoma State game in that I didn't think our being down was a bad down," K-State coach Susan Yow said. "I felt like we were doing some things that hurt us that we could correct."

Like the earlier game, K-State fought hard to keep the deficit near 10 the remainder of the half and was able to cut it to single digits by the half, 45-36. From that point on, K-State was on fire, hitting 19 of 30 attempts from the field for 63.3 percent.

"We beat a team that was 8-3," Yow said. "They had just beaten a conference foe (Iowa State) by 31 points. They were riding high. We came in here and were able to create something for ourselves and I'm just tickled for us."

Point guard Mary Jo Miller, who had a career-high 35 points in the win, said the comeback was a good one.

"It was a great win," Miller said. "Coming out of the loss to O-State, we were kind of in a slump — that was a game that we should've won. We were down a little bit and we wanted to play hard and show that we could compete in the Big Eight.

"Our record isn't really what it should be, and this was a tremendous win for us. We're just putting it all together and hustling and helping each other out."

The Lady Cats scored the first seven points of the half to climb within two points of the Sooners, 45-43.

Miller then proceeded to do her best Michael Jordan/Larry Bird impersonation. The 5-foot-5 senior, playing in her 100th game for the Lady Cats and drawing her 99th start, put on a scoring clinic, including a 23-point effort in the second stanza. She hit 12 of 15 shots, including four of six from three-point land.

Miller was seven for 10 from the charity stripe and dished out five assists, enrolling herself in the 500-assist club at K-State. She's now at 504 assists and counting. In addition, Miller came up with four steals while playing the entire 40 minutes.

Miller, who scored 11 points and recorded seven assists, six rebounds and five steals in the heartbreaking loss to Oklahoma State, was awarded the honor of Big Eight Conference Player-of-the-Week. Her 35 point performance tied her with Tina Dixon and Diana Miller for second-place on the K-State single-game scoring charts.

"Mary Jo just played the game of her career," Yow said. "It was a tremendous victory for us."

Miller shattered her personal best of 22, which she set exactly three years ago to the day of Saturday's game.

"I can't compare (the win)," said Miller, who was unaware that she was approaching records during the second half. "My shots were just falling. I took some shots that I normally don't take and they fell. I guess I was on tonight and my teammates knew it and tried to get me the ball. We just played great together as a team."

League-leading Huskers battle Lady Cats tonight

ERIC BROWN
Collegian

The Lady Cats will again be forced to focus on a big game shortly after experiencing a highly emotional one.

But this time will be special: they'll be coming off a win, their biggest of the season.

That focus will be especially important because K-State, 4-11 overall and 1-1 in the Big Eight, will be hosting league-leading Nebraska.

Nebraska enters the game with a five-game winning streak and a record of 12-3 overall and 2-0 in the Big Eight.

Lady Cat Coach Susan Yow talked about the team's preparation for NU in the postgame press conference after the 91-86 Oklahoma win.

"We've got to enjoy today," Yow said following the win. "We have the ride back together on the bus, and it'll be great. Sunday, we've got to really turn our focus towards Nebraska.

"We'll refocus, and we'll get ready because we're in the thick of things in the conference season."

And in it the Lady Cats are, due to the come-from-behind road win against the Sooners. K-State now finds itself in a four-way tie for third place. An upset over Nebraska would leave only undefeated Oklahoma State with a conference record better than the Lady Cats.

"The best that we could have been was 2-0," Yow said. "We wanted to be 1-1. We ended up having to do it the hard way since we lost at home. They made us have to put a lot of pressure on the road game."

Nebraska is led by 6-foot-2 junior Karen Jennings, who averaged 20.5 points per game last season. Jennings scored 31 in last year's meeting with the Lady Cats in Manhattan. Nebraska was victorious in that one, 79-69, while K-State won in Lincoln, 76-71.

Before the loss in Bramlage last season, K-State had won five straight from the Lady Huskers. K-State holds a 28-9 advantage over Nebraska and has only lost twice to NU in Manhattan.

INDOOR TRACK

Team sweeps first meet

Capriotti calls season opener good practice for upcoming triangular

KRIS YOUNG

And they're off.

The men's and women's indoor track teams opened their seasons at the KSU/Coors invitational over the weekend. Teams from Southwest Missouri State, Oklahoma State and Toledo participated in the quadrangular.

After competing this weekend, many members of the men's and women's teams do indeed look prepared for a successful season.

"You get a lot of young kids and want to see how they are doing," Capriotti said. "We've got some where they should be and some with a ways to go."

K-State women placed first in seven of 15 events, second in five events and third in three events.

In the mile run, K-State women took the top six of nine places.

Janet Treiber, who won the event, said she wasn't surprised at the push teammates gave each other.

"We expected that. OSU only had a couple girls in it, and we knew it would mostly be us. And that's a little awkward," Treiber said. "Any one of us could've won it, so we had to push each other."

"Distance did a good job," Capriotti said. "They basically ran it by themselves and had to push each other."

Treiber said having six runners in the mile isn't common for every meet. Entering all of them was Capriotti's way of preparing them for other meets.

"We won't do that again. From the race, he can decide who to keep in the mile, who to move up to the 3,000-meter run or down to the 1,000-meter run," Treiber said.

"It gave us a good look at what we need to improve on."

Capriotti was pleased with the performance of the women's team as a whole.

Capriotti had cause to be just as excited about the men's performance — they placed first in five of 15 events, second in five and third in four.

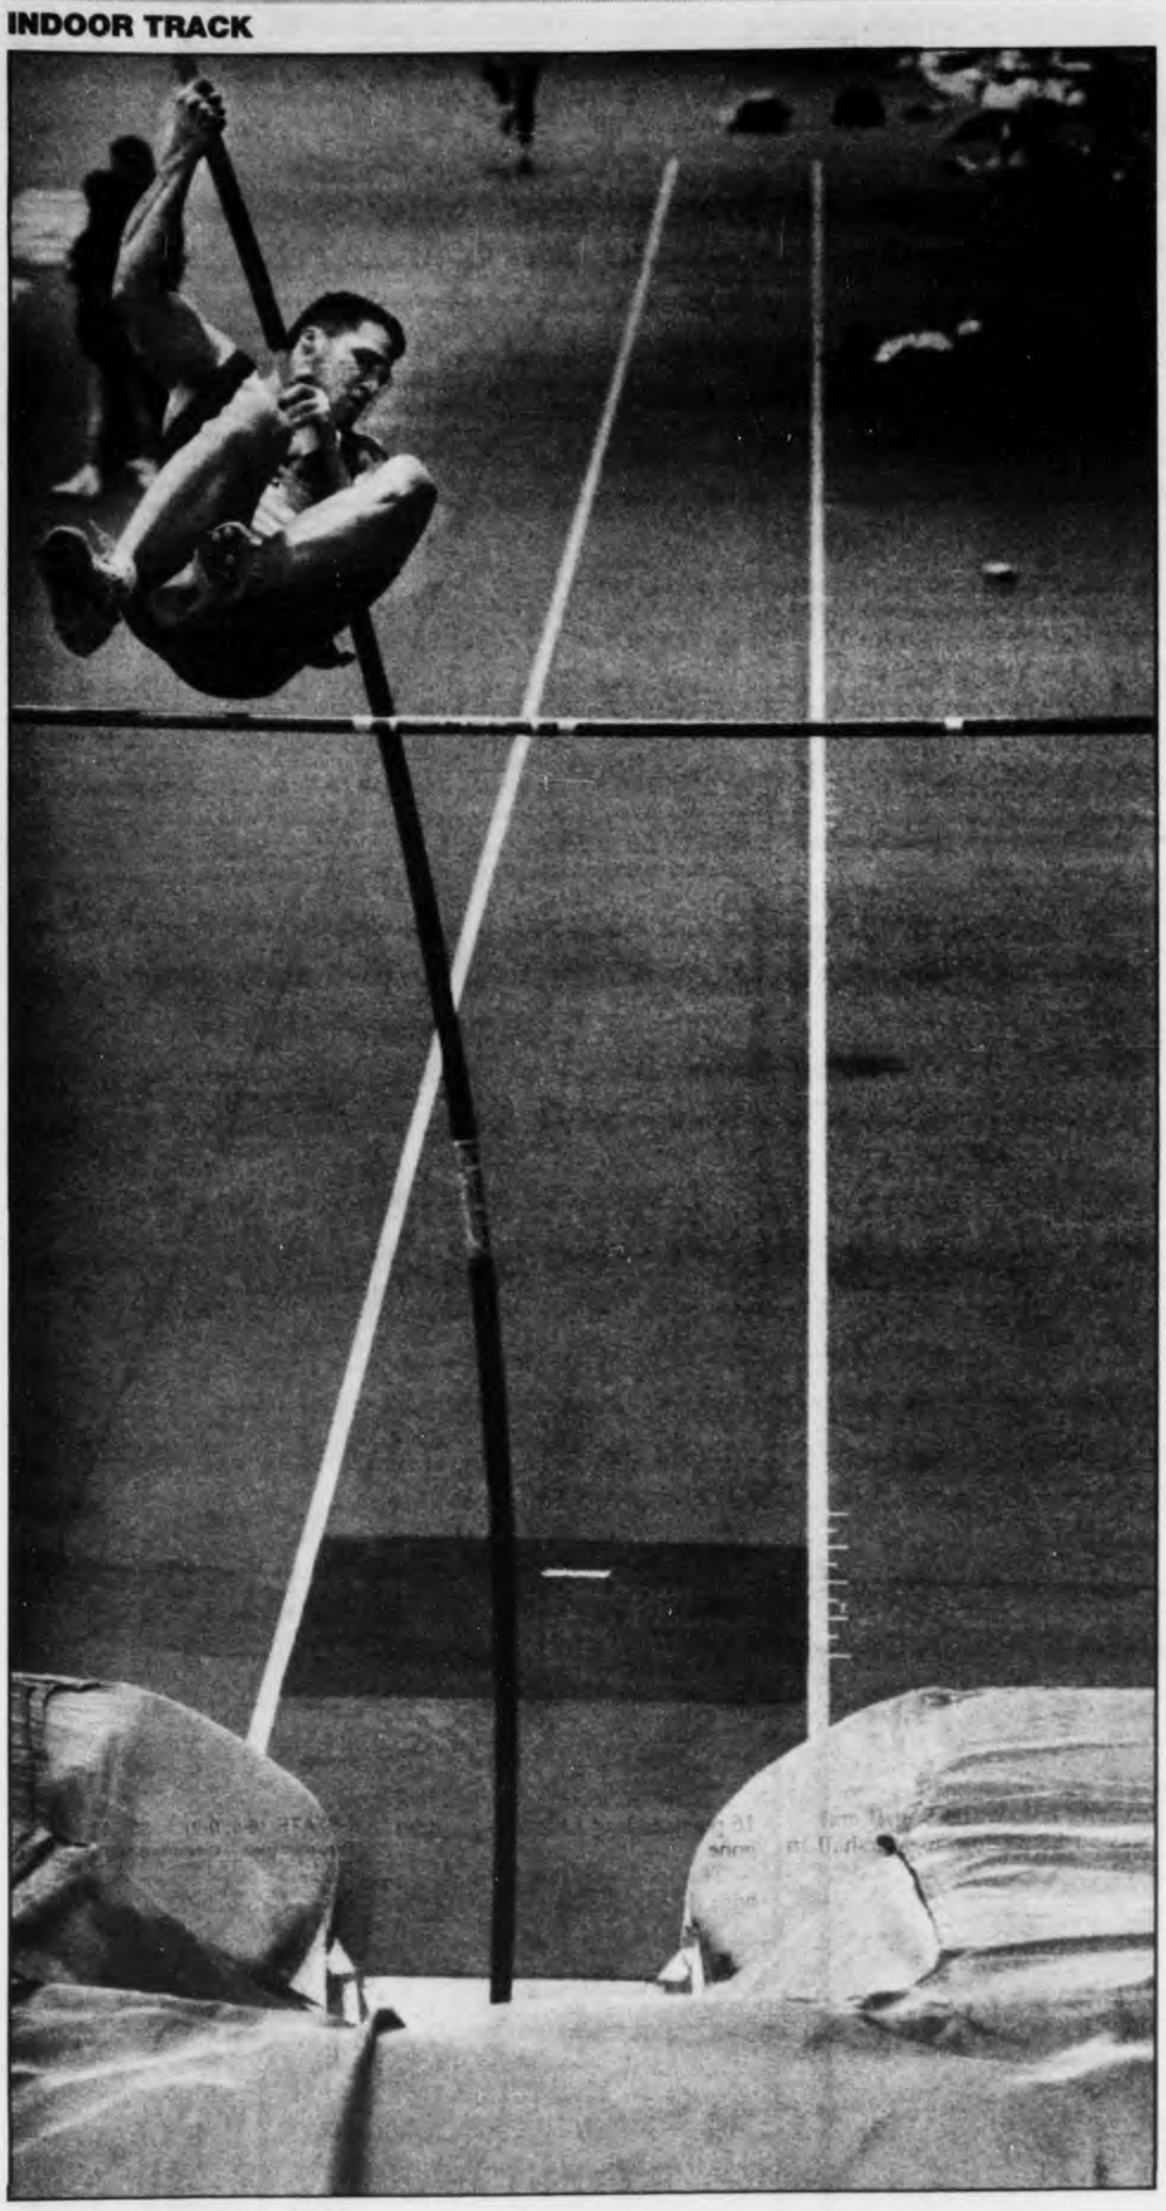
"We are good for now, but we have to get a lot better," Capriotti said.

He is concerned with getting better for this weekend's triangular in Columbia, Mo., with KU and Mizzou.

"They are three big rivals, and it's a great competition all around," he said. "We need to turn it up another notch for that meet."

Turning it up another notch will mean getting everyone in good health. Corey King, who was named Outstanding Male Athlete in last season's opening meet after placing first in the 400-meter dash, sat out of the quadrangular due to a hamstring injury.

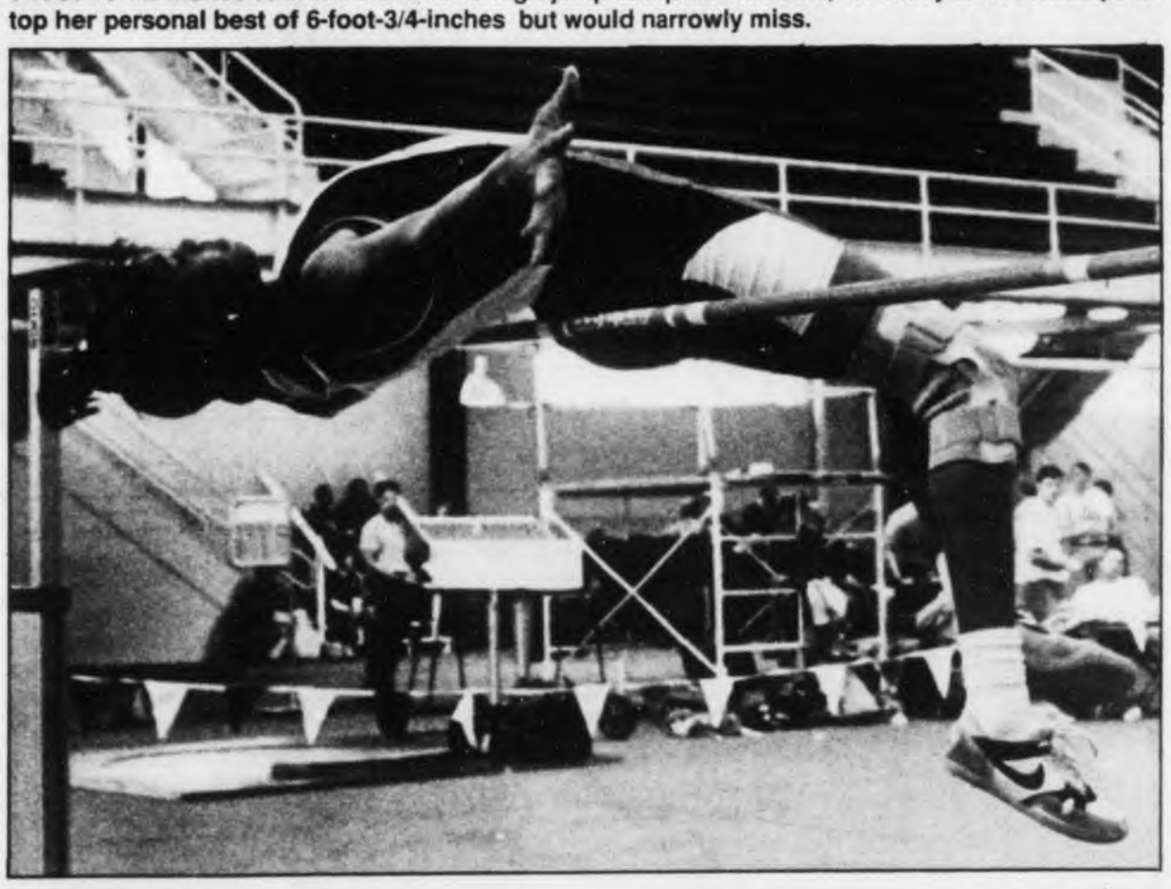
"We really need him. He has a lot of experience," Capriotti said. "Our longer sprinters are young, so he gives us some stability."



K-State also had two competitors each in the Wildcat Heptathlon/Septathlon.

In the septathlon, Gwen Wentland placed second with 3,486 points, and Kathy Janicke finished fifth with 2,715 points. Wentland's finish was a personal best.

In the men's heptathlon Troy Adkins finished third behind former K-State athlete Steve Fritz. Fritz competed in the septathlon as an unattached competitor.



Capriotti said competing against Fritz was a definite advantage for Adkins.

Fritz's 5,936 point finish set a new national indoor septathlon record.

OUT OF THE BLOCKS

High jumpers look forward to promising season

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

It's an adage – the higher the better.

The K-State high jumpers confirmed that once again at the Wildcat pentathlon-heptathlon and KSU quadrangular Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

K-State dominated the high jump discipline, with R.D. Cogswell and Connie Teaberry winning the men's and women's divisions.

Assistant coach Clifford Rovelto said he was really pleased with the results of the high jumpers.

In the women's competition, Teaberry had no trouble, clearing 5 feet 10 1/2 inches. Freshmen Gretchen Daniels and Samantha Gray placed second and third respectively.

For Teaberry, a four-time All-American, winning was never in doubt. The first four heights she took in the first attempts. At her winning height, Teaberry struggled, but flopped it finally with her last try.

Then, Teaberry, who is still recovering from knee surgery, tried to equal her personal best of 6-foot-3/4-inches, but narrowly missed.

"The last attempt felt best," she said. "I thought I was over."

But for the first meet of the season, she said, it was a good start, although she wasn't really satisfied, "because I guess, I'm never satisfied with myself."

Rovelto said he thought it was a good effort by Teaberry.

"Connie really jumped well in spite of not being really technically as sound as she normally is," he said. "Her result shows that she's physically strong and her leg is doing well."

That she will improve this season is not in doubt for either her or Rovelto.

"I think it's getting better with a bigger competition," Teaberry said.

"The thing about Connie is that she will improve as time goes on and gets back into her (level) group," Rovelto said. "Connie is a tremendous competitor. She always tends to do well in big meets."

Cogswell, who had to jump alone after two jumpers from Barton County Community College didn't show up, said he'll try the height next week again at the triangular meet in Columbia, Mo. Cogswell won with a new indoor personal best of 7 feet 1 inch. He just missed the 7 feet 2 1/2 inch qualification mark for the nationals.

"Man, I should have made that," Cogswell said. "I thought I had it in the last attempt. I know I came close this time and that gives me hope for rest of the season."

"Especially if I get some competition," he said. "Today, I was all alone. It's hard to get pumped up jumping all by yourself."

For Rovelto, the "one-man-show" was an indication of what Cogswell could do this season.

"I'm very satisfied with him. It's an indoor personal record," he said. "You don't have to say much more than that. It was great. Even more than how high he jumped, I was pleased with his technique.

"R.D. historically struggles a little bit indoors and jumps better outdoors."

SPORTS COLUMN

'92 will be a great sports year at K-State

FRANK KLEEMANN

Yes, it's true. It is 1992.

Even the last people, still awakening from their hangovers, have to recognize that they're now facing a new year.

And no, it doesn't have to be just another year in the whole long life of a student. We just broke into the year, but it looks look it will be one of the best this century will have seen, at least in terms of sports.

It doesn't matter how badly the last year ended. Like sitting in some Jayhawk bar drinking beer with some Walters, Johanning or whomever and getting champagne poured all over you.

That's over. It's history. Forget it! Let's look ahead.

The top events this year will be the Olympics in Albertville, France, and Barcelona, Spain.

But you don't have to look that far away to find great sports. As a student at K-State, you are right in the middle of exciting teams. And as the "Voice of the Wildcats" Mitch Holthus would say, 1992 may become a big, big, big, big year for the Wildcats.

The new year couldn't have started any better than when the Lady Cats picked up their second win of the season against St. Louis followed by the men's first road victory at Wyoming.

The team under second-year coach Dana Altman is looking forward to reaching the NCAA tournament, after failing in the attempt last year. Through devastating losses at Oklahoma State and against Oklahoma, hopes are dumped on but still there. Hopes will be on the rise when point guards Marcus Zeigler and Brian Henson return to the court in full strength after injuries.

Just a winning record for the Cats, however, would mark the first time since 1954-55 the football and the basketball teams had winning records in the same academic year.

The football team itself will have a good chance to shoot for a spot in the bowl games in its season, beginning in fall. And don't forget, this year K-State will play Nebraska at home.

Right around the corner of Bramlage Coliseum and KSU Stadium are the tennis courts. The times when the team was in as bad a shape as the courts it played on are over.

With nationally ranked Karin Lusnic on top, the netters are embarking on the beginning of the best season in school history. Coach Bietau's players are ready to push forward into the upper echelon of the Big Eight and establish themselves as one of the 30 best teams in the nation.

The track and field team, for many years, has been one of the top teams in the Big Eight. Although the women's and men's teams might fall short again, look for some individual titles.

And Steve Fritz, recent K-State graduate, should have a pretty good chance to qualify for the U.S. Olympic team to go to the summer games. He has the potential, which he proved Saturday by setting a new indoor heptathlon record.

Several club sports teams are also planning to have successful seasons.

The men's soccer team has high hopes of capturing the Big Eight title, and they have the ability to realize that goal.

For the K-State women's rugby team, it will be a year of affirmation. But there is no doubt this team wants to repeat its tremendous winning streak of eight games, which began after losing a pair last fall.

And finally, there is a hockey team which plays for the first time as a CCHA-Midwest Division II team. It seems almost impossible to reach the postseason tournament its first year in the league, but the team will focus on that goal.

K-State's teams, athletic or nonathletic, are ready to play their games in the new year. All they need is enough support from the fans, and the success will come.

So, go to your favorite events and enjoy a great sports year in 1992.

BIG EIGHT BASKETBALL

No. 3 Cowboys grab 92-89 win at Oklahoma

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NORMAN, Okla. — Darwyn Alexander equaled his career high with 24 points, including two free throws with five seconds left, lifting No. 3 Oklahoma State to a 92-89 victory over No. 17 Oklahoma Monday night and giving the Cowboys their best start ever.

Oklahoma State (17-0) surpassed the mark of 16-0 set by the 1950-51 team and is 3-0 in the Big Eight for the first time since 1980-81. The Cowboys snapped an 11-game losing streak in Norman.

Oklahoma (11-3, 1-2), couldn't make up a 14-point second-half deficit and was held to 43-percent shooting.

The Sooners pulled within 90-89 when Terry Evans hit a 3-pointer with 32 seconds left. The Cowboys then worked 27 seconds off the clock before Alexander was fouled.

Alexander, an 80-percent foul shooter, made both shots. Brent Price then missed a 3-pointer in the final seconds. Price led Oklahoma with 26 points, 18 in the second half.

Corey Williams had 21 points and Byron Houston had 17 despite foul trouble. Jeff Webster had 21 for Oklahoma, 17 in the first half, before fouling out with 6:46 left.

A six-point run late in the first half — sparked by a technical foul on Oklahoma coach Billy Tubbs — gave the Cowboys a seven-point lead. They stretched it to eight by halftime.

Houston picked up his fourth foul 1:51 into the second half, but the Cowboys scored the next six points to take a 58-45 lead. They increased it to 14 three times and led 71-60 with 9:52 left.

Oklahoma then used a 9-2 run to make it 73-69. The Cowboys were unable to pull away again and the Sooners eventually pulled within 90-89 on Evans' 3-pointer.

Oklahoma had the tempo to its liking early and had good luck working the ball inside against the smaller Cowboys. The result was a 17-11 lead four minutes into the game.

"The budget for women's basketball is $380,000, and maybe they generate $5,000 or $10,000 in ticket sales, so yes, you can say they lose $370,000, but that is one of the things that is happening in college athletics now."

In the past, when the big two sports couldn't generate enough money, the Big Eight conference revenue system filled the void. The revenue package divided money made from the conference's take from radio and television revenue and individual schools exploits in bowl games and tournaments.

But a new formula, one Richards supported, has been put in place. Now, the members will each receive a guaranteed $3 million from the alliance, but schools who participate in bowls or tournaments will be able to keep their earnings.

Most importantly, K-State will lose money from the new deal.

"In the short term, it will cost us money," Richards said. "Next year we will lose maybe $30,000. The next year maybe $60,000 and $100,000 the year after that, but it was necessary to keep the league intact. If we didn't pass the changes in the formula, I think schools like Oklahoma would have actively pursued agreements with other leagues."

In other words, no more crutch.

"It will be up to the football and men's basketball programs to make up for what we'll lose," Richards said.

In order to do that, Richards said, the school will need more national TV exposure. To get exposure, the programs have to be strong. To make the programs strong, Richards has, with the approval of the central administration and the Kansas Board of Regents, decided to spend money to improve facilities.

Last Thursday, the Board of Regents approved a $7 million private fund-raising program to support the renovation of KSU Stadium and the construction of a indoor practice facility for football.

Such renovations, Richards said, will improve the overall football program. In an ideal situation, K-State would then be able to draw the attention of national television.

"The 7-4 season was a terrific accomplishment," Richards said. "I think we've positioned ourselves to get national exposure.

"With our balanced budget, we generate sufficient funds to fund athletics. When I talk about losses, if we get on national television just once in the next five years under this revenue formula, we'll get $250,000-$400,000," Richards said. "I think the chances, as our football program improves, are good."

But for such a thing to happen, it is necessary for the football program to improve, and the fund-raising program must succeed.

Detracting from the odds of those two succeeding is the general assumption K-State is just a temporary stop on football coach Bill Snyder's ascent to head coach at a school with a better football team. Snyder has been credited by Richards as the person who has turned the program around.

With the deck seeming still stacked against him, Richards remains upbeat.

"I am going to be at K-State for a very long time. I happen to know that Bill Snyder wants to be the coach at K-State for a very long time," Richards said. "I know no one believes that, but I do."

RESIDENCE HALLS

Occupancy drops between semesters

STACY WATERS
Collegian

K-State residence halls experienced a drop of about 150 students between the spring and fall semesters, said Bob Burgess, assistant director of housing.

Students who graduated in December and students who withdrew from the University comprised a majority of this number.

Burgess said the changes in residence hall occupancy parallel University changes. If University enrollment is down, residence hall occupancy is down.

Students moving off campus is another reason for the declining number in residence halls.

"Students who want to move off campus do not have to show a need to move off campus," Burgess said.

Three years ago, a committee was used to decide if a student could cancel a residence hall contract. Students had to bring their reasons for wanting to break the contract to the committee. The committee then evaluated the information and made a decision based on their interpretation of the information.

The decision to move out of a residence hall was taken out of the student's hands, Burgess said.

Students now pay a $100 cancellation fee plus 25 percent of the value of the remaining contract. If students withdraw from the University, student teach or have internships that takes them away from campus, they will not be charged, Burgess said.

If a student needs to break the contract for financial reasons, a payment plan is set up to meet the student's needs. Late fees and interest are not charged with the payment plan.

The payment plan is a mutual agreement between the student and the Department of Housing, Burgess said. The payment plan is tailored to meet the individual student's needs.

Burgess said students are pleased with the flexibility of the payment plan.

Room changes and transfers between residence halls are other changes that occur between the fall and spring semesters.

The most common reason for changing rooms or roommates was to live with a new friend, said Diana Robertson, area coordinator for Strong Complex.

ACADEMICS

More seniors face dismissal

New policy puts students on probation earlier

SARA JAAX
Collegian

More junior and senior students are likely to receive academic dismissal notices, according to a new academic warning and dismissal policy.

Don Foster, registrar and chairman of the Faculty Senate admissions and enrollment committee, said the new policy was passed at the December Senate meeting.

"Fewer students will be dismissed at the freshman and sophomore levels, and more students will tend to be dismissed at the junior and senior levels," Foster said. "Totally, there will not be a great deal of change in numbers, but at the lower levels students can make themselves more academically healthy."

The current academic probation and dismissal policy affects an average of 2,400 students each semester for probation and about 2 percent of enrolled students, or 360 students, for dismissal, Foster said.

The new policy, renamed the academic warning/dismissal policy, was drafted with two goals in mind, Foster said. The policy, effective fall semester 1993, should enable the dismissal and graduation thresholds to be closer together, and it should be easier for students and faculty to understand.

The policy simplifies the current academic probation policy by eliminating the use of a complicated chart which is used to determine a student's scholastic status, said Larry Erpelding, College of Agriculture associate director of resident instruction and admissions and enrollment committee member.

The chart compares a student's individual hours completed with a corresponding probation grade point threshold.

"The current policy is very confusing," Erpelding said. "The probation status and dismissal status changes with every hour a student completes. We decided to simplify it and make it something everyone can understand."

For instance, if a student were to complete 25 K-State graded hours and earn less than 48 grade points, he or she would receive academic probation status, according to the current policy. If a student were to complete 26 graded hours at K-State and earn less than 50 grade points, the student would also receive academic probation status. A student's scholastic status changes with each change in hours completed and grade points earned.

"I advise a lot of undergraduate students, and the present policy is nearly impossible to explain," said Mickey Ransom, associate professor of agronomy and academic affairs committee member. "I don't think most faculty members understand it."

Erpelding said the new policy breaks down hours and grade points more simply. He said if a student's cumulative grade point average were to fall below a 2.0, the student would receive an academic warning regardless of hours earned.

The current policy for dismissal is similar to the current probation policy except for two parts. A student could receive dismissal status after completing 12 hours, whereas probation is possible after completing three hours, and a student's earned grade points must be lower for dismissal.

Robertson handled 20 transfers between the halls of the Strong Complex.

Paulette Watters, freshman in mathematics, moved from Boyd Hall to Putnam Hall to live with a friend. She found that she liked Putnam more than Boyd because of their 24-hour quiet policy.

Lisa Tuxhorn, senior in elementary education, and Cristie Bell, senior in journalism and mass communications, moved from the first floor to the fourth floor of Boyd. They moved because they wanted a two-person room.

One-half of the hall transfers were students moving from a residence hall that was not in the Strong Complex to Boyd, Putnam or Van Zile halls, Robertson said.

Kristian Kelley, freshman in architecture, moved from Moore Hall because Putnam offered him a larger room and a quieter residence hall.

The expanded Throckmorton will house classrooms and research laboratories for the departments of plant pathology, agronomy, horticulture and forestry.

Ham said having all these facilities under one roof will enhance cooperative research among scientists and allow more sharing of ideas, as well as equipment.

Phase I of the building, named for Ray Iams Throckmorton, former dean of the College of Agriculture, was completed in the fall 1981 at a cost of $8.1 million.

DELT SKIERS- We got together your friends and mine. It started at Hooters where we had a great time. We met the next morning 9:00 sharp ready to say good-bye because we heard New Mexico had a great mountain high! After nine hours of writing notes, telling jokes and potty breaks we arrived in Angel Fire ready to purchase our first keg. Skiing all day, a keg a night the trip went great until we got stopped...that damn dog should be shot!The skiing, the food, the partying was great. We hope you'll let us finish off that last case. Love, the Xi's and one Chi-O.

Prime minister announces $3.3 billion purchase of U.S. computer products, services

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOKYO — Japan's prime minister and one of its leading car manufacturers said Monday that contrary to statements, Japan had made no commitment during President Bush's trade summit to buy U.S. autos and parts.

Japan meanwhile bowed to U.S. pressure and announced a pledge to open bidding to foreign companies on $3.3 billion worth of government-purchased computer products and services.

Computers, like autos, have been a chronic sore point in talks to even out the trade imbalance between Japan and the United States. U.S. negotiators have argued that government agencies open bidding only to Japanese computer companies; Japan says the same thing about U.S. government purchases.

Prime Minister Kiichi Miyazawa and Toyota Motor Corp.'s chairman, Eiji Toyoda, sought to dispel expectations that Japan was bound to meet auto purchasing targets set Jan. 9, when Japanese negotiators agreed to trade concessions to help relieve the U.S. recession.

Miyazawa told NHK television the summit announcement that Japanese automakers would try to import nearly 20,000 Big Three vehicles, and $10 billion more in auto parts was a target rather than a firm promise. Japan now buys $9 billion in U.S. auto parts a year.

The announcement was a kind of forecast of how many U.S. automobiles and parts Japan would definitely be able to purchase by 1994, he said in the interview broadcast Monday night.

Toyoda, chief of Japan's largest automaker, told reporters in a separate interview that Toyota will study and consider the possibility of selling General Motors cars.

"It is too much to say we will actually sell them," he said.

During the four-day summit that ended Jan. 10, Toyota announced it was setting a target of selling up to 5,000 GM vehicles a year through its dealerships. Japan's other four major automakers — Nissan, Honda, Mazda and Mitsubishi — separately set targets totaling 15,000 more vehicles.

"In terms of a direct agreement with Toyota, we never said we had a direct agreement with Toyota. They pledged they would investigate selling 5,000 cars," GM spokesman John Pekarek said Monday in Detroit.

But in the aftermath of a chilly meeting with their U.S. counterparts, the so-called Big Five expressed doubts about whether Japanese consumers will buy U.S. cars.

Bush, who was accompanied by the Big Three chairman and other U.S. business leaders, was widely criticized both here and at home for his handling of the summit.

Some critics said the administration lost face by demanding Japanese automakers help their weakened Big Three competitors.

Bush, returning Monday to the White House from Camp David, did not respond to a reporter's shouted questions about Miyazawa's comments on auto parts. It was a federal holiday, and there was no other immediate reaction from White House officials.

In a related development, Toyota said Monday it will break one link in its traditional "keiretsu" relations with its auto parts affiliates and buy 240,000 electronic fuel injection sensors a year from Hitachi Ltd.

Hitachi, the giant Japanese electronics manufacturer, is a member of a rival keiretsu, or corporate group, that includes Toyota's chief rival, No. 2 automaker Nissan.

Breaking up keiretsu has been another target of U.S. trade negotiators.

CITY COMMISSION

Late-night, outdoor music may be banned

ANDY WOODWARD
Collegian

Late-night music in Aggieville may be a thing of the past.

The Manhattan City Commission voted unanimously Tuesday night to approve the first reading of an ordinance outlawing music in outdoor beer gardens — such as Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, Kite's Bar & Grill and the Spot Tavern — after 11 p.m.

Debate at the unusually crowded meeting ranged from tales of drunken minors wandering through houses near Aggieville to pleas for compromise in the interests of University students.

"Aggieville has been a big problem in the past two years," said one man who spoke at the meeting. He said he is in the construction business, so alertness is vital to his job.

"Many times, from 10 p.m. to midnight, I just couldn't sleep. One time, my wife woke me because this person was trying to get into our house. The police came, and he was found with false identification. He was not charged with one thing," he said.

Others expressed sentiments against the ordinance.

"Let's not be conservative to the point of pinching businesses so hard that they leave," John Niemann, junior in agribusiness, said.

"If you take Aggieville away from the students, you could hurt yourself in the long run. If you take away what makes this a great community for a college town, then you're cutting your own throats," he said.

Niemann also said he regretted the stereotyping of Aggieville patrons, in reference to neighbor complaints, "Every person who goes to Aggieville does not act that way."

Rick Kaldor, Last Chance stockholder, objected to the vote.

"It's student bashing. They don't want the student body to do anything," he said.

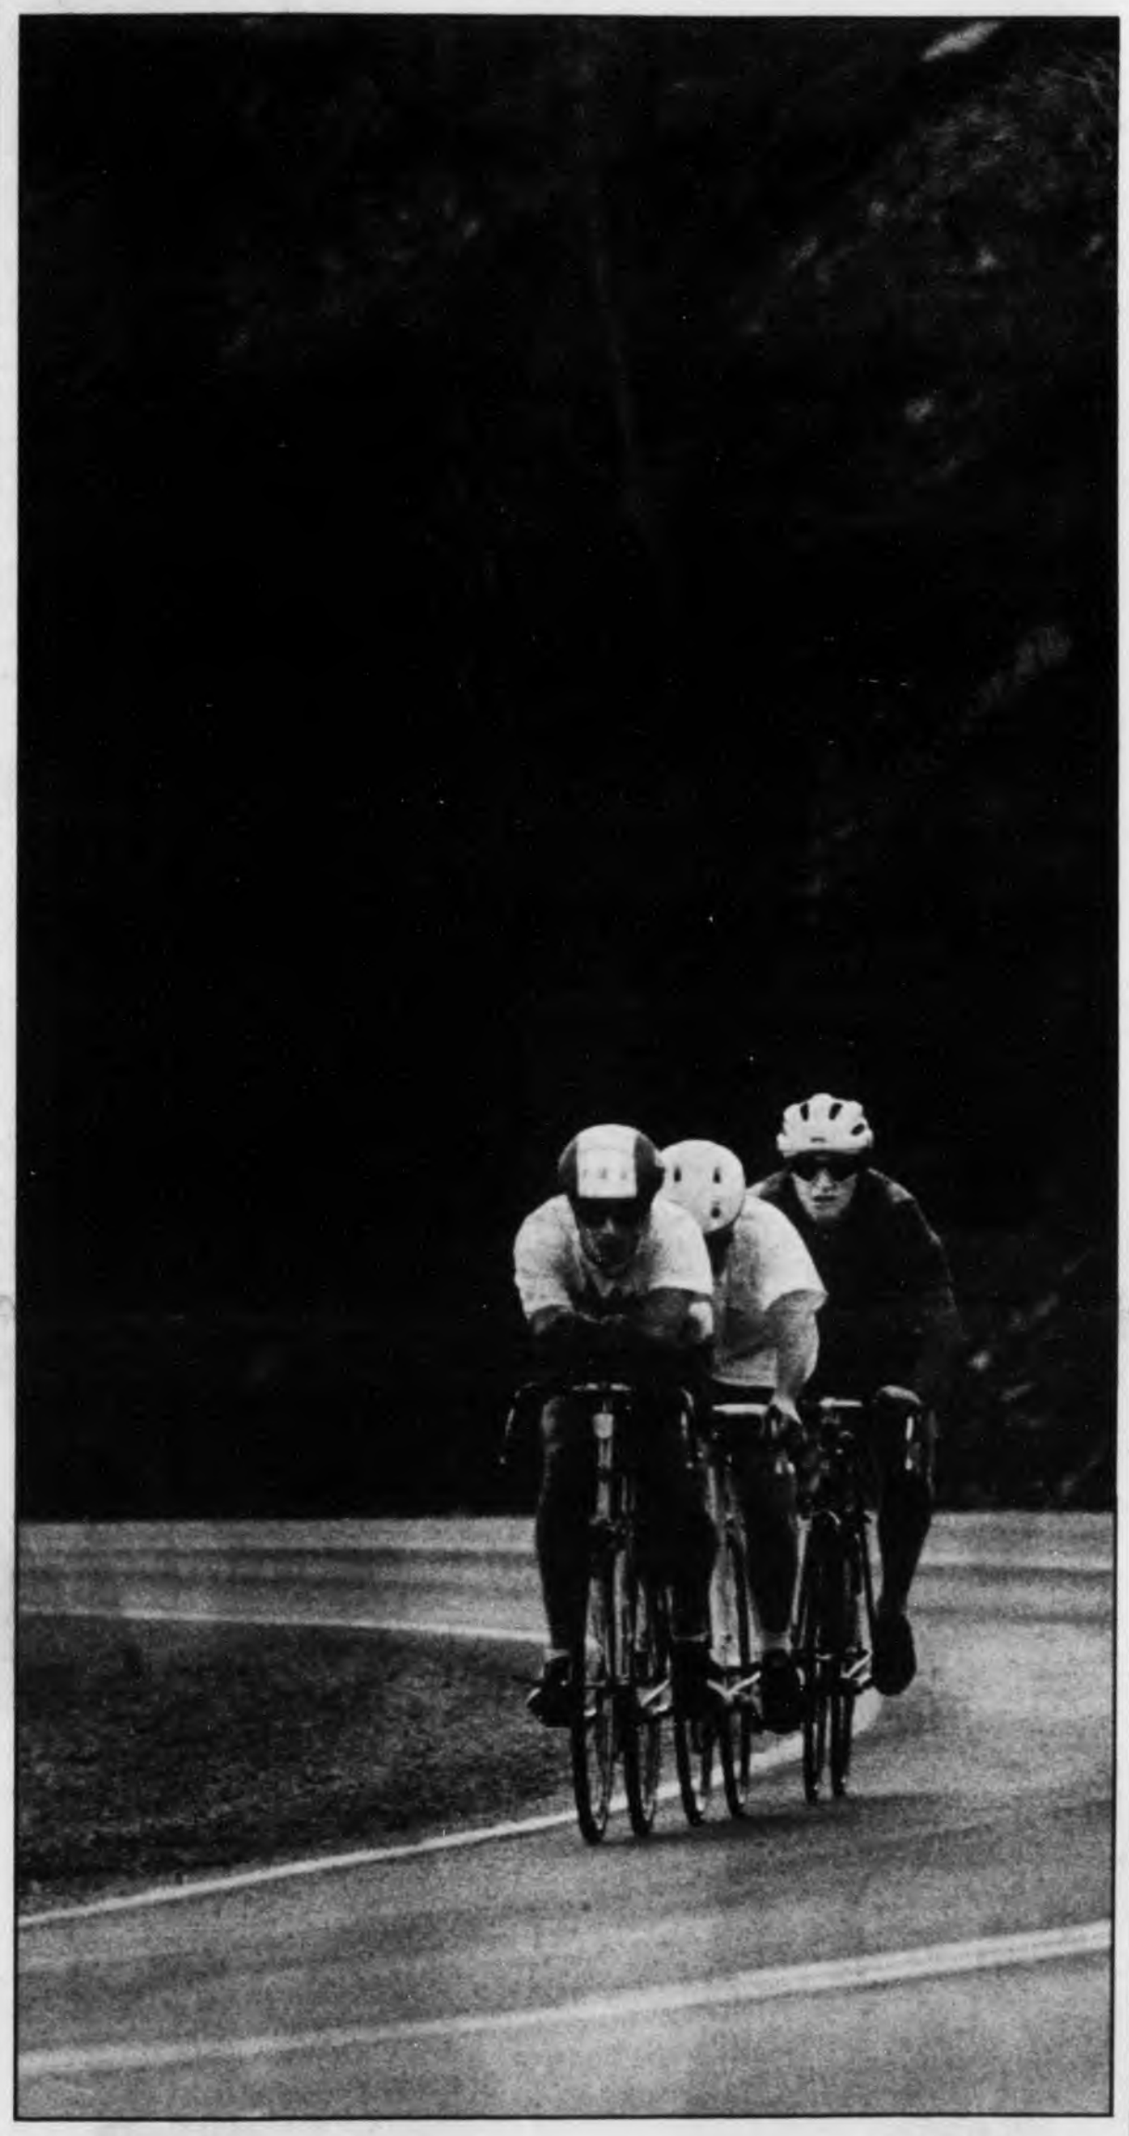
Kaldor also expressed no pity for the complaints of the neighbors.

"I can assure you Aggieville was there long before any resident who lives there," Kaldor said. "The moral of the story is, if you don't want flour on you, you don't bake bread."

Financial repercussions were also discussed.

One of the points discussed by the commission, and which could be added before the second reading of the ordinance, is mandating that entrances and exits be supervised during all hours of business.

Scott Sherman, owner of the Spot, stated his financial objections to the ordinance, saying he cannot afford to pay a doorman to be on duty all the time.



"A lot of businesses won't be around anymore if we pay more to employees," he said.

Local radio stations aired requests Tuesday for people to attend the meeting in protest of the ordinance.

"They (KMKF-FM 101.5) called us about the ordinance regarding the noise and asked as many guys in the house as could to come to the meeting," said Darren Bott, sophomore in business administration. Bott was one of about 20 members of Alpha Gamma Rho fraternity present at the meeting.

Since the first reading of the ordinance was unanimously approved, the next action is for the Planning Board to amend the ordinance so it will be consistent with suggestions made at the meeting.

The ordinance will then be read again for approval at the next City Commission meeting Feb. 4.

ABORTION

Landmark decision at stake

Reproductive rights could be in jeopardy

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court set the stage Tuesday for an important election-year ruling on abortion, agreeing to review a Pennsylvania law that imposes restrictions on abortions.

Activists on both sides of the abortion debate said they expect the court to use the Pennsylvania case to undermine, if not overturn, its landmark 1973 Roe v. Wade ruling legalizing abortion.

They said the decision likely will make abortions far more difficult to obtain even if states are not allowed to outlaw virtually all abortions.

"One of two things will happen, and either will be good," said Douglas Johnson of the National Right to Life Committee. "They may use this case to re-examine and overturn Roe. Or they may stop well short of that but still uphold the Pennsylvania law's provisions."

Harvard law professor Laurence Tribe predicted the most likely result will be a closely divided decision "in which the court may well avoid the ultimate issue."

He said the court could uphold the Pennsylvania law while seemingly leaving Roe v. Wade intact. But Tribe said another likelihood is that the court will adopt a new standard for reviewing state regulations — one under which most restrictions enacted by the states would be allowed.

"The days of safe legal abortion are now numbered," said Kate Michelman of the National Abortion Rights Action League.

Susan Low Bloch, a Georgetown University law professor, said she doubted whether the court would use the case to reverse Roe v. Wade because "the case doesn't require it."

"There are cases from Guam, Utah and Louisiana that will reach the court in which revisiting Roe will be unavoidable," she said. "I don't think the court wants to reach out unnecessarily in this case. The way review was granted confirms that intuition."

The Pennsylvania case will be argued in April with a decision expected by July — in time to make abortion a key issue in this year's presidential, congressional and state elections.

The court was asked in competing appeals from Pennsylvania officials and abortion clinic operators to say point blank whether Roe v. Wade remains the law of the land.

In its brief order Tuesday, the justices did not address the broad issue of a woman's constitutional right to abortion. Rather, it said merely that it would review provisions of the Pennsylvania law that require:

—Doctors to tell women seeking abortions about fetal development and alternatives to abortion.

—A 24-hour waiting period for abortions.

—Detailed recordkeeping by doctors, subject to public disclosure, of each abortion performed.

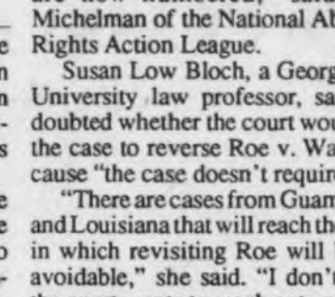
—Women required in most cases to notify their husbands of their plans for an abortion.

The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld most provisions of the law but struck down the section dealing with spousal notification. In its ruling, the appeals court said the justices had eroded the sweeping legal protection Roe v. Wade gave to women seeking abortions.

The Supreme Court in 1986 struck down, by a 5-4 vote, almost identical regulations imposed by Pennsylvania. But three members of that five-justice majority have since retired.

In 1989, the court allowed states to make it more difficult for women to obtain abortions, but stopped short of reversing the 1973 ruling.

As the justice acted Tuesday, dozens of pro-life protesters tried to block access to two downtown Washington abortion clinics while pro-choice activists escorted women to their appointments inside. Hundreds of the demonstrators were arrested.



A massive demonstration is expected outside the Supreme Court building today — the 19th anniversary of the Roe v. Wade ruling.

"The critical question for the court is whether the right to choose an abortion is a fundamental constitutional right," Kathryn Kolbert of the American Civil Liberties Union said.

▶ RUN ON POLISH BANK STARTS AFTER REPORTS ON OWNER'S LEGAL TROUBLES

WARSAW, Poland (AP) — Thousands of Poles have withdrawn savings since Saturday from one of Poland's first private banks following reports the bank's founder and majority stockholder is wanted for tax evasion in New York.

There was no confirmation that David Bogatin, majority stockholder of First Commercial Bank in Lublin, was fleeing possible prison sentences.

Bogatin has offered extra interest to those who keep their money on request.

▶ TOKYO OFFICIALS TRY TO MEND FENCES

TOKYO (AP) — The Japanese prime minister and a senior politician on Tuesday backed away from statements, made in the past few days, which have exacerbated tensions with the United States.

The prime minister said agreements made with President Bush about increased Japanese purchasing of U.S. autos were promises, not target figures as he suggested in a TV interview.

Committee rejects primary bill

Counties should be reimbursed if forced to have elections, Oleen says

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Collegian

A bill that would have squelched Kansas' April 7 presidential preference primaries was killed Tuesday in committee.

And if it had not been killed in committee, Gov. Joan Finney announced that morning that she would veto any such bill that came to her desk.

So the primaries survive, but there is still the sticky question of who is going to pay for them.

Last year, a bill was passed by the Kansas Legislature requiring every county to have a primary election before the November presidential election, but oddly, the bill to finance them was killed.

Since the state did not allocate funds, the counties would be forced to pay for the primaries by default, and the money would have to come from county budget cuts in other areas.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said she objects to forcing counties to have primaries without the state paying for them. That, she said, is why she introduced the primary squelching bill that was killed Tuesday in the Senate Elections Committee.

There is an alternative, however. In her recent State of the State address, Finney included a budget recommendation of $1.5 million to reimburse counties for the cost of primaries.

Depending on whether the Legislature supports Finney's recommendation, either the counties will have to trim their already lean budgets, or the state would have to come up with the reimbursement money.

Oleen said the Senate Ways and Means Committee will have hearings soon to decide whether or not to appropriate money to counties for primaries.

"The issue still isn't dead. I will speak to the committee," she said. "I will oppose the funding."

There is also a minuscule chance the committee will decide to pass a bill to kill the primaries, which Oleen said would please her.

In this event, Kansans will go back to selecting their presidential delegates through caucuses.

Although the same number of delegates will be chosen for each party's national convention through both processes, the means of choice are different.

Primaries are, literally, elections with secret voting booths. Registered Republicans can vote for delegates who support whichever Republican candidate they choose, and likewise for Democrats. Those with no political affiliation can vote in either election, but not both.

In a caucus system, the differences are that the voting is not secret, and there are several levels of selection.

The upper-level caucuses are not open to everyone. At the lowest level, a hand count is taken from an open forum meeting.

Delegates who support certain candidates try to convince voters their candidate is best through debate with other delegates and voters.

Oleen said there are no real differences in fairness between the two processes.

However, House Majority Tom Sawyer, D-Wichita, strongly disagreed and said caucuses are a narrow group of people limiting the candidates from which the voters can choose.

"Caucuses are extremely complicated. People don't understand the rules, the regrouping. People must commit many hours to participate," he said. "The only people who understand are party activists."

Sawyer said Kansas' last primary in 1980 supports his view. It garnered the highest turnout in Kansas history and increased voter registration that year.

"It's obvious the voters like the idea," he said. "That year, Ronald Reagan, Ted Kennedy and Jimmy Carter came here. Since then, no one has come here. Caucuses create no interest."

RECOGNITION

Cool invested nearly 50 years in K-State

VICKY SAENZ
Collegian

After being part of K-State for 50 years, Vincent Cool is retiring next month, but not without leaving a part of him in every building around campus.

For the past 10 years, he has worked as the associate director of facilities planning and University architect. Prior to that, Cool served as University architect, director of planning and assistant vice president for campus development.

Cool, whose retirement will go into effect Feb. 18, came to K-State for the first time in 1946. He later graduated with a bachelor's degree in science and architecture.

In his years here at K-State, Cool has seen quite a few changes.

"When I started here, the University had roughly 1 million square feet. Now we have 6 million square feet, including housing," Cool said.

Cool has personally worked with every building committee, developed programs for construction and worked closely with contractors.

"He makes sure he's working for the University's best interest, and that has always impressed me," said Jack Carlson, engineering technician for facilities planning.

As Cool recalls his years at K-State, he smiles. He adds how proud he is of the time he has worked here.

He emphasizes that K-State is not a second-rate university. Everyone should be pleased to be here, he said.

For the past 15 years, Cool has been involved with the $20-million expansion of Throckmorton Hall.

He said that the research going on in Throckmorton has a lot to do with the economic growth in the state of Kansas.

People tend to forget that K-State is a land-grant university, he said.

"We have three major responsibilities. First, to the education of the undergraduate students; second, the responsibility for doing the necessary research for the growth of the state the University is in; and third, to disseminate research information that has been gained to the community in Kansas," Cool said.

Carlson said the contributions Cool has made are significant. He said Cool has not only completed a lot of projects but has shown his concern in taking care of the public and keeping building construction within a budget.

"He accepts the responsibility that goes with it," Carlson said. "I think he really enjoys what he does."

Cool said he doesn't have set plans for the future.

"I've had a job for the last 50 years, I don't know what it's going to be like," he said

He said he still feels like a part of K-State and would like to be involved with it in any way he can.

He said he feels proud to have had the opportunity to work with every building committee of every college and many of the departments.

"It has been a tremendous opportunity to know and to admire the people that make up this University," he said.

Carlson said Cool's retirement will be hard after having him around for so many years.

"We're going to miss him considerably, especially all the knowledge and prestige that goes with him," Carlson said.

CONVOCATION LECTURE

Education can beat prejudice, panel says

SARA JAAX
Collegian

The multicultural education of children could improve understanding among all people.

Joanne Hurst, Kansas secretary on aging, said educating young children would be a significant step to improving understanding among the races.

Hurst, stating her personal opinion and not speaking in her public capacity, was one of four panelists who discussed a wide range of racial issues at the Pre-Convocation Forum Tuesday night at the K-State Union.

"If people can get excited about children — all children — we may become a multicultural society," Hurst said. "Educating our children would result in a win-win situation, even for those who are prejudiced."

Several K-State students in the audience said multicultural education can successfully continue at the college level if students would make the effort to communicate with their culturally diverse peers.

The panel also discussed employment opportunities for minorities, nonviolent protests in civil rights demonstrations, discrimination in the workplace and the social effects of affirmative action.

Panelist Steven Ramirez, Kansas Human Rights Commission education specialist, said awareness of employment discrimination has increased during the past year.

In 1991, the commission received 337 complaints about racial discrimination in employment and 336 complaints about sex discrimination in unemployment.

"If we are to maintain our competitive edge in the world marketplace, we must move beyond our prejudices," Hurst said.

Other panelists were David Procter, assistant professor of speech, and Krishna Tummala, professor of political science.

Arthur Fletcher, chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, will speak as a part of the 1991-92 Convocation Lecture Series at 10:30 a.m. Thursday in McCain Auditorium.

Fletcher is a 1950 Washburn University graduate. In 1954, while an elementary school teacher in Junction City, he helped raise money for the Brown vs. the Topeka Board of Education case.

During the early 1950s, Fletcher played football for the Los Angeles Rams, and he later played for the Baltimore Colts until an injury ended his sports career.

Since 1955, he has been involved in public service at the local, state and nationai levels, including serving as deputy assistant for urban affairs to President Gerald Ford from 1976 to 1977.

MARTIN LUTHER KING JR. WEEK

Legacy: Encourage student dreams

JILL HINSHAW
Collegian

More than 300 people gathered in Bluemont Hall Tuesday to honor Martin Luther King Jr. and his commitment to education.

The symposium, with its theme, "The Dream Lives On," was sponsored by the College of Education's Task Force on Diversity.

"Dr. King's philosophy to me is that we need to take time for an understanding of the other man and give him room to make mistakes, and in turn, he will do the same for us," said Bart Mann, junior in elementary education and one of four panelists at the symposium.

"Every day is a day of love, not hate — for understanding, not anger, and for peace, not war. This is a statement that we should have today as we think about King," Mann said.

Mann said these were things he wanted to bring into his own classroom as an elementary school teacher.

"We need to be role models to our students and examples of love," Mann said. "We need to do it."

Communication in the classroom can be a great tool in learning about native cultures and religions that many people know nothing about, Mann said.

"If we bring this into our classrooms, we can use this in all of our curriculums," he said.

Audrey Todd, graduate student in special education and a panel member, said everyone needs to roll up their sleeves and work together.

"We have work to do when you think about the many 'isms' that exist in our society, whether it be racism, sexism, ageism, handicapism or materialism," Todd said.

She said King's contributions have made her realize everyone must work to erase these stereotypes from society.

"Many have considered King a dreamer, but maybe I am a dreamer as well, and so are you — since you are attending this symposium," Todd said. "Dreams can be a reality, but it's up to

MULTICULTURAL AFFAIRS

Campaign sensitizes students to diversity

RICHARD ANDRADE
Collegian

The K-State Diversity Awareness Campaign is working to promote diversity throughout the campus community.

The campaign allows small teams made up of one faculty/staff and two student volunteers to visit various campus organizations and living groups and to present a custom-designed education session.

These sessions are scheduled to begin in February and will run through March.

"We want to provide an opportunity for all students to have exposure to diversity, and the only way we could possibly get a handle on that is by focusing on living groups," said Mordean Taylor-Archer, assistant dean for multicultural affairs and chairwoman of the committee.

The effort to promote diversity began to take shape when University President Jon Wefald created the Human Rights Education Commission in spring 1990.

It was recognized as a call to sensitize K-State to issues related to diversity. Taylor-Archer said an evolution has occurred since then, transforming the general hope for diversity into the tangible form of the Diversity Awareness Campaign.

"A lot of us come from small towns where everyone was the same," said Kim Harms, graduate student in student counseling and campaign volunteer.

"At college, you tend to stay with the same type of people. Students should learn to broaden their minds."

Sandra Coyner, women's studies program director and faculty volunteer, said the benefits of a broader mind reach farther than the boundaries of the K-State campus.

"I think all Kansans have a strong sense of fair play," Coyner said. "But if we're going to function in a national and international environment, we have to apply those values to a larger world. K-State students are eager to do that."

In its 1973 decision, the court for legalized abortion nationwide for the first time. Justice Harry Blackmun's opinion for a 7-2 court was based on a woman's constitutional right to privacy.

The court said a woman's decision to have an abortion during the first three months of pregnancy must be left to her and her doctor. It said states may impose certain regulations during the second trimester to protect the woman's health and may take steps to protect fetal life in the third trimester. State authority to regulate abortions after the first trimester was not made absolute, however.

After the court's 1989 decision giving states greater leeway to regulate abortions, Pennsylvania lawmakers wasted little time in re-enacting the law invalidated in 1986.

Other states, spurred into action, passed even more restrictive abortion laws.

LEGISLATIVE HOTLINE

EDITORIALS

Unchanged gas prices offer a welcome change

Usually, this time of year, this space would be filled with an editorial about the high price of gasoline and the unfair price changes that coincide as students return to Manhattan.

This semester is different.

It seems the great petroleum god in the sky has looked down upon this fair city and smiled with favor and fortune.

Throughout semester break, the average price of a gallon of regular unleaded cost about 98 cents. Remarkably, that price has remained constant, despite more than 10,000 new consumers driving their fuel-hungry automobiles into town.

During tight economic times like we currently face, it's awfully tempting to increase the price of products to bring in a few extra bucks. However, the gas stations and convenience stores of this community have buckled down and are riding this recession out like the rest of us.

K-State students appreciate the gesture, and whomever is responsible for this gift deserves a mighty big thank you.

Next time you want to complain about or question the Kansas Legislature, pick up the phone and take it straight to the horse's mouth.

Goodness knows as students and employees of K-State (as well as citizens of the state of Kansas), we have plenty to say.

Writing or calling your legislators has always been an option every month of the year, but during the legislative session, you have another option. And it's free.

The Legislative Reference Section of the Kansas State Library in Topeka is offering its legislative hotline once again.

Library assistants employed by the Legislature will man the phones from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday during the entire session, which began Jan. 13.

You can ask any questions — from who voted for what in role-call votes to the status of a bill you are following. You can also leave messages for legislators, which the library assistants will pass directly to the legislators' secretaries.

This number should be posted in big, bold letters in the homes and workplaces of everyone in Kansas. Let's make those lawmakers accountable. They are there for us, after all.

It's not often our state government gives its constituents something for free, especially when it's something so valuable.

One library assistant said the phones have been ringing off the hook since the hotline opened.

Here's hoping it only gets worse.

A copy is worth a thousand words

ERIC BECKER

I spent about an hour the other day in front of a copy machine photocopying "manuscript pages" in an effort to get the necessary evidence of my creative intentions together for graduate school applications. The machine hummed and presented the pages without effort — the same pages it had taken me hours to fill with words.

After about half an hour, I was talking to myself, and within minutes of that, I was carrying on a conversation with the machine itself. There was a polite robotic voice in its hum, speaking as sincerely as a high-school kid working in a fast-food joint, and saying "Here's your order, sir. Have a nice day."

I thanked the machine about as sincerely for each page it reproduced for me. Meantime, the copy counter filled up, and my checkbook throbbed desperately within the inside pocket of my jacket, next to my heart.

Glancing at them before turning them over, I stacked the pages face down on the edge of the machine as they came out. I was afraid to look — afraid that more than a glance might reveal a misspelled word, an incomplete sentence or a paragraph that simply needed more work than I had given it so far.

Not that there was anything particularly complete about the copy I was making. It wasn't ready for the scrutiny it was destined to undergo. The copy was a phase of my revision, but at that moment the work that was before me seemed insurmountable. I set it aside on the machine. There would be time to search out my misspellings later.

I felt especially alone there — not only alone in the work I knew was necessary — but alone in the copy center as well. It was late at night. A couple came in for a copy of one or two pages, but they stayed only a few minutes. Later, a woman came in to use the paper cutter, but she didn't stay long either. An employee buzzed about behind the counter, but was a distance away from my machine. It was a small wonder I started talking to myself and to the machine.

"Here's your order, sir. Have a nice day."

Then the ink ran out. The paper ran out. The pages ran out, and the night ran out, and all of my patience ran out. It was an endless hour in the copy center, and driven from my machine, I sought another to help me finish the work at hand.

It was done in an hour. A semester's worth of my own work had been reproduced in an hour. I was struck by how easily it had been accomplished. I thumbed through the pages, awed by the permanence and the security the machine had given my work with its reproductions. Over with, I was satisfied with what I'd done.

The satisfaction was intoxicating. I took my billfold from my back pocket, determined to immortalize more than that draft of my manuscript. I copied my driver's license, my student ID and my social security card. I was alone, but preserved, permanent. And permanent, there was time to complete the work that was ahead of me.

I took the bundle of papers to the counter and paid the employee for it.

"Here's your order, sir," she said. "Have a nice day."

Returning to my room with them, I discovered that my manuscript pages were more hopeless than I had thought. But I have begun a revision of them, nevertheless. As for the rest, it's in a pile on my dresser. It seemed like a good idea at the time. But at home, they seem to tie me more to time than to timelessness. I'll throw it out or file it all sometime, I suppose. But not now. I've got deadlines to observe and not a moment to lose.

Unfortunately, it does matter if you're black or white

CARLA JONES

I'm the proud daughter of two bigots. I'm not proud they're bigots. I'm not really proud I'm their daughter. I am proud I have broken the chain of bigotry. It is like a chain of sexual abuse or alcoholism. It continues until someone breaks the behavior patterns and heals the dysfunction.

I went to see "Jungle Fever" this weekend, and I had one of those deep conversations with someone I've been involved with for six months.

I thought "Jungle Fever" was a good movie, but I hated it. I hated what it said about the chances for people like my parents to ever reform, and I hated that Spike Lee left no real out for interracial relationships to actually work.

I understand there is strong racism in the United States. I've been faced with some of it by being called names like "Mud Shark" for dating men several shades darker than myself. But I don't think that is the only view in the world, and I certainly don't think it's the one.

In our parents' generations, issues were broken down into color. Civil rights came with conditions. In the 1990s, we find ourselves faced with much more important issues than, "Will the property value of the neighborhood drop because that colored family moved in down the street?"

Will the neighborhood even be there in 20 years? There is no more Soviet Union or Communist threat.

Will the United States suffer an economic collapse before the year 2000? Will our planet survive long enough for our children to "inherit the Earth" of our time?

I found "Jungle Fever" disturbing, because I had never thought of my relationship as "an attraction due to illness." I found myself really questioning my own motives for this six-month relationship. Was it a black and white issue, or was I really attracted to this other human being? That is what the deep conversation was about.

I had color barriers of my own at one time — before my divorce. When I got a divorce, I realized things don't necessarily work out, even with a nice "white boy" my parents liked. The fundamental issues of relationships are what more important: "Can you live with this person? Do you love him or her? Do you have similar interests and goals? Will you be monogamous, and do you want to grow old with this person?" It's not, "What color will our children be?" and, "What will the neighbors think?" Screw the neighbors.

My mother's favorite argument against interracial relationships is, "What about the children?"

My response is, "As long as they have two parents who love them, and they know they are loved, who cares about the rest?"

If I can give unconditional love to my children, they will be way ahead of me — I have been temporarily disowned for my beliefs and choices.

I am the black sheep of the family. Color doesn't matter a damn bit. We will all end up with someone of a different color. The pigment in our skin is never the same. The spectrum of "white" is just as broad as the spectrum of "black." If whites are supposed to hate blacks so much, then why are so many whites tanning on beaches during the summer and fake-baking during the winter?

I don't care if my children are spotted or striped, as long as they are healthy and loved. Like my parents, I hope I can give my children what they have always wanted for me — a better life than mine. For me, that means a life with less prejudice and discrimination, and more understanding and love.

When the day is through and the lights are out, ask yourself three important questions. Do I love myself? Do I love who I am with? Can I live with the choices I have made?

I am reminded of Dr. Seuss's Sneeches without and Sneeches with Stars Upon Thars. They eventually realized they are all just Sneeches. We are all just human beings.

New fraternity coming to campus

AMY COX
Collegian

The Interfraternity Council will soon select a fraternity to add to the 24 chapters already at K-State.

The fraternity will be selected this semester and added in fall 1992.

The IFC considered seven chapters before narrowing it down to three after reviewing their programs, financial information and national reputation.

Of the three, Delta Chi was selected to visit K-State Feb. 17 and present an extensive presentation to the IFC.

Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser, said only one fraternity was selected to give a presentation because it is expensive to have the fraternity's national headquarters make travel and lodging arrangements.

"Delta Chi was so clearly No. 1 in terms of local alumni, programs and services, and financial reserves available for housing," Robel said.

"With housing so expensive, that is a big plus. We didn't want to put the costs to other fraternities with Delta Chi so far ahead."

IFC, the campus governing board for K-State fraternity presidents, will vote after the presentation on whether to accept Delta Chi as a colony. If accepted, Delta Chi will be a colony until it receives its charter from the national chapter.

"The national chapter looks at whether the colony knows and upholds the principles of Delta Chi and is succeeding in chapter membership before granting the charter," said Steve Bossart, national director of new chapter development for Delta Chi.

If selected, it will be a return appearance for Delta Chi. It was a chapter at K-State from 1964 to 1976.

Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement, said a period of declining membership resulted in a decision by the national headquarters to close the fraternity.

"That was a time of overall declining student enrollment, and the decision was made to close the fraternity for financial reasons," Bosco said.

Its national chapter remained strong, however, and Dennis O'Keefe, IFC president and senior in journalism and mass communications, said that is why Delta Chi was selected as the finalist.

Delta Chi has a 92-percent success rate in colonies receiving charters and has had 63 expansions to U.S. colleges in the past eight years, he said. It also has a $1-million budget.

The University has not added a fraternity since 1976, and Bossart said he thinks Delta Chi is capable of successful chapter membership at K-State.

"We think it is time. We have been in contact with Barb Robel since 1981 about colonizing at K-State. It's a fine greek school with outstanding academics to be a part of," he said.

O'Keefe said Delta Chi's interest in K-State was also a factor in the council's decision.

"It encourages them to be aggressive in their rush activities," he said.

Robel said fraternities comprise 19-20 percent of the University's undergraduate student population.

Rush is year-round for fraternities, she said, but summers are their busiest recruiting times. Summer pledge figures have been steadily increasing from 411 in 1986 to 476 in 1991.

"Adding another fraternity helps maintain a healthy greek system, and new blood is good for competition," she said.

you."

Gerald Hanna, professor of education and education psychology, spoke about the issue of today's "us-isms" and "they-isms."

"We're in a culture that is less burdened with 'us-isms' and 'they-isms,'" Hanna said.

These two "isms" seem to capture all of the other "isms," he said.

"I hope today, and every day, we celebrate the commitment of Martin Luther King Jr. and other freedom advocates to making dreams a reality for everyone — no matter who they are, no matter where they live, no matter what color their skin or eyes, or how rich or poor they are," said Linda Thurston, associate professor of special education and symposium panelist.

"King's legacy reflected on many before him and many after him, and his legacy says that we should let our children dream and let the educators help them realize those dreams," Thurston said. "It's my wish that we'll celebrate our dreams every day."

Primaries

Oleen said the main reason she opposes having a primary this year is the cost.

She said caucuses would be cheaper and financed by each party, rather than by the state or counties.

"If we weren't going to fund it, we had no business passing it," she said. "I would look at it much more differently if the Legislature had funded it."

Oleen said she thought the money would be better spent elsewhere.

But Sawyer said elections are necessary in a democracy.

"If elections are too expensive to hold, let's go every eight years or elect a mayor for a term until he dies," he said.

"Why hold elections at all? If you had a dictatorship, you wouldn't have to worry about elections. When you have a democratic republic like we have, you've got to have elections. It's the price you have to pay."

Oleen said her bill had bipartisan support, but she and Sawyer agreed that the issue is still rather partisan.

Sawyer said he thinks Republicans prefer to limit access, whereas Democrats believe more participation is better.

"The people who vote now are higher educated, more affluent," he said. "If you open up elections, you get more working class people who wouldn't vote Republican.

"They're protecting their incumbency because they may not get re-elected."

Skiing: Details on trails and aching tails

The Three-Day Approach to Conquering the Mountains

Day one: I knew I wasn't in Kansas anymore when I stepped off the bus into the crisp, chilly climate. While trying to balance my skis, poles and ski boots, I scanned the panoramic view of massive mountains striking a picturesque pose against the cloudless, azure sky.

Nestled at the base of the mountain was a conglomerate of sight and sounds with the commotion of skiers, wearing brilliant multicolored skiwear and gigantic galactica boots, strolling in all directions. Sounds of amplified music and smells of warm food and beverages permeated the high-altitude atmosphere. The hustle-bustle and liveliness of the complex was missing only a few merry elves.

Wearing my leg-encasing boots, I felt like some stomping creature out of "Star Wars." My first adventure, even before putting on my skis, was to accomplish the basic task of walking down steps. When jumping down them didn't work too well, I contemplated just sliding down the railing.

As I stared at the sculptured slope, abundant, adept skiers were zig-zagging downhill seemingly effortlessly. That thought quickly diminished as I learned how to put on my skis while holding onto my poles, gloves and ski school enrollment card. (I escaped from college to be in school once again as one of about 500 skiers each day that participated in the Winter Park resort ski school.)

It was amazing to be learning a new sport that teaches you fall and get up. It didn't seem too difficult. By the end of the three-hour lesson, our group had very cautiously attempted to ski the easiest path down the mountain. It was a sense of accomplishment to still have two skis on and be at the bottom in one piece.

Day two: After my first-time ski lessons, I was confident in getting up from the snow after my variations of falls and wipeouts, but the mountain still seemed a bit imposing. I had almost mastered the wedge, or snow-plow stop. I was lucky to get an instructor with ample patience while I skidded, slid and cursed down the moderate slopes.

The thrill of zooming down the trail was exhilarating, but I was still wrestling with the concepts of speed vs. controlled speed. Falling still seemed to be the fastest way to stop. When my ski tips crossed and I landed in a snow bank on a narrow trail, I realized that the snow on the sides, near the prickly pines was softer than the packed snow on the trails. Having an instructor was a plus when I needed help getting out from the snow bank.

Day three: Today I was free from class, and my friends and I were in search of new adventurous trails. (At my level, this still translated into the friendly sounding green trails.) While our adventure began on the green trails, we ended up on the brink of a blue trail. The three accustomed skiers in the group convinced two other fellows, just graduated ski-schoolers and myself, that the blue path wasn't much harder than a green one.

Halfway down the steep slope, I was beginning to doubt their assumption. I knew they were wrong by the time I was hugging a tree, one friend was falling on the same corners I had, and the other level-3 skier was stuck in the net sign with the caution "SLOW" warning on it.

Nevertheless, all the falls added to my skill in getting up from the snow. The rush of adrenaline was an even better high than looking down from the top of the mountain.

LADY CATS BASKETBALL

Late flurry falls short, Nebraska wins

NU's Jennings pounds Lady Cats inside for 48 points

KRIS YOUNG
Collegian

The Lady Cats came within 5 points of giving conference leader Nebraska an "L" on their Big Eight score card.

They virtually stopped the Huskers by keeping three of their starters to less than 10 points. One player, however, made up for lost baskets and exploded for a career high.

When Coach Susan Yow talked about the 87-82 loss Tuesday night, she spoke in brief about the Husker team and at length about Lady Husker forward, Karen Jennings.

Karen Jennings, all-America candidate and Olympic festival player, grabbed 16 boards and dropped 48 points, just three shy of the Big Eight record.

"She played up to her billing. She possesses a great deal of poise on the court," Yow said. "We knew she'd be the key of the ballgame for them."

Jennings was hardly a secret weapon coming into the competition.

"You can look at our scouting report, and when it says, 'The strength of their team,' it just says, 'Jennings-oriented,'" Yow said.

With 6:23 left in the half, K-State was down by 18, 77-59.

At that point, K-State was able to slow Jennings down and begin to reduce the margin.

The Lady Cats went on to score the next 10 points to cut the lead to 8 points with 4:47 on the clock.

Scoring went back and forth fairly equally for the next four minutes. Then Pam Stoltz scored from underneath to bring K-State within 3 points with only 10 seconds to go.

On the in-bounds play, the Huskers got the ball to Jennings, and she was fouled with six seconds left.

Jennings seemed to be the player to foul — she had added only 6 points in the last six minutes. She sunk both charities, and the buzzer sounded as a final try by K-State at a 3-pointer missed the mark.

"I don't know that I could've asked much more of our team," Yow said. "Obviously, we have to do a better job next time we play them, to contain Karen."

Everyone contributed to the Lady Cat's effort. Four of the seven Lady Cat scorers posted 10 points or more on the board with Mary Jo Miller scoring a team-high 25.

Miller said she was a little disappointed with the outcome and the team's efforts to contain Jennings.

"It gets pretty tough when you work so hard and come up just a little bit short," Miller said.

"We tried double-teaming her, and she still put up shots. She had moves I hadn't seen in a while."

Jennings or not, Yow promises her team will be ready when they meet again Feb. 8 in Lincoln.

"We just played the No. 1 team in the league to a 5-point ball game. I think the thing we have to keep doing is just stay focused and take it a game at a time."

CATS BASKETBALL

Southern Utah next foe for reeling Cats squad

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

A team experiencing as many downs as ups lately can't afford to look past an opponent — any opponent.

That's the message K-State coach Dana Altman has been imparting to his players early this week, with a non-conference tilt against Southern Utah on the immediate horizon.

The battle with the Thunderbirds, scheduled for a 7:35 tip tonight in Bramlage Coliseum, is a key one for the Cats, Altman concedes.

And he's made sure his players are getting the message.

"I hope our players don't look past tomorrow night's game, because if they do, it'll slap them right in the face," Altman said Tuesday of the matchup with Southern Utah, which is 11-4 on the year and owns impressive road wins at Evansville and Illinois State.

Right now, K-State, 8-5, needs a solid performance in a game to bolster some obviously sagging spirits.

After running off four wins in their first five games to open the year, the Cats are playing .500 ball — 4-4 — in the last eight outings. And among the four wins, only one — a 71-65 road triumph at Wyoming — could be considered a "quality" win.

But even against the Cowboys, Ski Jones had to pour in 35 points to get the Cats the "W."

And, as most of the basketball followers in these parts know, unless they've been living in a cave, Altman's crew is coming off arguably its weakest performance of the year, a 117-76 spanking against Oklahoma Saturday in Bramlage.

If vengeance was the law, the Thunderbirds could be in for a long Wednesday night. But this is a Southern Utah team that is a whole lot better than the 1988-89 and 1989-90 units that K-State soundly thumped, Altman said.

"It doesn't take a Rhodes Scholar to tell they've played some really good people," Altman said of Southern Utah, which has faced Big Eight foe Nebraska and 24th-ranked Stanford previously.

Against the Cardinals in Palo Alto, Calif., Southern Utah was in the game most of the way before Stanford pulled away down the stretch to get the 89-71 win.

Since that loss to the Cardinals, however, Southern Utah has run off three straight wins over Fort Lewis, San Diego State and Cal-Northridge. And the wins have come by an average margin of just more than 20 points an outing.

With games against K-State and Texas-El Paso still on the schedule, the T-Birds are holding out hopes for a possible postseason tourney trip.

"They're a contender for an NCAA berth or an NIT berth," Altman said. "They've got a good basketball team."

Southern Utah's 11-4 start is the best for the school since a move to the Division I ranks four years ago. The Thunderbirds are led on the floor by a pair of talented forwards, Davor Marcelic and Dana Achtzehn.

Marcelic is averaging 23.7 points a game, and Achtzehn is tossing in 21.9 points an outing. One or the other has led the T-Birds in scoring in every game this season, and both are among the nation's Top 30 scorers.

INSIDE STUFF

Altman battles to keep his team's morale up for Big Eight stretch drive

PATRICK OBLEY
Collegian

When the season began, Cat coach Dana Altman, without knowing what kind of team he had, had his and his team's hopes set high.

There were hopes first of a winning season and a successful run in the NCAA tournament in March. Then came the crushing setback at Lamar, 116-75.

Next was the hope of competing with the Big Eight conference elite.

Then came the gruesome massacre at Oklahoma State and the pounding at home against Oklahoma.

Now it seems, all there is is hope against hope. Hope that the conference stretch ahead yields no embarrassing gullies or ravines.

What's wrong with the Cats? The team isn't sure. Bone-jarring losses offer little in the way of righting a listing ship or building confidence.

Is there something wrong with the coach? Altman says he asks that question himself.

"Coaching is getting a team to do what you want them to do," Altman said Tuesday. "That's whether it's a last-second play or in the first five minutes in the game.

"We haven't done that. We've got to find some plan where we get the job done in the ball game."

Altman added a candid revelation.

"For whatever reason, we're having a hard time getting this team to do what we want them to do.

"I'm disappointed we haven't come along as a basketball team," Altman said.

Some of the blame could be put on the lack of a team leader, Altman said.

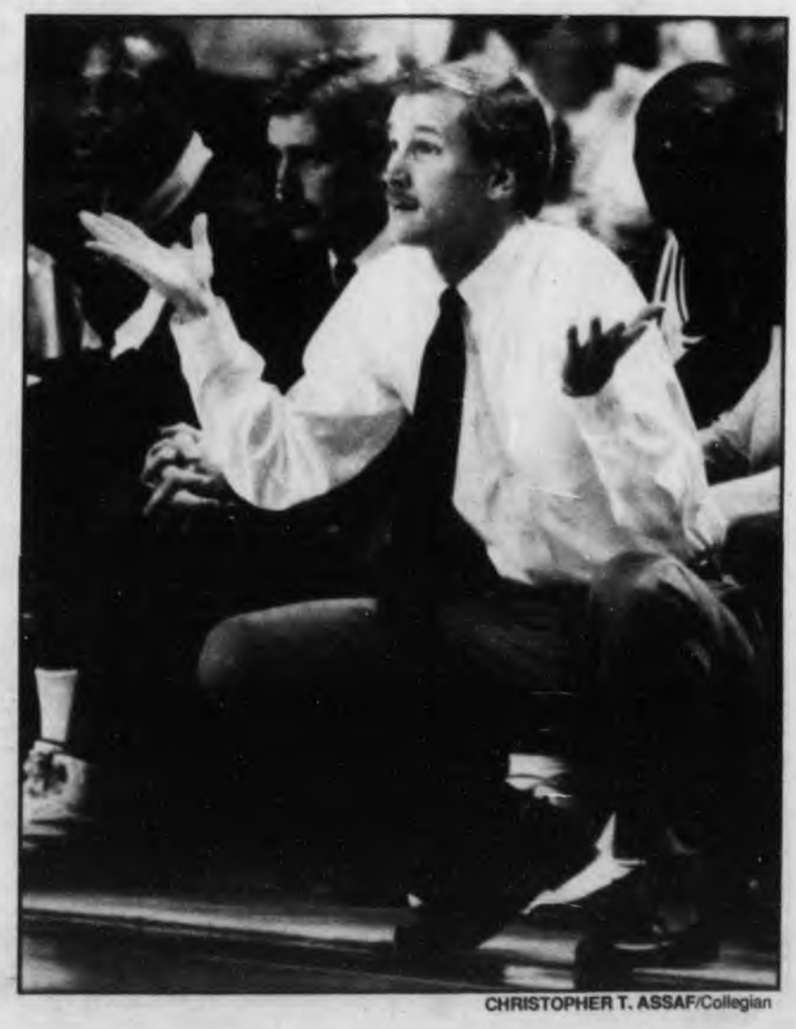
Altman said he believes there are people on the team with the capacity to fill such a role.

"I think people on this team are capable of leading more than they've shown," Altman said. "I think we have some players who are just a little bit scared with what's going on here."

Despite the lack of leadership, Altman believes the current crop of Cats may be the most athletic group ever to play at K-State, and that if there can't be leadership, there can be strong team play and execution. But as of yet, that hasn't happened.

There are innumerable instances where a run was squelched by poor shot selection and bad passes. Instances where a potential comeback was ruined by poor ball handling.

All of this defies Altman's sense of logic. The team does well in practice, but all that talent doesn't show up for tipoff.



"I don't know what happens to this team at the start of a game," Altman said. "We seem to lose what we've worked on all week in practice."

After Saturday's stunner, players repeatedly uttered the phrase, "It's gut-check time," and they are probably right. The remaining Big Eight schedule includes road games at Kansas, Missouri, Iowa State, Nebraska and Oklahoma.

Altman, knowing K-State supporters are beginning to doubt his coaching ability and acknowledge his team is playing scared, remains optimistic.

"I think we have the talent and players wanting to come back and fight," Altman said. "We have some players who have lost confidence and are a little discouraged, but their will to win is still there.

"I still think we can get it done."

CHRISTOPHER T. ASSAF/Collegian

Altman continues to believe in his team's ability to pull itself together.

FACULTY SENATE

New secondary major created

KRISTEN TURNER
Collegian

The Faculty Senate passed a bill Tuesday to create a secondary major in natural resources and environmental science.

The secondary major was approved by the colleges of Agriculture, Arts and Sciences, and Engineering.

The bill passed by a vote of 36-27.

Many senators said the natural resources and environmental science secondary major is a breakthrough in the field of environmental studies for K-State.

Prior to voting, Marion Gray, professor in history, said he was pleased to see the protection of the environment and environmental sciences addressed, but he also said he believed there would be an overemphasis on the natural and applied sciences.

Gray also said he feared a lack of emphasis on the philosophical, humanities and social science backgrounds needed for the secondary major to be a well-rounded and more substantive program.

In response, James Koelliker, professor in civil engineering, said the bachelor's degree received with a secondary major in natural resources and environmental science is not in lieu of any other programs and follows the same regulations as other departments.

The question of whether or not the secondary major program would fall under the Kansas Board of Regents moratorium on new programs was asked, but Kenneth Klabunde, professor in chemistry, said the moratorium should not preclude the development of this program.

ABORTION

This Roe anniversary may be the last

HEATHER RESZ

To commemorate the 19th anniversary of the landmark federal decision legalizing abortion, many local, state and national events are planned today by both pro-choice and pro-life groups.

Proponents of the Roe v. Wade decision are planning events to celebrate women's fight for reproductive freedom, while groups that favor a reversal of the decision will spend the day mourning the children who died because abortion is legal.

The Flint Hills Coalition for Choice is sponsoring a vigil at 7 tonight at the Riley County Courthouse for the anniversary of the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision.

The purpose of the vigil is to commemorate the women who died because they had no choice, said Justine Crawforth, sophomore in business administration and president of Voices for Choice.

"We're also paying tribute to the women who have continued to fight for reproductive freedom," she said.

Bells will be rung throughout the program, symbolizing that one woman dies from an illegal abortion every three minutes, Crawforth said.

However, Amy Heffern, freshman in engineering undecided and member of Students for Life, said the organization believes an abortion is the taking of a life.

"If you take into consideration that every baby is a life, every abortion is life threatening — legal or not," Heffern said.

Heffern said Students for Life has chosen to concentrate more on the anniversary by taking part in national and regional events rather than countering events put on by local organizations.

Two members of Students for Life, Matt Vajnar, senior in agribusiness, and Eric Gometz, freshman in computer engineering, are in Washington, D.C., attending a rally to support a reversal of the Roe v. Wade decision.

If the Supreme Court ever overturns the decision, it would make determination of abortion's legality the responsibility of each state.

Thursday, January 23, 8 p.m.
Start the semester with a concert by a British ensemble that's as hip as The Who and as bold as The Beatles. These Brits hail from Newcastle upon Tyne and win awesome reviews for their concerts and their recordings. Headlining the evening is violinist Young Uck Kim in Mozart's A-major concerto. Rounding out the concert are a Sinfonia by J. C. Bach, Haydn's "Fire" Sympony, and David Matthews' Capriccio for Two Horns and Orchestra. Aussie hornist-turned-conductor Barry Tuckwell leads the band.

The Kansas Legislature is now looking at two possible bills to regulate abortions.

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, said one of the two bills would require parental notification, and the other bill would prevent or restrict third-trimester abortions.

"Ninety-one percent of Kansas minors do have their parents' consent, not just notification," Hochhauser said.

Hochhauser's voting record is pro-choice, but she said third-trimester abortions are feasible only in certain situations.

"I asked my doctor about third-trimester abortions, and he said there are some serious fetal abnormalities that are not detectable until the third trimester," Hochhauser said.

"If the bill is written in a way that still provides women in these rare cases with the ability to get an abortion in the third trimester, then I would support it."

It was the response to the call for volunteers that produced the initial excitement for the project coordinators.

"We have really had significant interest in the campaign, which shows that people really care about diversity at K-State," Susan Scott, assistant dean of student life, said.

Scott and Andy Cordero, director of minority engineering, are chairmen of the student campaign.

Scott said they are still looking for interested volunteers for the project who can attend a training session Feb. 1.

Everyone involved with the Diversity Awareness Campaign is quick to stress that this project is only the first forward step on a long road.

Bush promises $645 million in economic aid

Other countries follow with offers of more assistance

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — President Bush pledged $645 million in new U.S. aid Wednesday to the beleaguered former Soviet Union struggling to make the leap from communism to democracy and free-market economies.

Bush's unexpected gesture at a 47-nation conference on emergency relief could inspire others to increase their own contributions, though Secretary of State James Baker said there wouldn't be a bidding contest.

Several governments participating in the conference came forward later in the day with offers of new assistance, said U.S. officials who spoke on condition of anonymity. The prospective donors and amounts weren't disclosed.

At a luncheon, Baker singled out oil-rich Saudi Arabia, Australia and New Zealand for private consultations.

Meanwhile, U.S. sources disclosed that Richard Armitage, a veteran Pentagon and State Department official who most recently negotiated a military bases agreement with the Philippines, would be named coordinator of the American aid program.

Appointment of the internationally known Armitage was seen as part of the U.S. effort to underscore its commitment to the relief effort.

The United States "cannot and will not falter at the moment that these new states are struggling to embrace the very ideals that America was founded to foster and preserve," Bush said in opening the conference.

His aid proposal, which must be approved by Congress, marked a shift in emphasis, because the new aid would not have to be repaid. The United States, Bush said, has pledged more than $5 billion in various forms of assistance, mostly agricultural credits that will benefit U.S. farmers.

"Let us join together to give these people a reason to hope," Bush said at the opening of the two-day summit.

The bulk of the new aid would be used to set up a $500-million account for humanitarian assistance. Another $25 million would buy badly needed pharmaceuticals, and $20 million would help farmers become private entrepreneurs after more than a half-century of communism. Money will also go to technical assistance and development projects.

ECONOMY

Businesses, banks complain about sluggish season

ASSOCIATED PRESS

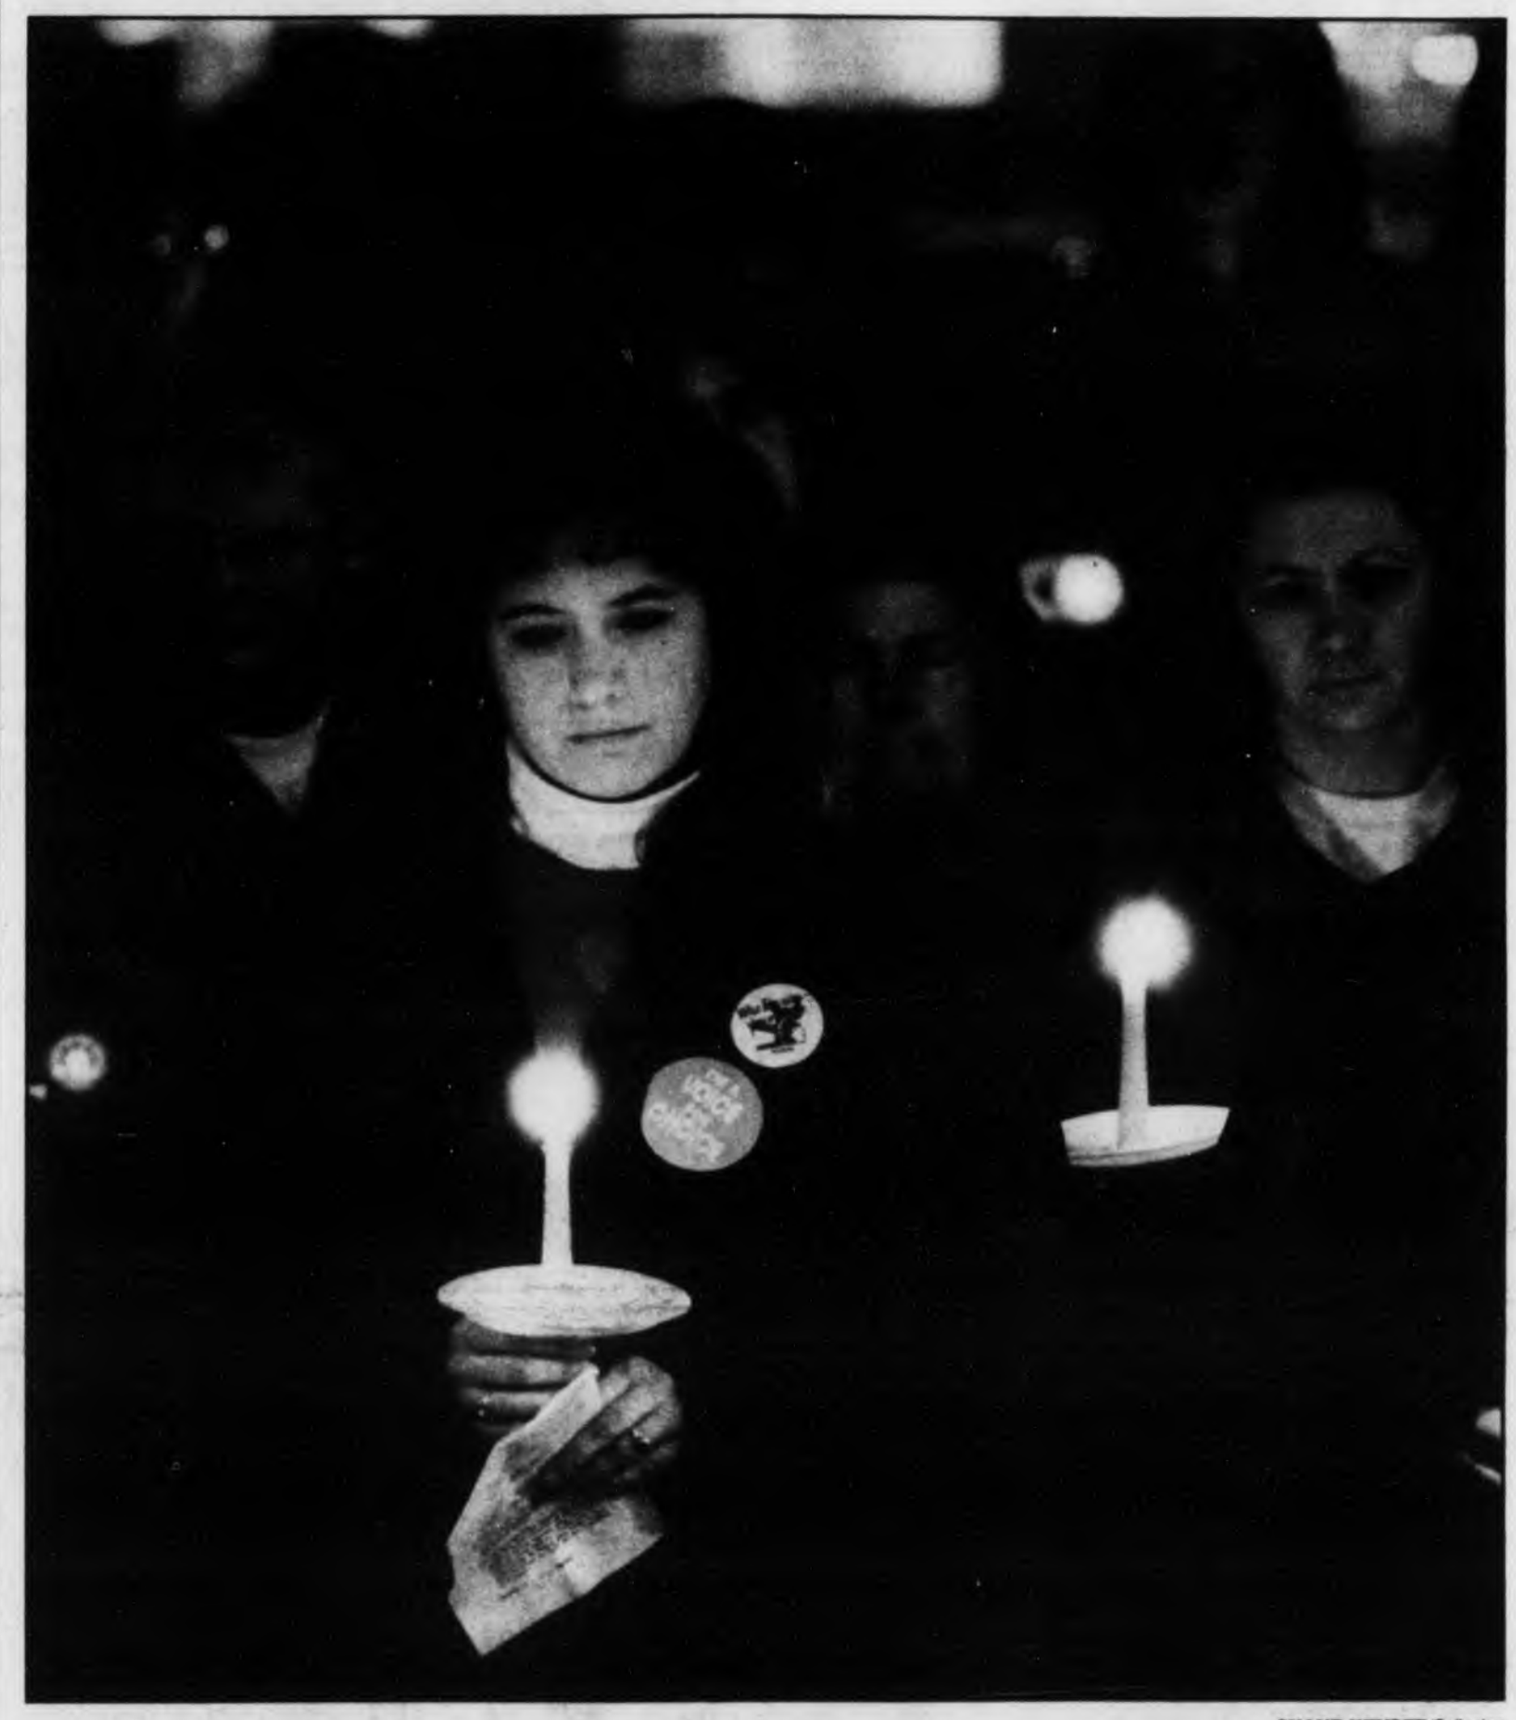
WASHINGTON — Economic weakness pervaded virtually every part of the country as the new year began with retailers, factory owners and bankers all complaining about the sluggish state of business activity, the Federal Reserve said Wednesday.

The Fed's latest survey of business conditions depicted an economy mired in stagnation with little suggestion of a rebound outside of some modest gains in housing sales.

"Activity was lackluster as the year drew to a close," the central bank said in a survey compiled from reports from its 12 regional banks.

The Fed did hold out the prospect of better days ahead, noting that "business and banking contacts generally anticipate that economic conditions will improve by mid-year."

But for now, the survey noted production cutbacks in a number of industries in the face of falling demand, an overhang of unsold goods at many retail stores following a disappointing Christmas season and little demand for new loans at banks outside of a rush to refinance old mortgages.



One of the few bright spots in the Fed survey was a slight upturn in housing sales and construction activity in many parts of the country in December as first-time home buyers have been lured into the market by the lowest mortgage rates in nearly two decades.

The report said that St. Louis, Kansas City, Dallas and Atlanta all detected some improvement in single-family construction, with bankers in Philadelphia, Cleveland and Kansas City forecasting healthy gains in sales during the peak spring sales season.

That view seemed to be bolstered by a separate report Wednesday that showed new construction of homes and apartments jumped 2.6 percent in December to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.103 million units, the fastest pace in 13 months. Building permit applications, often a good sign of future activity, improved even more in December, rising by 5.8 percent.

Housing is the sector of the economy most sensitive to changes in interest rates and often helps lead the country out of recession.

Robert Reischauer, director of the Congressional Budget Office, issued a new forecast Wednesday predicting that the economy, after suffering a drop in output in the fourth quarter, will gradually strengthen throughout 1992. He cautioned lawmakers against enacting anti-recession tax cuts that would cause long-run damage by widening the federal deficit.

Voices commemorate decision

STEPHANIE FUQUA
Collegian

A few tears were shed and voices rang out in song as men and women commemorated the 19th anniversary of Roe v. Wade at the Riley County Courthouse Plaza Wednesday night.

Approximately 100 people, including some from the Flint Hills Coalition for Choice, Voices for Choice and the National Organization for Women, gathered to listen to speakers and remember the landmark 1973 Supreme Court decision that made abortion legal in the United States.

"I'm here because I believe that choice is essential," said the Rev. Susan Sawyer of the American Baptist Campus Ministry at K-State. "I am not pro-abortion. I don't think anyone is. No woman is happy with making the decision to have an abortion.

"It is a difficult and painful decision. But women must have the freedom to make that decision," she said.

The Flint Hills Coalition sponsored the vigil for many reasons, said Jennifer Crawforth, member of the Coalition.

"We wanted to commemorate the women who had no choice in the past. We know that there are women in Manhattan who have lived through the times when there were no legal abortions. We wanted to give women a chance to think about that time period," Crawforth said.

A substantial number of men were present at the ceremony, ranging in age from teenagers to men in their 60s.

"We feel that this issue concerns men as equally as women," Joe Leff, senior in English, said. "We want to show our support."

Stephen Sink, senior in English, agreed, but said he was there for a different reason.

"In a majority of the cases, it is the men that are making the laws. I am undecided about whether I am pro-choice, but I wanted to come to see both sides of the issue," Sink said.

Age was no barrier as older men said they felt much the same way.

"Abortion is a pretty fundamental issue, and I personally find it very difficult to understand how people can take a position that is responsible for forcing women to have a child that they don't want or can't take care of. You bet I'm pro-choice," said Charlie Perkins of Manhattan.

David Verschelden, also from Manhattan, offered a different perspective.

"I have been through the abortion experience with women I have been

KANSAS LEGISLATURE

The Kansas Legislature has begun its 1992 session. As in the past couple of years, Kansas State students have a lot to gain or lose during this session in such areas as University funding, state income taxes and health care.

How our local legislators perform during the next few months could have an enormous effect on your lives while you are at Kansas State and after you leave.

For this reason, the Collegian is presenting profiles on our two area representatives and our area senator.

SEN. LANA OLEEN

Although Lana Oleen did not originally plan on running for the Kansas Senate, her plans changed after friends encouraged her to seek a vacant position.

Oleen, R-Manhattan, said because of her background of volunteering, she decided to run, and was subsequently elected.

Oleen was formerly a public school teacher

Hunters feel drag of state bureaucracy

RICHARD ANDRADE
Collegian

Jim Auld and Tobie Tyler are getting a first-hand account of how slow the state bureaucratic wheels can turn, especially when the changes pertain to the physically disabled.

For the past several months, the two men, both confined to wheelchairs, have been campaigning to change a state regulation that prohibits them from hunting using a special motorized cart.

The regulation originally intended to prohibit shooting from vehicles such as trucks, bars motorized vehicles from some Kansas public lands, mainly hunting areas.

"We're making some headway," Auld said. "Definitely part of the laws will be changed. Right now, it's just too confusing."

It is Auld's vehicle, a custom-designed motorized cart, that falls on the wrong side of the current regulation.

Auld describes the modifying of the vehicle as a continuing "experimental process," noting that it has evolved from an unadorned cart to a veritable chariot complete with new wheels, camouflage, cover and heater.

"It looks like a roving brush pile," Auld joked.

Auld and Tyler's fight began with a petition they circulated to gather support for their cause, a petition that now has about 650 signatures and is ready to be presented to the Kansas Fish and Game Commission.

"I want to give it to the officials soon — hand it to them face-to-face and not through a letter," Tyler said.

Todd Graeff, director of the Kansas Parks and Public Lands Division, said the agency is sensitive to the problem experienced by Auld and Tyler.

"The issue we're describing here is something the agency needs to address," he said. "We have the responsibility to provide handicapped people with a reasonable amount of access."

Still, Graeff describes the problem as a balancing act between the good of a few and the good of the many.

He said Kansas has the least amount of public land of any state in the nation — only six-tenths of 1 percent of all landmass — and the amount of hunting on it is extreme.

Graeff also said he is concerned that opening the lands to vehicles would ruin the already meager amount of solitary backwoods areas available.

Still, Auld and Tyler's plight seems to be gaining momentum as time passes.

Auld said U.S. Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Kan., office was working on the problem along with state Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, and a liaison from the governor's office.

"We were hoping to do something local first before causing a big stir," Auld said. "But I wouldn't mind causing a stir."

The pair have also considered approaching other groups who would benefit from the regulation change.

"Jim and I have thought about phoning the American Legion, because a lot of them are disabled due to war injuries," Tyler said.

Tyler was a police officer in Brookfield, Wis., in 1982, and he was shot while raiding a drug deal.

While they have been waiting for the red tape to untangle, Auld and Tyler have managed to get a small amount of hunting in, a chance also for them to work the bugs out of the cart.

"It doesn't go very fast, but it gets me there," Auld said. "We haven't been able to use it a lot because of the rain. It's not a mud-mobile."

Both men said they remain patient and expect the legislation change to come relatively soon, although they know what kind of system they are up against.

"Because I worked 20 years for a city, I know that change is not fast," Tyler said. "I hope before 1992 is over, we'll be clear."

Women never knew dangers

ULRIKE DAUER

Many of the 2 million American women who have had breast implants have reason to believe they endangered their health to improve their self-image and profile in society.

In addition, many women were never told about the negative consequences the silicone-filled breast implants could have, said Sandra Coyner, director of women's studies.

Women could not make an informed decision for or against the plastic surgery, she said, because no accurate, complete information was available.

Coyner said evidence shows a great deal of information has been withheld until recently.

On Jan. 6, Food and Drug Administration Commissioner Dr. David Kessler asked physicians to suspend the further use of breast implants until safe data is available.

Currently, an independent advisory panel is reviewing the safety and effectiveness of silicone-filled breast implants.

A final decision on the panel's approval and the removal of the moratorium will be based on the panel's results, according to a hotline established by the Division of Consumer Affairs in the FDA's Rockville, Md., headquarters.

A decision is expected in 45-60 days.

Silicone breast implants, which have been around for 10-20 years, are used in two ways, said Laurie Menkhus, registered nurse with the Riley County Health Department.

She said either a silicone-gel-filled bag surrounded by another bag filled with sterile saline solution or distilled water is implanted (double-lumen type), or a silicone-gel filled bag is implanted directly into the tissue.

In other implants, the saline solution surrounding the silicone bag is replaced by a spongy, smooth or textured outer coating.

Menkhus said one of the main problems with breast implants is implant ruptures. Silicone leaking into the chest cavity and the lymph can cause problems for the immune system — problems like rheumatoid arthritis, deformities of the breast and even cancer.

She said silicone harms the tissue, but it is difficult to remove it completely once it pervades the tissue.

Studies have shown the silicone bags are not absolutely tight. There is always a little leakage into the tissue.

Another problem, Menkhus said, is that three out of four women with implants underneath the fatty portion of the breast tissue develop a painful, hardened breast.

Implants underneath the breast muscle, however, lead to hardening in only one of 10 patients, but fewer surgeons can carry out this difficult operation.

Insecticide barrels remain buried near Manhattan airport

HEATHER RESZ
Collegian

Weather and contract selections are still delaying the removal of eight to 10 additional barrels of the insecticide DDT, which were discovered west of the Manhattan Municipal Airport on Nov. 4, 1991.

"We've got all the bids back from contractors and now we are in the process of choosing a contractor to actually do the work," said John Lambert, K-State director of public safety.

These additional barrels were found by the public safety office while it was conducting tests on soil surrounding the area where they removed two barrels of DDT earlier in the year.

Cleanup of this toxic substance requires not only removing the barrels themselves, but also taking out surrounding soil contaminated by leaky barrels.

"The hard part about soil contamination questions is 'How much is enough?,'" said Steve Galitzer , K-State public safety assistant. "Safe levels of contaminated soil vary with water levels and soils types."

The first two barrels of DDT were removed according to a state-approved plan, and the removal of the additional eight to 10 barrels will also follow the plan.

The plan outlines the safety measures and procedures which must take place before the area will be considered decontaminated by DDT.

The DDT was purchased about 25 years ago to end an insect infestation in a crop of pine trees the Forestry Department was growing. The infestation was brought under control and the excess chemical was buried.

At the time, burial of hazardous chemicals was standard procedure for disposal and no consideration was given to locating the barrels in the future.

Dennis Matteson, K-State director of cooperative extension, lives one-half mile from the buried chemicals,and brought the burial to the attention of the University in October 1990.

Fifteen months later, the cleanup project is still underway. No one knows exactly how many barrels were buried at this site or if other sites exist because of a lack of records.

Once the barrels are removed the soil will be tested again to make sure all of the contamination has been removed.

Lambert said the removal of the final barrels will be handled differently than the first two.

The cleanup for the first two barrels was done by removing barrels full of dirt. The cleanup for the remaining barrels will be done using a backhoe and the equivalent of a dumpster, Lambert said.

The backhoe will deposit large scoops full of the contaminated soil into the dumpster and then all the soil contained in the dumpster will be disposed of. The barrels of DDT and the contaminated soil will probably be disposed of by incineration, Galitzer said.

Image leads to breast implants

Psychologists say most women seek surgery for cosmetic, self-image reasons

ULRIKE DAUER

The number of U.S. women with breast implants increased by 400 percent between 1988 and 1991.

The 1991 edition of Statistical Abstracts of the United States said a total of 544,000 breast implants have been done in the United States since 1988.

The Food and Drug Administration counts 2 million breast implants as of August 1991, said Kristi Koke, medical information specialist at the Cancer Information Service hotline in Kansas City, Kan.

Breast implants are a typical white, middle-class woman phenomenon. According to the statistics, 98 percent of people with breast implants are female, 98.5 percent are white, and 97 percent are between 18 and 64 years of age, said D.A. Thomas, librarian at the University of Kansas' Archie R. Dykes Library of the Health Sciences in Kansas City, Kan.

Koke said the majority of breast implants do not help breast-cancer patients cope with a mastectomy (the surgical removal of a breast).

"Eighty percent of the breast prostheses are implanted for cosmetic reasons. Only 20 percent are devoted to breast reconstruction," Koke said.

Psychologists and sociologists see several reasons for this tremendous increase founded in the structure of society.

Leon Rappoport, professor of psychology, said some people are particularly concerned about attractiveness, because they feel that with the attractiveness of a body, the quality of a body is at stake.

Rappoport said we live in a consumer-oriented society, a society in which people take a marketing approach to values. He said to make themselves more marketable, people try to make themselves more attractive.

involved with. To me, from my life experience, it's necessary for women to have a choice," Verschelden said.

Although most of the people remembering the Roe anniversary said they were thinking about abortion freedom, Lea Mayberry of the Flint Hills Coalition said the Roe v. Wade decision is not just about abortion.

Mayberry said she is a good friend of Sarah Weddington, who was the lawyer representing Roe in the Supreme Court case.

"A lot of people don't realize that Roe is right of privacy, not just abortion. If you take a woman's right to choose — her right of privacy — then the disabled aren't going to have right of privacy," she said. "If Roe goes, that's saying that women don't have the right to their bodies. What's next? Are everybody's rights going? For the disabled, Roe is key.

"We use it a lot in our arguments. If women are given the right of privacy, why aren't the disabled given the right of privacy?" Mayberry said.

City's noisemakers may take a hike

Listen, Manhattan City Commissioners, make up your minds. Do you want K-State students here or not?

Your unanimous approval of the first reading of the new noise ordinance shows us, once again, you don't.

This is just the latest in a string of asinine ideas that suggest you don't like us here.

The rental inspection program that has disappeared in the Bermuda Triangle of Manhattan city bureaucracy is another.

Manhattan is a great little town. It's easy to get around in. It's friendly. And the people, for the most part, are pretty cool.

K-State is a nice place, too. It's small and easy going.

By telling Aggieville businesses — K-State's bingo parlors and VFW halls, if you will — to pipe down, you are telling us, "Shut up. Go away. Leave us alone."

K-State is an important part of your economy. The more restrictions you place on the businesses that cater to students, the less students will want to come here.

Fewer students means less money in your pockets, fewer jobs for you and less sales tax money to spend on frivolous things like malls.

Those who live near Aggieville, quite frankly, are getting what they ask for, whether they have lived there for 40 years or four days.

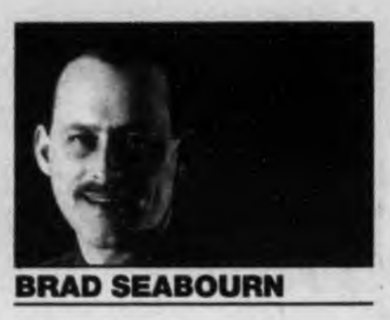
Students get drunk. They get rowdy. They get in fights. They commit crimes. They like loud music. It's sad, yes, but it's reality.

If only you could show us the same amount of respect you showed those men and women who fought in Iraq to preserve the American way of life.

Someday, if you keep this up, the only students you will see come through Manhattan will be the ones stopping at gas stations to go to the bathroom, buy a soda and ask for directions to Lawrence.

WD-40, WATER BALLOONS AND THE BUILDING OF THE PERFECT BREAST

Most people, I think, would agree there is not much to laugh about these days. We are in the midst of an economic crisis many experts claim is the worst since the Great Depression.



Our dismal, long-term economic health aside, the current recession has forced interest rates to a 27-year low and unemployment to an uncomfortable 7.5 percent.

Just to drive the point home, Christmas sales in 1991 were the worst in 30 years.

Now, as if to mimic a sagging economy, silicone breast implants are under serious scrutiny by the Food and Drug Administration and have probably seen their last in providing women with something they never had enough of in the first place — yet would liked to have had, had they been born with it — but don't particularly want now, since the thing that gives them more of what their husbands apparently like tends to leak silicone.

Frankly, I don't get it.

Basically, silicone is a lubricant, which makes me want to ask a silly question: Why would anyone want to put a lubricant in their breasts? With that kind of logic, why not use WD-40 or wheel bearing grease? At roughly $2 per pound, wheel bearing grease would be the cost effective way to go.

BRAD SEABOURN

I don't know about you, but something screams out at me not to put wheel bearing grease in my breasts ... that is, assuming, of course, I were female (which I am not) and wanted larger breasts (which I don't).

I hope I have made that clear.

As with many things we humans do, neither logic nor economics are the underlying basis for making decisions. Emotion tends to overwhelm the reasoning process entirely.

In the last 30 years, about 2 million women have undergone the surgical implant technique in which a flexible shell filled with silicone gel is slipped into a pocket, usually behind the breast muscles, through a small incision below the breast.

The advantages are obvious: natural appearance and feel with, of course, the desired enlargement.

Yet, after all this time, the disadvantages are only now being fully understood.

From 7 to 15 percent of women experience "capsular contraction," a condition in which the breast becomes hard and painful.

In addition, silicone can leak out and migrate through the body, causing enlarged lymph glands and possibly triggering arthritis — like diseases of the immune system. Silicone implants have been known to hide tumors from X-rays used to screen for breast cancer.

If I had been working for Dow Corning at the time they were asking first-graders what to stick in women's breasts to make them larger, I would have suggested water.

Why water?

First and foremost, it is nontoxic.

Second, because of popularity. Just about every male has, at one time or another, participated in a water balloon fight. Why, half the fun of making water balloons was just standing around feeling the dang things. Men everywhere will verify this observation.

As it turns out, just such an implant exists. Called a "saline implant," this device utilizes sterile salt water. There is less risk of capsular contraction, and leaking saline is safely absorbed by surrounding tissues.

Unfortunately, these implants have a tendency to deflate, requiring minor surgery (at $2,000 a pop) to replace.

There have also been reports of rippled texture and "sloshing sounds." Now, as a male, given the right circumstances, I would certainly find this phenomenon more than a little distracting.

Even with the increased safety of the saline implant, of the roughly 89,400 breast implants performed in 1990, less than 6 percent were of the saline variety.

This just goes to prove that even when the issue is safety, an idea like my "water-balloon" implant is ignored on the basis of emotion and vanity.

However, when you get right down to it, breast implants really aren't for women. They are for men. And that so many women feel they need to go to such drastic means, and apparently significant risk, to make themselves acceptable to the male of the species is really nothing to laugh about.

In fact, it is sad.

That's why the only reasonable solution to the breast implant crisis is this: If I were a woman, the next time my husband or boyfriend suggested I didn't have enough up top, I would tell him my physician advised me to say, "Take two water balloons, and you will feel better in the morning."

ALTMAN:

His honesty is worth a victory or two

They say nice guys finish last.

And this season it seems to be true for K-State men's basketball coach Dana Altman.

He is leading a team that is currently 9-5, but has little hope for a winning Big Eight season. In fact, many are picking the Cats to finish last again in the conference.

Altman recently questioned his ability as a coach.

He said the job of a coach is to get the team to execute. His team isn't. Good team play is sporadic and short-lived. And after devastating losses against Lamar, Oklahoma State and Oklahoma, the team's confidence is pretty much shot.

It was humbling and embarrassing, but it was honest — painfully honest.

Altman needs to know that even though he has given up on himself, the fans haven't. He is only in his second season as head coach, and it takes time to develop a winning program.

Just ask former K-State coach Jack Hartman. His first two seasons were losing ones.

The Big Eight is not a weak conference. When half the teams are in the Top 20, competition is stiff.

Besides, the coach isn't the only one responsible for the performance of the team. The players are responsible, too.

In the past, K-State has always had a team leader, always a Steve Henson, Mitch Richmond, Rolando Blackman or Ed Nealy. This year, no one has stepped forward.

It's not that no one on the team is qualified. In fact, Altman said this team is one of the most athletic ever.

That's what makes it so damn frustrating.

But in an athletic department filled with broken contracts and budget nightmares, Altman should be applauded for his honesty and genuine concern.

Believe in yourself, Dana. We do.

Life's Grand Canyon

I saw a movie Saturday.

It was a last-minute type thing.

Maybe you've noticed.

But it seems a lot of the moments in my life are last-minute types of things. It makes for a certain spontaneity, and I like that. (My father is a very non-spontaneous person — rather dull, actually.) So maybe that's why I like it, because it separates me from an otherwise boring and irritating lineage.

STEFFANY CARREL

So I saw a movie Saturday: "Grand Canyon."

I don't want to give it all away — as I'm sure some of you out there will eventually want to see it for yourselves — but it was good.

It was done very well, very real.

Actually, almost too real.

If nothing else, I came away knowing I will never step foot in Los Angeles.

It goes beyond being intimidated by a large and numb metropolis.

It goes beyond L.A.'s incredible pollution contribution to the rest of the Northern Hemisphere.

It goes beyond the gangs and crime and violence and everything else I abhor.

It stretches into my own idea that L.A. has lost the perception of what life is about. The people who live there have forgotten that life should be good and honest and that you should be able to live your life that way every single day — bottom line.

So maybe there are people out there saying, "Steff, you just don't understand. We've seen hard times, fear and a lot of ugly stuff you can't even comprehend. You can't tell us life is all about peaches and sunshine. You just can't."

And to that I say, "You're right. You're absolutely right."

But only to a point.

Life isn't without grief and pain and a whole lot of really horrible things you can't see coming until they knock you over. And we've all been told that time and time again.

"Life is hard."

"Life's not fair."

"I never promised you a rose garden, and blah, blah, blah."

But life is absolutely, positively not about constant fear and violence.

Life's not about carrying a gun for respect and killing for a Rolex watch. It's not about being part of a gang and knowing you'll never make it past your 25th birthday. And it's certainly not about otherwise rational people modeling their lives to this standard of violence.

But, really, it looks as though this is what life is all about today.

I see people simply accepting that kind of craziness and adapting to what "life has dealt them." Not only in Los Angeles, but in all the big cities.

And it's honestly only a matter of time before the heartland of America slips into the same fate.

So you can choose your sides, folks.

You can either be part of the problem by accepting or contributing to this "new and improved standard of living," or you can make the choice to do something, anything, to better the world around you.

And to those of you who've decided your life is so full of shit that you need to go to the local McDonald's and slaughter 30 people, my advice is to move to Los Angeles. I figure that city is pretty much a wasteland anyway, so why not go somewhere where you're extraordinary talents will be truly appreciated?

"Grand Canyon" was real.

But I know now what made me feel that way.

We're all screwed.

COMMENTARY

THURSDAY, JANUARY 23, 1992 KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A VOICE FROM THE MOUNTAINTOP

Martin Luther King Jr.

I don't remember hearing about him when I was a child — that is, until one day shortly after my seventh birthday in 1968. My parents said I couldn't go out to play because of a thing called a curfew. The curfew was because of the riots in Kansas City.

At about the same time, our teacher explained to us what words to use.

Nigger was a bad word, she said. So was colored. They were different than other bad words we might have learned. They weren't cool. They hurt people.

"The word is Negro," my teacher said.

OK. I had no problem with that. I was seven.

Since then, I've learned more about a scary time known as the '60s. And maybe, like a lot of people now, I have trouble seeing King as just a man. At times I see him as an event, the intersection of trends in Christian theology and American history and society. But I have to remind myself that that intersection was just the foundation he built his work upon.

It seems a disservice to rob King of his humanity by either making him a monument or a mere product stamped out by the mill of history. I try to think of King in the ordinary situations I find myself in. I try to think of him driving a car. I know he must have driven a car because after King joined an Atlanta lunch counter sit-in, he was sentenced to a state prison farm for violating his probation on a minor traffic offense.

I also think of when King was stabbed in the chest while at a book signing in a New York City department store. And of how the doctors who operated on King thought the scar should be in the shape of a cross, seeing as how King was a minister.

ERWIN SEBA

I also think of the period after the Montgomery Bus Boycott when the movement seemed to languish, or when the efforts to desegregate Albany, Ga., by the portion of the Civil Rights Movement led by King failed. I thought of the fear he must have felt. The hatred he faced. The uncertainty he knew.

It seems important to remember King as more than a mouthpiece for a dream. A dream that cynics today would tell us, through codewords, was a pleasant fantasy. We lose a great deal if we forget Martin Luther King the man in this week of observance.

I have several friends who think King doesn't merit a national holiday, much less a week of celebration. Some cite his plagiarism and extramarital affairs. Others don't give a reason.

I think they're wrong. Neither do I think it's right to plagiarize or cheat on your spouse. But how many people find their own faults reason enough to not speak against evil? How many people find the baggage of their lives reason enough to not take a stand when they know they should?

Seeing King in his humanity is important in this week. Despite the extraordinary pressures King faced as a black man, he rose above them. The weight of life did not prevent him from rising up, as it does so many of us.

In his life, King used confrontation to create crises that dramatized the injustices of American society. Yet by those challenges to the public order King caused crises of the heart. And he called us forward to resolve those crises by living up to our highest aspirations as human beings.

In April 1968, on the night before he was killed, Martin Luther King said he stood on the mountaintop and could see the promised land. In 1992, 24 years after his assassination, his words and work still call us to the mountaintop. Only by remembering his humanity can we find hope for courage to finish the climb.

LETTER

▶FAN SUPPORT DISAPPOINTS FANS

Editor,

Last Saturday at the K-State-OU basketball game, the behavior of a few fans in the general admission section was very embarrassing. We were sitting in the middle of section 20 in front of two particular senior Fijis displaying their letters.

The language they were using toward Billy Tubbs and his players was nothing compared to what they were saying about the Cats and Coach Dana Altman.

After listening to their constant badgering, one of us finally asked the two of them to please respect our team and coach for their efforts this season.

In reply, they told us in a charming manner, "Turn around, you fucking bitch, and shut the fuck up. Why don't you sit somewhere else?"

In an attempt to respond to these elaborate words, the one of us responded, "No, I'm sitting in the K-State FAN section."

Although it helped a little bit, it continued into the second half when they stood by the Cats to the end — NOT!

They left 10 minutes early because they felt the Cats were embarrassing them. That's ironic, considering how embarrassed we felt when we noticed a K-State student and his parents sitting next to us who had witnessed their irresponsible actions.

Not only did these two give their fraternity and the greek system a bad image, but also the entire student body.

SPORTS COLUMN

STEVEN ROCK

Laughter and tears

If all athletics, be it at the collegiate level, the professional level, or the "let's-all-get-together-and-play-football-at-the-nursing-home" level, were played with the same emotion my mother has put into her fight against cancer, it would be a sporting world like none we've ever known.

More than a decade ago, Mom was diagnosed as having breast cancer. Her sister's life had already been taken by the disease, and the likelihood the same would happen to my mother was good.

In sportsman's terms, it was 4th and 18. Mom was lodged back on her own 9-yard line. She was down by four points, and only 18 ticks were left on the clock. Nothing short of a miracle would suffice.

Mom stared death in the face — and scared the hell out of it. It would have been easy for Mom to get mad. Oh sure, she cried; we all did. But mad? Nah. I think the only time Mom really got mad was when she saw me flip off my brother. I was 12. She was furious. Other than that, Mom has pretty much narrowed her emotions down to two things: tears and laughter. And with this simple attitude, she has fought the most courageous battle of her life.

And won.

She took that 4th and long play and aired it out. With a deep drop, she eluded the heavy rush and threw long. It was her last chance.

Mom's life was on the line.

That pass could have fallen incomplete. At that point, it wouldn't have mattered; Mom still would have been victorious. "It's not whether you win or lose, it's how you play the game." This was no game, however. This was her life.

That pass was complete. Touchdown. Mom won. Nothing was going to stop her. Not the mastectomy she had in 1980. Nor the one she had seven years later. Nothing.

Tears and laughter. It's so simple.

Why, then, is it so difficult for American athletes? If Mom could find her sense of humor in a situation that may have taken her life, why can't athletes do the same for a damn game?

It doesn't make sense.

Think about the folklore of America's pastime without the cemented image of Billy Martin. Martin's claim to fame was his uncanny ability to kick dirt on the feet of umpires.

The examples are everywhere.

I recently attended a K-State women's basketball game. The Lady Cats suffered a disappointing loss on a last-second, controversial charging call. One team member, in a justified moment of frustration and anger, kicked the basketball the length of the court.

Sure, she was upset. But what would Mom have done if she were on the team? Maybe she would have shed a few solemn tears. Perhaps she would have chuckled at the game's irony. But then she would have gone home, taken a cold shower, and watched "The Golden Girls." That's it. No ball-booting. Nothing.

Tears and laughter. No more, no less.

Mom isn't much of an athlete. She doesn't golf. She doesn't jog. She doesn't play backyard football. But she's still the strongest person I've ever known.

Mom's survival, she'll claim, is the result of a devoted, loving husband. She'll insist she wouldn't have made it without her caring family and the strength God has granted her.

In my eyes, her attitude made the difference.

Athletes in America could learn a lot from this woman. Perhaps the sporting world will someday be something we all can be proud of.

Right now, however, it's far from it.

CATS BASKETBALL

Regrouped Cats down T-Birds, 84-74

Sooner nightmare shed as five players reach double figures in scoring

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

A classic it wasn't.

A win it was.

That's what was most important to K-State coach Dana Altman and his team, as the Wildcats rebounded from a disappointing 41-point loss to Oklahoma to post an 84-74 win over Southern Utah Wednesday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

"We needed a win, and it was a win, so I'm happy," said Altman, finally cracking a smile after entering the interview room with no real facial expression, nothing to let those gathered know how he felt about his team's effort.

On one end of the floor, anyway, Altman was very pleased. Though the visitors hit 49.1 percent of their shots, the K-State defensive unit limited the Thunderbirds, 11-5, to just five offensive rebounds and forced 26 turnovers.

And though Trasel Rone scored 15 points to lead K-State, now 9-5, on the offensive end, it was a rather unlikely trio of players who earned Altman's praise.

The first two were Brian Henson and Aaron Collier.

Henson played just 14 minutes, but had 12 points, two assists and two steals.

"Brian played well and gave us a big lift in the second half," Altman said of Henson.

And right the Cat coach was.

After being blanked in six first-half minutes, Henson came alive in the second 20 minutes. His 12-footer from the left wing with 11:28 left got him started. But it was the next stretch that caught everyone's eyes.

After a pair of free throws by Southern Utah center Kerry Sherwood with 10:48 left cut the K-State lead — which had earlier swelled to 18 — to a mere six at 56-50, Henson took over.

On the ensuing possession, Henson hit a 22-foot, 3-point shot, and he was off. A driving layup followed in the next possession. Two free throws came next.

And thus, with 9:30 showing, the lead was now back to a comfortable 13, thanks to the freshman from McPherson.

Aaron Collier also drew Altman's praise for his rebounding work. The 6-foot-6 center from Kansas City, Mo., had a career-best 15 boards, including 10 on the defensive end.

Collier also had 12 points to register his second double-double of the year and to match his previous career best on the offensive end.

Though Henson and Collier drew Altman's first nods of approval, one of the biggest came for John Ret-

FROM THE DUGOUT

Chadd happy to be back on K-State field

Former Wildcat returns as hitting coach

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

You can go home again.

That's what David Chadd found out near the conclusion of the fall semester, when he was named K-State's assistant baseball coach.

For Chadd, who was an All-American designated hitter for the Cats in 1988, a chance to return to his alma mater as a coach was just too good to pass up — even if it meant leaving perennial national power Wichita State.

"Obviously, this was a place I always wanted to get back to," said Chadd, who played two years in Manhattan, setting several season and career records along the way.

"Being able to contribute again to this program was always something I wanted to do."

A pair of circumstances beyond his control enabled Chadd to have the opportunity to do just that.

When the NCAA decided to limit baseball programs in Division I to just one full-time assistant and one part-time coach, Chadd was destined to be lost in the Shocker shuffle.

With Brent Kemnitz and Loren Hibbs already veteran members of Coach Gene Stephenson's staff, Chadd — the new kid on the block — was in danger of soon being out of work.

"I was in a situation where the new NCAA legislation was forcing me out of a job," said Chadd, who worked as a hitting instructor while with Wichita State.

That's when Phil Morgan, K-State coach Mike Clark's previous right-hand man, decided to join the Pittsburgh Pirates as the organization's Midwest Scouting Director.

And Morgan, as fate would have it, was the K-State hitting instructor.

It was, it seemed, a perfect fit. Except for one little hitch. Clark was a bit unsure as to whether Chadd could fill Morgan's other major role as the team's lead recruiter.

"I wanted to make sure about his knowledge of recruiting and hitting — the two areas most vital to the job description," said Clark of his initial interview with candidate Chadd, who had played under Clark.

"He put all of my questions to rest in the first five minutes of the interview."

Chadd took the interrogation by his old coach in stride.

"As a young coach," Chadd, 26, said, "you're going to be tested in your knowledge of the game immediately."

Having passed the interview test, Chadd's resume — particularly the part containing the words "played at Kansas State University" — proved to be his greatest asset.

Clark, it seemed, was convinced there would be no one better to help him lead the program forward than someone who knew the nature of the battles ahead.

"My feeling is that I can be their friend — and you have to be that as a coach — but I won't be their buddy."

— David Chadd on his coaching philosophy

"There's a pride to the institution," Clark said. "David's familiar with our strengths, and he knows our weaknesses, having played here."

And it's Chadd's knowledge of what K-State has to offer that is his greatest ally when he hits the recruiting trail, Chadd said.

"The greatest thing we have to offer at Kansas State is the quality education we can offer a prospective student athlete," Chadd said.

While Chadd was finishing his education at K-State, he was also rewriting the school's diamond record book.

Chadd currently is the school's career batting average leader, with a .388 mark over the 1987 and 1988 seasons.

In addition, his .418 mark in his All-America '88 campaign is the third-best, single-season effort in school history.

Chadd also has his name on the charts for hits in a single season, runs scored in a season and a career, doubles in a career and home runs in a career.

All the while Chadd was pounding the ball all over Frank Myers Field for Clark, the DH was preparing to become a future coach, though the thought wasn't apparent to Clark until a postseason chat after Chadd's final year in purple.

Since leaving K-State, Chadd has served time as an assistant to championship-caliber teams on the semi-pro level in Wichita and in Alaska, and as a Shocker aide.

Everywhere he's been, he's won. That's something Clark said was important to the current K-State players when Chadd arrived.

"It (the transition) has been smooth, very smooth," Clark said. "The players have adjusted to him very well.

"The players have seen his success in other places, and they know he was an All-American here. With that comes an acceptance that you don't normally have."

Chadd is glad to have that acceptance, but he's quick to point out that the acceptance and a relatively narrow gap in ages between him and his players will not lead to off-field, buddy-buddy relationships.

"My feeling is that I can be their friend — and you have to be that as a coach — but I won't be their buddy," Chadd said.

"Coaching is basically communication. If you can't communicate with your players, you won't succeed. And I try to do it on their level."

It's a level Chadd was at not too long ago, though Clark said he is glad he's moved to the next tier.

BASEBALL: Catcher cuts deal with Cards

ST. LOUIS (AP) — The St. Louis Cardinals and catcher Tom Pagnozzi split the difference Wednesday and agreed to a one-year, $967,500 contract.

Pagnozzi, who was a pleasant surprise in his first year as a starter for the Cardinals, had asked for $1.07 million and the Cardinals had offered $865,000. Last season, Pagnozzi was paid $345,000.

Pagnozzi hit .264 last year and drove in 57 runs. He was one of the top defensive catchers in the National League and received a Gold Glove.

With the signing, the only Cardinals player in arbitration is pitcher Bob Tewksbury, who is seeking $975,000. The Cardinals have offered $625,000. He was paid $185,000 last.

BASKETBALL: Regent butt of UNLV joke

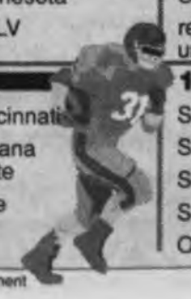
Sparks allegedly said she was tired of UNLV coach Jerry Tarkanian recruiting "ghetto kids."

Sparks denied using the term in a racial sense and said she was baited into the telephone conversation by Les Meilke, identified only as one of Tarkanian's backers.



Forward Evric Gray used an expletive in referring to Sparks Tuesday.

"What it means is that all of them (regents) think that way," Gray said. "She just happened to be the one to say it."

Brian Henson looks for an outlet against Southern Utah.

INSIDE STUFF

Henson finds role on team

BRIAN ANDERSON
Collegian

If there was a theme song for freshman Wildcat point guard Brian Henson, it could be, "The Future 's So Bright, I Gotta Wear Shades."

Henson, the six-footer from McPherson with some big family shoes to fill, scored 12 points, dished out two assists, and grabbed two steals to help the Cats to an 84-74 win over the Southern Utah Thunderbirds Wednesday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

Lately,Henson has been contributing more to the offense since coming back from a stress fracture in his right foot. In his last two games, against Oklahoma and Southern Utah, he has averaged 10 points a game, after averaging seven points a contest before his injury.

"The first part of the season he (Henson) was a little inconsistent and just when he got going, he had a foot injury," Coach Dana Altman said of Henson, who played just 14 minutes against the T-Birds. "We spot-practiced him and when he was practicing, he practiced well. Tonight, he played well and gave us a big lift in the second half."

Of Henson's 12 points, nine of them came within a two-minute span midway through the second half in which he made two field goals, a 3- pointer, two free throws and a steal.

During the time Henson scored his nine points, the Cats made a 18-9 run on the Thunderbirds.

"We got back on defense, slowed down (on offense), and sped up their (offense) to create turnovers," said Henson after the game.

Henson finished the night with three field goals on four attempts, made one of two 3-point attempts, completed five of six free throw attempts, and did not turn the ball over.

This was Henson's best performance since the BMA Holiday Classic in Kansas City's Kemper Arena last month, when he scored 13 points and had five assists in 29 minutes for the Wildcats as they downed Southern Mississippi, 76-68.

Henson expects his team, which has slumped of late, to get better as the Cats get back into Big Eight action, starting with the Iowa State Cyclones in Ames Saturday.

"We came together as a team tonight. We are still learning about each other and our attitude is up."

One problem Henson sees is that the team doesn't have a leader after 14 games.

"We need someone to step up. I believe leadership should be placed on point guards like Marcus (Zeigler) and me," he said.

Although Henson, the 1991 Mr. Basketball in Kansas, still reminds K-State fans of the glory days of his older brother Steve, Brian hopes to continue to make his name known to the fans and to opposing teams in the future.

tiger, the senior center from Strong City who had played just two minutes in the team's previous three games combined.

Rettiger played 17 minutes against the Thunderbirds, who had players who were 6-6, 6-7 and 6-11 along the baseline.

"With their size, we thought he could help us defensively," Altman said of Rettiger, who had five points, three rebounds, an assist, a block and a steal before fouling out with 4:10 left.

Rettiger's recent work in practice got him his time on the floor Wednesday night, Altman said.

"He's practiced very well," Altman said. "Two days ago in practice, he had an outstanding practice."

Rettiger's version of what went on in that workout may best indicate how far his confidence may have fallen of late, during a stretch that saw the string of games in which he had registered over 10 minutes on the floor come to a rather abrupt end.

"I really hadn't switched over to the other side that much," said Rettiger, who plays on the defensive end during most practices. "I switched over to the other team (offensive unit) and had a lucky day and scored a little bit."

As lucky as Rettiger may have felt to score, it's likely his teammates and coaches may have felt that same way about getting a win, any win, at this point.

SUPER BOWL XXVI

Here it is, the official Super Bowl story

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) — Fly to the Super Bowl on the game's official airline. Rent an official car from the official rent-a-car company. Have your photo taken on official film with an official camera, then settle into your seat with an official beer.

To football fans, it might sound like a game of trivial pursuits. But it's no small matter for the National Football League and the sponsors who pay seven-figure fees to link their products to the NFL and gain exposure at the nation's most-watched sporting event.

Companies spend at least $1 million for the season-long NFL sponsorship that gives them the right to use the Super Bowl logo, said Dave Mona, chief executive officer of the Minneapolis public relations firm of Mona Meyer McGrath & Gavin. His clients include Coca-Cola, the game's official soft drink.

About 100 corporate sponsors pay or provide services in exchange for association with the NFL, said Brian Hughes, who markets corporate sponsorships for the league. The Super Bowl exposure is part of their overall sponsorship for the year.

The sponsors have official products for almost any taste. There's an official beer, Miller, and an official sports drink, Gatorade. American Airlines is the official airline, GMC the official truck, Buick the official automobile, Avis the official rental car, Kodak the official film and Canon the official photographic consultant.

The game even has an official telecommunications company, GTE Corp., and an official overnight express service, DHL Worldwide Express.

Does the exposure matter to consumers?

"I'm not sure they care. Do they notice? Yes, they do notice," Mona said.

It certainly matters to sponsors. The Super Bowl is the most-watched television program of the year, drawing 39 million viewers, and the third-largest eating occasion, behind Thanksgiving and Christmas.

"It's critical for us," said Pattie Sinopoli, manager of sports communications for Quaker Oats Co., which produces Gatorade. Gatorade has been associated with the NFL since the Green Bay Packers began using it in the 1960s.

Publicity isn't all these sponsors get. They're also buying access to one of the world's most popular sporting events, where they wine and dine their clients and top executives. Many run contests for Super Bowl tickets.

"It's the most prestigious event for corporations to entertain their key clients," Hughes said.

A company will be turned away if it competes with a current sponsor. The NFL won't accept Pepsi because it competes with Coca-Cola, although Pepsi dodged that obstacle this year. It spent $1 million to sponsor a 150-foot-high ice castle at the St. Paul Winter Carnival, which is expected to be a big attraction for Super Bowl visitors.

Cost is certainly a factor, too. Hughes said he didn't have a breakdown of the costs for individual companies, but the price of a sponsorship will vary with the level of involvement.

BRIEFS

▶ 3 PLEAD GUILTY

ANDY WOODWARD
Collegian

Eighteen drug arrests that occurred in mid-December have resulted in three guilty pleas to various felonies to date.

Riley County District Attorney Bill Kennedy said the effect of the guilty pleas on the community of drug dealers will be immediate.

"It shows we are watching these things. The Riley County Police Department is actively on this matter," he said.

Some of the guilty pleas also included the failure of the people to pay their drug tax.

"A year ago, legislators passed a Tax Act for unlawful drugs," Kennedy said.

"If you have illegal drugs, for the purpose of possession or sale, you have to pay a tax on them. There is a place to write in Topeka to receive a stamp to prove you paid for your illegal drugs."

Nine of the 18 busts included charges of lack of payment of the drug stamp tax.

The RCPD is also stepping up its efforts against drug dealers by hiring more personnel.

"My office is hiring a special prosecutor for drug cases," Kennedy said. "This narcotics prosecutor will specialize in drug cases. We anticipate hiring within a week."

▶ TRIAL RECOMMENDED

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Collegian

The Fort Riley soldier charged in the slaying of Phillis Geiger, whose body was found on the post Nov. 17, may be tried for premeditated murder.

The trial date for Sgt. 1st Class Edward Fierro, Company E/1st Engineering Batallion, will be set in a few weeks, said Mark Meseke, Fort Riley spokesman.

Meseke said the investigating officer studied information gathered through an Article 32, the military equivalent of a grand jury investigation, and recommended Fierro be tried in a general court martial.

"The recommendation must go to the second brigade commander, then the staff judge advocate and finally to the commanding general who will either approve or disapprove of the recommendation," Meseke said.

The death penalty is an option under the general court martial should Fierro, 39, be found guilty.

The exact cause or time of death for Geiger, 19, is still not known.

"It's difficult because she was allegedly assaulted on Nov. 10 at Fierro's Junction City apartment and not found until Nov. 17," Meseke said. "We don't know if it was because of the assault or the elements. Right now there's not enough evidence."

Geiger's immediate family is from El Paso, Texas, but she was living with relatives in Junction City since late July 1991.

▶ DISEASE KILLED BOY

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Collegian

The 4-year-old boy found dead last Wednesday by his mother in their home at Fort Riley died from Sickle Cell Anemia.

An autopsy was performed last Thursday at Irwin Army Community Hospital, and the cause of death was announced Tuesday.

Jamil Ments was found unresponsive in his bed by his mother, Jennifer Ments, 27, Wednesday morning at 10:15. She called for an ambulance and the boy was pronounced dead at 10:30 a.m.

Jennifer Ments was arrested later that day in a drug raid and charged with possession of cocaine and possession of drug paraphernalia. She was later released on bond from the Geary County Sheriff's Office.

"A lot of people were suspicious because of the drug arrest, but there were no charges. He died because of the disease," said Mark Meseke, Fort Riley media relations officer.

Jamil was the son of Spec. Kevin Ments, 1st Personal Services Company, and Jennifer. The Ments live in an apartment on Custer Hill at Fort Riley.

Meseke said he assumed Kevin was working at the time of the drug raid, and there were no charges against him.

Night classes rescue students

KATIE WALKER
Collegian

Night classes have come to the rescue of students affected by budget cuts that have forced departments to offer fewer class sections.

Peg Wherry, after-hours coordinator in the Division of Continuing Education, said she estimated about 100 night classes are being offered this semester.

Night classes are those that meet at 4:30 p.m. or later. Most of the night classes come from the colleges of Arts and Sciences and Education.

"Most of our evening courses are at the graduate level, so we're responding to many teachers and non-traditional students who work during the day," said Michael Holen, dean of the College of Education.

Overall enrollment figures have decreased slightly, and the number of non-traditional students decreased 4 percent last year.

"That decrease could be just temporary, and it might have been due to the war," Michael Bailey, assistant director of FENIX, said.

Bailey blamed the economy for forcing adults out of the job market and back to school.

"Older people who are losing jobs are interested in upgrading their skills or learning something new," he said.

The advantages of taking a night class often depend on the person.

"Students tend to be appreciative of being able to take a course, and they do a good job. Their attitude doesn't really change, unless they don't want to be in that class," said Carol Shanklin, professor of hotel and restaurant management.

Shanklin has taught night classes for 12 years and said she has found one disadvantage — sometimes students are tired and not alert.

David Albrecht, junior in food science, is enrolled in a night course.

"All the other sections were filled up," he said. "I prefer day classes, because it's easier for me to study at night."

Night courses enable the University to meet the needs of people who work in the day, and they make the classes more diverse, Wherry said.

It is hard to tell, however, whether day or night classes fill up more quickly, she said.

"Some classes are only in the evening, frequent part-time students don't enroll as early, and they tend to take night classes."

RESEARCH

KSU instructor tests skin cancer retardant on mice

Perchellet treats infected mice with tannic acid

TRISHA PERRIGO
Collegian

K-State is the home of 50-100 mice with skin cancer.

The shaven white mice are being treated with tannic acid by Jean-Pierre Perchellet, associate professor of biology.

Perchellet has been researching the skin cancer retardant for two years on a grant from the American Cancer Society.

Tannic acid is a chemical found in a variety of plant tannin. Tannin naturally protects plants, he said. Because plants cannot escape from destructive natural elements such as insects or radiation, the plant releases the tannic acid for protection.

Tannin keeps molecules from combining with oxygen, Perchellet said. He said some have thought that combination may be the primary characteristic of cancer cells.

"It's the first step," said Hala Gali, research associate and assistant to Perchellet. "It's a start — a start for curing skin cancer."

Perchellet has found that when tannic acid is applied directly to the skin of a mouse treated with carcinogens, the growth of the cancer is delayed, and the number of tumors it had decreases.

After 27 weeks, they found no tumors had appeared on the mice. Within 50 weeks, there was a minimal number of tumors on each mouse or no tumors at all, which means there was 95-percent protection and a long delay in tumor development, Perchellet said.

Perchellet said this is the closest he has come in his skin cancer research. So far, however, all of the research has been externally applied to the mice.

"The next step is to see if it can be taken internally and have the same effect," Perchellet said. "Of course, we don't know the long-term effects of the chemical if taken internally."

Neither Perchellet nor Gali knows if tannic acid is toxic.

"We have no idea if it can be taken internally to find out if it is a curing drug for the future," Gali said.

It will take several research teams and from 10 to 20 years before it could be used for humans, Perchellet said.

Fortunately, there are other groups researching similar types of compounds.

"The next step would be for some company to sponsor us that worked with skin products, lotions or sunscreen — that would be the ultimate thing," Gali said.

ALCOHOL

Regents schools, tavern owners TOAST designated drivers

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

The Teaching Others Alcohol Safety Tactics designated driver program is just about three months old, but it has already had an effect on K-Staters' awareness of drinking and driving.

Jim Nugent, Fort Hays State University coordinator of drug alcohol awareness, initiated the program in Kansas. Nugent said TOAST helped to reduce the amount of car accidents in Kansas involving students.

"The attitudes of students to driving drunk are changing on campuses," he said. "I think the program has contributed to the fact that the number of accidents on Kansas' highways have tremendously declined in the last year."

Bill Arck, director of educational personal programs at Lafene Health Center, confirms the positive trend.

"We don't have the newest numbers of 1991 yet, but you can see a significant decrease in incidents of drinking and driving," he said.

Previously, the number of people who died in Kansas car accidents declined from 224 in 1986, to 127 in 1990.

The designated driver program in Kansas was established at Fort Hays State in 1989 as a pilot project. It was initiated to make students aware of drinking and driving safely by selecting a sober driver. TOAST is a joint venture between the six regents institutions and volunteer bars within those cities. The bars provide free pop for the designated drivers.

Nugent said the responsibility was on the students who were talking with bars about the project.

"After an agreement with several bars, students went back to their peer groups to tell them that those bars will provide free soft drinks for designated drivers," he said.

"The other idea of the program is to have a network of participating bars in Kansas," Arck said. "If you go to other universities with friends you can go to bars which are also participating in the program."

Nugent said he observed similar programs in Colorado and Florida.

"We had need in Kansas for such a program," Nugent said. "We talked with the Kansas Department of Transportation for a grant and they had some money left."

Since the program was successful at Fort Hays State, Nugent asked other regents institutions to participate. K-State joined the program in October.

Also participating are 53 bars.

In Manhattan, eight bars in Aggieville are members of the program. Generally, the bars see an increased awareness in students about the designated driving program.

"I think it's a very good program," said Jeff Mays, manager of Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon. "Lots of students ask for free pop, being a designated driver. Students are definitely more aware of not driving drunk. I think, maybe it's because many of the students themselves or their friends got DUIs. They know it's a big deal."

Kevin Henao, manager of the Spot Tavern, also said students are more aware and ask for free soda, but TOAST is not the only reason for it.

"I make the bartenders aware to take over drunk people," he said. "They should not give people more beer who look like they were drunk — slow them down. Generally, I think that there is less drinking going on in Aggieville and students are getting more health-oriented."

STUDENT SENATE

McClaskey announces cabinet; 8 new positions yet to be filled

ANDY WOODWARD
Collegian

Student Body President Jackie McClaskey's cabinet is not finished.

McClaskey and her chief of staff, Jim Persinger, added eight offices they said were underrepresented in the cabinet. Applications will be taken for the positions, and decided upon by the end of January.

The added, unfilled offices include campus Associated Students of Kansas director, campus safety task force director and assistant, liaisons in fine arts, athletics and environmental awareness, living organization coordinator, and a marketing director.

"I'm really excited about the people already selected," McClaskey said. "They're dedicated to making a difference in finding out what their constituencies are concerned about."

Forty people applied for a position on the cabinet, and the applicants were chosen by McClaskey. She said she was seeking a diverse cabinet representing a broad spectrum of students.

"Very few of the cabinet members have been involved with student government in the past, and I think they will represent their areas well," McClaskey said.

Roy Cessna, fifth-year senior in business, is McClaskey's community affairs director and said he was very optimistic about this year's cabinet.

"From what I've seen, she's got different people, a very good cabinet to support her views."

Cessna said he was selected for his particular office because, "they placed me where they needed the most strength or support."

Cessna also said he thinks this year's cabinet will be much more cooperative.

"There won't be upheavals like last semester between Fred (Wingert) and Todd (Heitschmidt)," he said.

Colin Fernandes, graduate student in mathematics, is also pleased with the results of McClaskey's search for diversity on her cabinet.

"I'm an international student, so from that standpoint, I'd say it is a success," Fernandes said.

McClaskey's international affairs director, Mary Ann Thomas, junior in political science and English, said she has confidence in this year's cabinet.

"There is a person from every walk of life at K-State," Thomas said. She also is looking forward to the cabinet being completed.

Bob Fleener, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, said he is looking forward to working on what he calls a "solid cabinet that will function really well."

Men who buy toupees or do body building have basically the same attitude as women who get implants, Rappoport said.

Sandra Coyner, director of women's studies, said a number of women in the professional world went through plastic surgery to increase the chances of getting a promotion.

She said the 1980s were a racist and sexist decade, and many women were judged by their appearance. To help their professional career, she said, many women accepted sexist attitudes and even went through plastic surgery.

Rappoport said breast implants might help women regain their self-confidence after a mastectomy. However, he said it is unlikely that one can gain more than superficial self-confidence merely through an improved body image.

"If you feel self-confident, it depends not on a superficial aspect. Dependency on one's more attractive look in the mirror is a sign of deeper sensitive problems, because the identity is tied too closely to the superficial," he said.

Rappoport said he doesn't know of any follow-up study that examined if breast implants do actually improve the psychic state of female patients.

He further said there is a certain cultural predisposition that makes the American culture a breast-oriented culture.

"From a psychological stand, breast implants are one manifestation of a larger orientation in our culture to focus on our body — conform it to the current standard," Rappoport said.

"The same superficial conformity attitudes make people turn to get breast implants or muscles."

Coyner said educational institutions have an important role in combating sexist attitudes.

Implant

In the Backgrounder, an FDA publication, the governmental agency expressed concern about those silicone-gel filled breast implants covered with polyurethane foam.

A breakdown product of polyurethane causes cancer in animals. The cancer risk for women with polyurethane implants, about 10 percent of all silicone-filled implants, hasn't yet been determined.

Four implant manufacturers, Dow Corning Wright, McGhan Medical Corp., Mentor Corp. and Bioplasty Inc., are currently having their data reviewed by the FDA.

In response to the FDA moratorium, two European countries, Austria and Spain, have banned silicone-filled implants from further use.

An alternative to silicone-filled breast implants, which the FDA hasn't yet approved for use in the United States, is popular in Europe.

The implant, called MISTI Gold by Bioplasty, is filled with distilled water, salt crystals and biocompatible polyvinylpyrrolidone in a concentration adapted to body fluids.

PVP is a low-molecular-weight plastic that has been used for years in many products like tablet filler and shampoo, said Michelle Bergmann, customer service representative with Bioplasty.

She said since PVP can be absorbed and broken down by the body, the implant filling material cannot harm the tissue as the silicone gel does. It is also less resistant to mammography X-rays than silicone.

The new product was denied premarket approval by the FDA in August, and the company stopped selling it on the U.S. market, Bergmann said.

Glasscock

because of his previous business and government experiences, and 35 years as a citizen of Manhattan, he would be a prime candidate for the job.

"I knew that I would work hard and do a good job in representing the people," he said. "I feel I have a very good sense of the community and needs as related to Kansas to do the job."

Glasscock's credentials include being mayor of Manhattan in 1989 and 1990 and serving on the Manhattan City Commission from 1987 to 1990. He is currently the president of the Kansas Lumber Homestore.

"Finding enough time to do the public service work and to keep your regular life going is one of the hardest parts of the job," he said. "Working five days a week in Topeka and working the weekends at home is difficult."

Although serving as a representative is time consuming, Glasscock said the excitement and rewards make up for it.

"It is the honor of serving 20,000 people in my district that makes it worthwhile," he said.

Glasscock, 39, graduated from K-State in 1979 with a B.A. in English. He said he is currently single, and enjoys reading and traveling when he has the time.

An issue of particular importance, according to Glasscock, is K-State financing. He said it will be an overriding and critical issue in this upcoming session, as with every year.

"K-State funding is the most frustrating and the most challenging," he said.

Glasscock said he plans on seeking re-election in 1992 to represent district 62. Generally lying on the west side of Tuttle Creek to the Riley County line, the district includes the west part of Manhattan and extends north.

Glasscock's stance on other issues:

•Initiative and Referendum — Does not want to see it passed.

•Primary — "With the condition of the state budget, I would have to think before spending $1.5 million for a presidential primary," he said.

•Abortion — Pro-choice, with restrictions in the third trimester. Also co-sponsored a bill which restricts activities such as those experienced in Wichita this past summer. The bill will strengthen laws concerning such issues.

•Environment — Glasscock serves on the Energy Natural Resources Committee. "Water and solid wastes will be an overriding issue for the state," he said.

Oleen

in Kansas for 13 years and then State Director of Communications for the Department of Human Resources. She has also worked as a volunteer for the Republican party.

One of the most enjoyable aspects of being a senator is seeking and gathering information, Oleen said.

Oleen, now in her 4th legislative session, said she enjoys being a part of forming policy.

"It is the feeling that you have the tools to make decisions which would be best for the area you represent and the state as a whole which makes it so rewarding," she said.

On the other hand, Oleen said representing 100,000 people without a staff when the Legislature is not in session is the most difficult aspect of her job.

"During those months, May through January, it is a very active district because we are so dependent on state dollars," she said.

Oleen, 42, has been married for 16 years and has two children, ages 14 and 12. She has lived in Manhattan for 14 years and said she enjoys horseback riding, tennis and traveling.

After growing up in Topeka, Oleen graduated from Emporia State University with a degree in secondary education and a master's degree in curriculum instruction.

Oleen said she will run for re-election this November to represent district 22.

Oleen's stance on other issues:

•Initiative & Referendum: Does not want to see it passed as a package.

•Abortion: There are two components to the issue, she said. One being abortion, the other being parental notification. She said she will not make a decision on any bill until she has all of the information.

Hochhauser has since given birth to a daughter, Rebecca Margolies, and has had to learn to manage her time between her new baby, her job as an attorney and being a state representative.

"It made it a tough session (being pregnant) because physically you don't have as much durability," she said. "The session in many ways is an endurance test, and being pregnant takes endurance, but it was fine."

Hochhauser said one of the hardest parts of being a representative is trying to juggle everything and respond in an effective manner.

"I try to be available to everyone," she said.

Hochhauser, 40, has been married to David Margolies for six years, and said she likes to swim and read when there is time, but her main interest is politics.

"Wanting to be involved in the district that I represent, and wanting to represent it well encouraged me (to run for office)," Hochhauser said.

Hochhauser was elected in 1988, and started serving her term in January 1989.

After earning an undergraduate degree from the University of Nebraska, Hochhauser attended and graduated from Chapel Hill Law School in 1984.

The most important issues according to Hochhauser are achieving equitable health care and affordable health insurance, and adequate funding for education, particularly K-State.

Hochhauser said the funding of K-State is her highest priority, and she will do everything in her power to support the funding.

Hochhauser said she will be up for re-election this November to continue to represent district 66. Her district includes the eastern two-thirds of Manhattan, and two precincts in Pottowatomie County: Blue Township and St. George.

Hochhauser's stances on other issues:

•Initiative & Referendum: Support depends on how the bill is phrased. However, she did vote in favor of it last year.

•Primary: she supports having a primary.

•Abortion: She said it would depend on the specific issue, but she has a pro-choice voting record.

•Environment: Would like to see continued financial support to maintain and restore appropriate water levels at Cheyenne Bottoms. She has also supported all the recycling legislation that has come before the House.

•Health Care: Would like to see a universal health care system or some kind of health insurance pool. "We can do it at the state level," she said.

•Taxes: Suspects the proposal that comes out this session will be a combination of sales and income taxes, but could also include such things as video lottery.

OUR EXPANDING UNIVERSITY

FARRELL LIBRARY

BETSY BERKLEY
Collegian

Farrell Library expansion has been slowed down more than the dean of libraries expected.

"The expansion will take a long commitment," Dean Brice Hobrock said.

"It may even take a decade to get the job done."

Hobrock said the expansion cannot receive any state money until the Legislature has finished funding other state organizations.

He said the library expansion has taken a back seat because of the sluggish economy.

The expansion is currently on a five-year plan.

"We wish we could start tomorrow, but with the lack of money, we are only hoping to begin construction in 1997," Hobrock said.

President Jon Wefald last spring designated Throckmorton Hall as the University's No. 1 priority.

Since the Throckmorton development is in the process of being funded, the library expansion is now the top priority.

Next month, library administrators will present the results from last semester's library expansion referendum to the Legislature.

The referendum states that if the Legislature does not commit state funds to Farrell by 1996, the money accumulated from the student fee will not go to the library.

Instead, Student Senate would decide on an alternative use for the money.

Funding for the expansion will come from federal and private contributions, student fees and state money.

The referendum commits $5 million in student funds and will be matched by five extramural funds. The library is still in the process of acquiring money from the state.

The total cost of the project will be from $27 million to $30 million, but Hobrock said the exact price of the project is not known yet.

CHESTER E. PETERS RECREATION COMPLEX

BETSY BERKLEY
Collegian

The Kansas Board of Regents gave its approval to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex expansion Jan. 16.

The project will now work its way to the Kansas Legislature for its approval before it can take any steps forward.

Raydon Robel, director of recreational services, said that once the legislative approval is gained, the project will go to the state architect's office, where the job will be advertised.

"It's like a job hunt," Robel said.

"After the applications have been received, these people will be reviewed, then an associate architect will be chosen. It's a long red-tape process."

The proposed time schedule will be revised after the approval process.

The anticipated approval should be received by the end of April 1992 before any construction will begin or an architect will be chosen, said Joyce Halverson, associate director of recreation services.

The chosen architect will bid out to contractors and will oversee the construction. There will be about 60 days to make bids on the project before construction will begin, Halverson said.

"We're not expecting the construction to interfere with the use of the complex," Robel said.

He said recreation administrators will work closely with both the architect and the contractors to make sure the complex is able to operate during construction.

The proposed time schedule sets the start of construction in February 1993 with a completion date of April 1994.

"This would be the worst case scenario," Robel said. "We would hopefully have it done well before then."

Last summer, a feasibility study was done. ■ See REC page 10

CONVOCATION LECTURE

Speaker inspired by King's dream, Bethune's vision

PAM HANSON
Collegian

Arthur Fletcher calls himself the torch bearer and keeper of the flame.

Fletcher, chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, presented "A New Century, A New Challenge, A New Beginning" Thursday in accordance with Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week.

The address was part of the 1991-92 Convocation Lecture Series.

Fletcher was appointed chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights in February 1990.

In 1954, while teaching in a rural elementary school in Kansas, he helped raise money for the pending Brown v. Topeka Board of Education landmark desegregation suit, which was decided in the U.S. Supreme Court.

Besides King, Fletcher also said Mary McLeod Bethune was an inspirational spark for his generation.

Bethune was born 12 years after the Emancipation Proclamation.

Bethune advised five presidents, including Franklin Roosevelt. While advising Roosevelt, she spoke to students at segregated schools and shared her vision about what role education should play.

Bethune was certain, he said, that she would tap into the minds of students in the audience, and that they would become the vehicle that would cause her vision to become a reality.

Fletcher said he became one of those students who grew up and carried on her vision.

One quote from Bethune is what keeps him ticking, he said: "I leave you finally a responsibility to our young people," she once said.

"The world around us really belongs to them," Bethune said. "For the youth will take over its future management.

"Our children must never lose the zeal, in building a better world. They are to be the leaders of tomorrow."

Fletcher said what has to happen, no matter what a person's race, is a pursuance of a common ground and a common destiny with the rest of the world.

Fletcher said he would like to see "an America that is strong, secure, stable, prosperous, in full control of its destiny and beaming with a bright and shining future" by the year 2000.

He also defined what that means.

A nation that is secure, he said, is secure internally and externally. A nation that is stable can stand change which is sometimes radical, and a nation that is prosperous is able to keep its major 24 industries stable.

Fletcher said revolutions start on college campuses.

"I hope to start a revolution right here," he said.

Fletcher said he will speak about civil rights and the importance of education among young people at 34 other universities and colleges.

NEWS DIGEST

▶ DRUGS SEIZED IN SEARCH

Junction City police seized $900 of crack cocaine and arrested three men following a Wednesday search of a home.

A three-week investigation of narcotics trafficking between Detroit, Mich., and Junction City led to the search, said Sgt. William Rich.

Brandon B. Terry, 20, of Detroit was arrested on two counts of selling cocaine and one count of possession and intent to sell.

Willie J. Ben, 35, of 836 W. 12th St. in Junction City was arrested for aiding and abetting the sale of cocaine and possession and sale of cocaine.

▶ STATE RECRUITS ON COAST

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) — An Oklahoma state economic development office operates in Orange County, Calif., to lure businesses to Oklahoma with offers of low taxes.

▶ RACE USED IN PLACING DUMPS

ANN ARBOR, Mich. (AP) — Evidence suggests that hazardous waste most often is dumped in the nation's poor and minority neighborhoods, experts said Thursday during the University of Michigan's Symposium on Race, Poverty and the Environment.

"The evidence is plain. To conclude that it's coincidental just stretches the bounds of reason," said researcher Paul Mohai.

Sixteen studies show income and race to be major factors in deciding where to dump toxins.

▶ KPERS FUND HELPED FRIENDS

TOPEKA (AP) — Business associates of state fund investment managers benefited the most from risky loans that have cost the system millions, lawyers for legislative investigators concluded in their final report.

The Joint Committee of KPERS Investment Practices made public its final report, which went to Legislature Wednesday.

LEGISLATURE

Reservation casinos create jobs, boost economy, tribes say

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian

Promises of jobs and a richer economy are being weighed against legislators' concerns over the logistics of legalized gambling on the Kickapoo Nation Indian reservation.

The reservation, located near Horton will be the site of a casino in the Bingo Hall until a new casino is built in Hiawatha within months.

Gov. Joan Finney recently signed a compact with Steve Cadue, tribal chairman, paving the way for construction of the casino.

Cadue has contracted with Sodak Gaming Supplies of Rapid City, South Dakota, to finance, operate and manage the prospective 100,000 square foot casino.

Hiawatha Mayor Jim Scherer, said more than 1,100 jobs could be created out of the recent compact signed to build a casino on the reservation.

"Hopefully, a casino will bring people into the area," Scherer said. "Tourists coming into the county will allow local businesses to capitalize on tourism and will create a turnover effect in the community."

Scherer compared the Kickapoo tribe with the Red Wing tribe in Minnesota, which also built a casino years ago and said it has been very successful.

"I've been told that during the summer months many college students work at the casino and can make $10 per hour and tips," Scherer said.

Emery Negonsott, Kickapoo tribal council member and counselor in the substance abuse program on the reservation, said the casino will create jobs for everyone in surrounding areas, not just the Kickapoo.

"We are looking for more economic development. Money raised can be put into the school we have on the reservation, our rehabilitation programs, our senior citizen programs and tribal membership," he said.

After many of the expenses are out of the way, Negonsott said, the council's goal is to pay tribal membership through a per capita payment.

Although the proposed casino is expected to create jobs and a richer economy for the Kickapoo tribe as well as surrounding counties, state legislators question Finney's reasoning and authority in signing such a compact.

Also, the deal between Finney and Cadue is not final because there is talk that the U.S. secretary of the interior must also sign the agreement.

Bill McCormick, adviser for federal and state affairs to Finney, said the governor reserves the right to act as the chief executive of the state of Kansas.

"There is no specified process," McCormick said,"Governor Finney is not prohibited, and the Legislature doesn't have specific authority to deal with these compacts either."

McCormick said Finney signed the compact in good faith with the Kickapoo tribe, as required by federal law, and if the Legislature wants to intervene, that is fine. He said how far this matter goes depends on the actions taken by the Legislature.

"The Legislature has a lot of different agendas with regards to gambling. Some people like gambling, while others don't. Some might feel the horse and dog races will be hurt, and others don't like Indians." McCormick said.

Mary Horsch, spokeswoman for Attorney General Bob Stephan, said Stephan doesn't believe Finney has the authority to act alone and should have gone through the Legislature.

LITERARY PROFILE

Author says Kansas rich in history

JASON HAMILTON
Collegian

So much for the image of professional writers as social introverts.

Dr. Don Coldsmith, best known by the book-reading public for his 19-book "Spanish Bit Saga," was in Manhattan Thursday lecturing to fifth- and sixth-graders at Eugene Field Elementary School and autographing copies of his books at Waldenbooks in Manhattan Town Center.

In 1990, Coldsmith won the Western Writers' Golden Spur award for best original paperback of the year, and he has also written more than five other books.

And although he is a professional writer, he has also been a congregational minister, a gunsmith, a taxidermist, a YMCA youth director, a disc jockey, a piccolo player, a grain inspector and a combat medic in World War II.

The "Spanish Bit Saga" is historical fiction set in the early 16th-century American Midwest.

The plot of "Trail of the Spanish Bit," the first book in the series, concerns the introduction of horse culture to the Native Americans in the area and how it affected the lives of both the Americans and the Spaniard who was responsible.

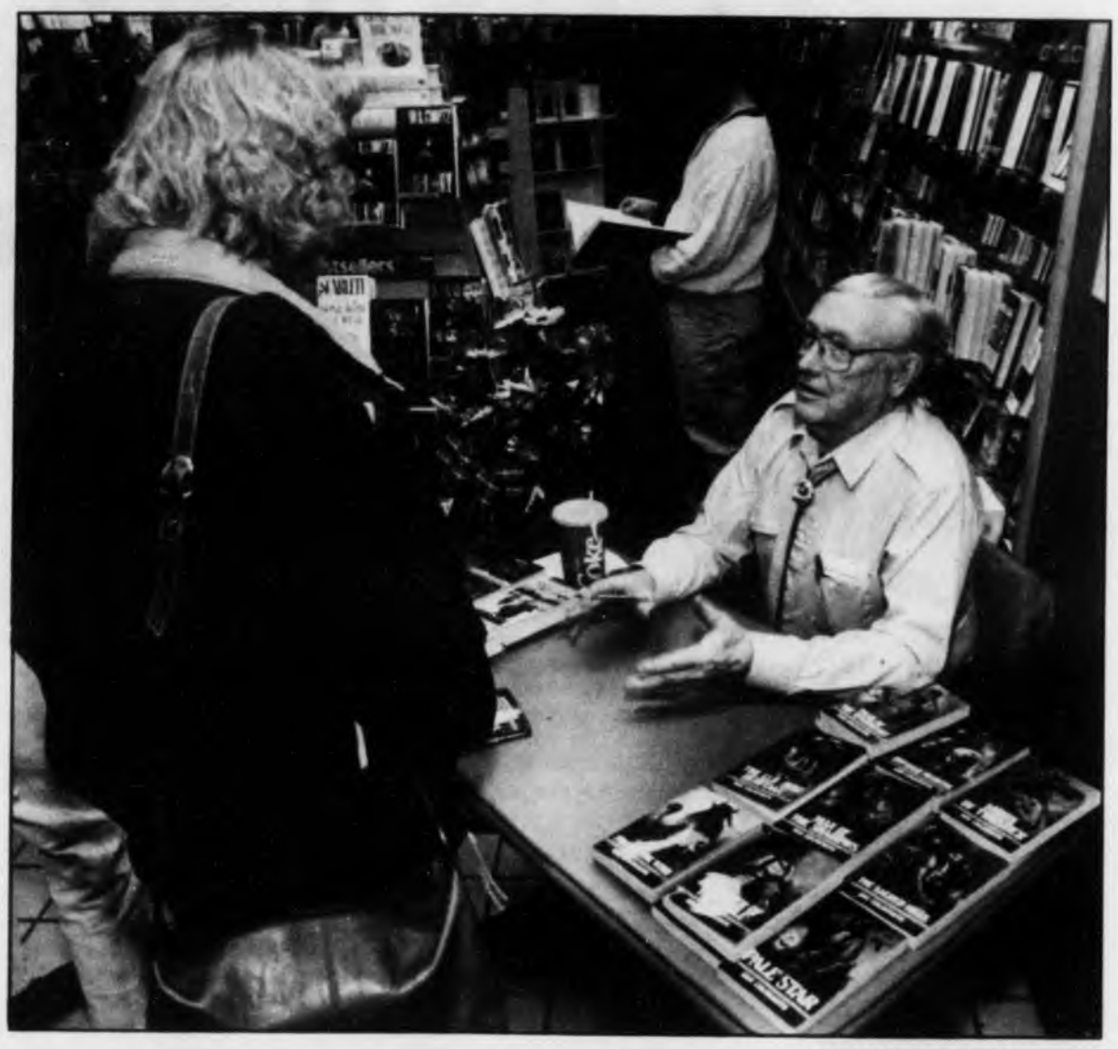
The setting of the series reflects Coldsmith's interest in early Western American history.

He told the students at Eugene Field in his lecture that he believes there is much history in this area, and that it has been neglected.

Coldsmith asked his audiences to imagine a circle with its center in central Kansas and a radius of 200 miles.

In this circle, he said, there is more history than in any other circle of the same size, anywhere in North America.

This area, Coldsmith said, has been claimed, all or in part, by six separate nations: Spain, France, Mexico, the United States, the Confederate States of America and the Republic of Texas.



As Coldsmith signed his books, he explained to several customers why the females in his books are so self-assured and competent.

"I can't identify with the helpless 'heroines' of adventure stories," he said. "I understand capable women much better."

"After all, I'm married to one."

As well as being a prolific writer, Coldsmith was, until recently, a practicing physician.

Coldsmith lives with his wife in Emporia, where, in addition to writing, he teaches a Western American literature class at Emporia State University.

POVERTY

FEMA funds to aid Riley poor, jobless

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian

Riley County has qualified for $31,560 allocated through the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

FEMA aids agencies in providing food and shelter to the poor and unemployed in the area.

The allocation of FEMA money to counties is based on the number of unemployed and the percentage of poverty in the community. The exact allocations will be announced within a week.

Based on a 1980 census, Riley County has qualified with 753 unemployed people and 17.3 percent at poverty level.

David Wright, interim director of the United Way and FEMA board member, said although these statistics seem low, they are increasing.

"If a more recent census was being used, the figures would probably be considerably higher. And we can see it at the church pantries, where demand has been up 300 percent since 1990," Wright said.

FEMA funds are filtered through the community by proposals submitted by agencies. A committee decides which agencies are eligible to receive funding.

The committee — consisting of representatives from the United Way, the American Red Cross, the Salvation Army, church representatives, and city and county commissioners — will review the proposals. Distribution of funds will be within several months.

Although FEMA funds provide temporary help, they are not always enough to support each agency's needs. More than $80,000 in requests were received for the $31,560 in available funds.

Leslie Rose, executive assistant at the American Red Cross, said although agencies, including the Red Cross, may not always receive the amount of money they request, the program is still worthwhile and helpful.

"FEMA provides a good source of relief for the church pantries, because the money they may have spent on protein items in the past can be used in other ways," Rose said.

ROE v. WADE

Court's decision should stand

By the end of its term this summer, the U.S. Supreme Court will have heard arguments on a case that will give it the opportunity to overturn its 1972 decision in Roe v. Wade, which legalized abortion throughout the United States.

If the court, which has been carefully constructed by the Reagan and Bush administrations for just this reason, does decide to overturn Roe, it will hurt itself and the country as a whole.

In years past, the changing membership of the Supreme Court has accepted the principle of stare decisis. Stare decisis, which is Latin for "let the decision stand," assures reliability in the court's interpretation of the law.

Law is, and is meant to be, a permanent thing. As laws change through time, they do so because society itself has changed, often drastically, if not dramatically. When a court changes the law in a society without these compelling reasons it weakens itself as a reliable and credible arbiter of justice.

When the Supreme Court acts to change its mind in an unchanged society, the potential for harm to the country is enormous. At the very least, the court, which is the weakest of the three branches of the federal government, will make itself less reliable and appear to be a creature of the executive branch.

The potential for damage can be seen in the 1857 Supreme Court decision in the Dred Scott case. That decision tore asunder the legislative compromises that had bound the nation together. The Civil War became more likely, if not inevitable.

Such actions by the Supreme Court undermine respect for the principle of rule of law. Rule of law before which all stand equal is one of the most basic philosophical principles of American government. When the law, more importantly the Constitution, is seen as the plaything of a vocal minority, few respect it at all.

Another principle of American government is the preservation of individual freedom. The Bill of Rights, and the Supreme Court decisions which define it, allow each individual to define their morality for themselves. Further, Americans provide themselves the freedom to act on those moral decisions. Roe, which is built on the right to privacy, is a decision in that longstanding tradition.

Nothing about Roe mandates a woman must obtain an abortion. It merely gives her the opportunity to exercise or not to exercise her right to privacy in controlling her own body.

By overturning Roe, the court would, probably, leave it up to the states to decide the questions raised by abortion rights. Many legislators like those in Topeka would begin making moral decisions for the people.

Too much is at stake in tampering with Roe, much less by overturning it. Above all, what may be lost is a court viewed by most Americans as the last bulwark of freedom.

CLARIFICATION

In Tuesday's Collegian, the Editorial Board criticized Athletic Director Milt Richards' claims that the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics will be able to stop sinking further into debt.

Because past promises to avoid greater debt made by his predecessor, Steve Miller, were unfulfilled, Richards' plans, no matter how good they may sound, will continue to be questioned and criticized by this newspaper until those plans prove successful.

In Tuesday's editorial, however, it was inaccurate for the Editorial Board to compare Richards to Exxon Valdez Capt. Joseph Hazelwood. And it was unfair to not describe Richards' plan to prevent the Athletic Department from acquiring greater debt.

THE SWIMMING LESSON

The pool was gross.

Dad always talked about cleaning it, but he never did. The water was green, and as we walked along the edge, we couldn't help but think that a neighborhood cat or two had fallen in and drowned.

Now and then, we would lift the cover to the pool filter. We found dead frogs there, their bloated bodies facing belly-up. They were dead as hell, but somehow when we held their corpses up close for a good look, little voices whispered a warning:

DON'T GO IN THE POOL!
STAY AWAY FROM THE POOL!

Most of the time, we did stay away from the pool. After all, when you're young, there are plenty things to do. We could run through the tall grass of the backyard and dodge the little land mine piles of dog crap, throwing figs at each other. Or we could climb the orange tree and spy over the fence at the neighbors.

Dad found ways to kill time, too. He usually tried to do something constructive, like working on the car or taking care of the lawn. Once in a while, though, we could hear that distant cackle of his that meant he was getting ready to have some real fun.

One day while we were playing in the backyard, Dad marched from the garage and to where our bulldog, Sam, was sitting. Dad picked him up by his hind legs and started spinning him around, faster and faster. Dad laughed the whole time, and then he sent Sam flying into the pool.

Sam was a tough old dog, but he was too heavy to swim. All he could do was walk along the bottom of the pool until he made his way up the steps. As he climbed out, he saw all us kids staring at him and puked in the wading pool.

Boy, did we have a laugh. Then Dad looked at us. The grin widened. The cigarette dropped from his mouth. Dad stepped over the lit butt with his calloused feet, but he didn't feel a thing. He kept walking toward us, and the cackle grew louder.

"I looked down at my own cut-off shorts, the shorts that had been my brother's only a year before. Watching the water drip off me, I knew I had to do Skippy a favor."

TOM LISTER

When Dad grabbed me, I smelled the cigarettes and motor oil on his hands. Then I felt air momentarily and the shock of the water. I fought my way to the surface and dog-paddled to the side. Sam was watching me as I climbed out.

Have you ever seen a dog smile?

When I was older, I had the opportunity to go to the public pool. This pool was clean, because the owners made sure they put in extra chlorine to get rid of all the piss in there. Most kids leak in the pool. Face it.

Anyway, one day I saw another kid and his father. They were straight out of "Leave it to Beaver." The dad was standing in the water, motioning for his son to come toward him.

"Come on," he said, "just a few more steps."

The kid looked like he was ready to have a heart attack. He inched down those steps one at a time. Eventually, he made it to the bottom step and collapsed into his father's arms.

He couldn't quit smiling. In the meantime, his whole family was laid out on towels and watching.

"Look," Ward said. "Skippy did it!"

The family cheered, and Skippy started telling them about it.

Meanwhile, I had fun at the deep end. We could dive down into the water from 20 feet up in a cannonball. BOOM! Screw that form diving. What mattered was how much water we could knock out of the pool. Or we could look for quarters someone had lost down there. The water pressure was enough to make your head explode.

I saw Skippy later, walking along the edge of the pool on his way to the concession stand. His feet made that little pit-pat as he walked along in his stylish trunks, holding those quarters Mommy just gave him. He was getting an ice cream sandwich, I figured.

I looked down at my own cut-off shorts, the shorts that had been my brother's only a year before. Watching the water drip off me, I knew I had to do Skippy a favor.

I pushed him in.

Sure, he screamed a while – don't we all – but he figured out what was going on after he got over his hysterics. He dog-paddled to the edge and got out with some help. At first I thought he was only shivering when he got out, his chest heaving and all. But he was crying. He was really crying.

Well, I dove into the deep end, swam to the bottom and got Skippy's quarters. I crawled out of the pool and put them in his hand, but at first he didn't want to take them. He just kept crying, first little sobs then great big baby wails. He took the quarters, but then he pulled one of his hands away from his crying eyes and pointed a finger right at me.

The first thing you know, all these old people are giving me dirty looks. The lifeguard came over, grabbed me by the scruff of the neck and led me out of the pool. She told me not to come back.

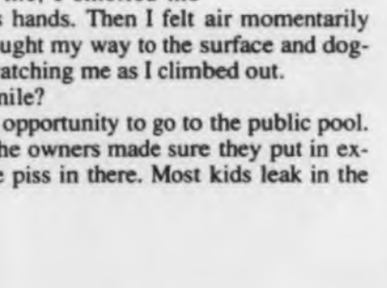
A shattered playground in dire need of repair

The criteria for reading this particular column are simple: You must be either male or female, roughly between the ages of 18 and 28, and entirely disgusted with the world being left to us by the baby boomers.

The time, if it hasn't already arrived, is rapidly approaching when the state of our planet will cease to be the pitted and scarred playground property of those who played there before and will fall into the care of anyone fitting the above description. This lucky group of individuals includes me and, I assume, most of you.



And now the time has arrived for this lost-twentysomething-MTV-boomer-children generation to begin to lay aside the rules and ideas force fed to us by past generations of cold war idealist forefathers. We must allow what is our generation gap to become a generation canyon, separating us from obsolete dogma that requires politically correct views and world democracy, whatever the costs.

In other words, our generation is going to have to temper its dreams with pragmatism, its goals with reality, and view what accomplishments it may achieve as merely the stepping stones to greater achievements. Unfortunately, this won't be easy to swallow for most, because they've already begun to embrace the ideals of their parents: If it ain't broke, don't fix it. The world is the world, and you can't change it. Get rich while you can, build up a fat retirement pension and tour the country in an RV until you kick off from arteriosclerosis or something.

We have a whole bottle, maybe even an entire medicine cabinet, of bitter pills to swallow.

One pill is that there will never be racial and ethnic harmony, at least not until every single person looks exactly like everyone else. But we can strive for racial acceptance. We can allow those things that make us different to also serve to make us stronger. Not as the "black race" or the "white race" or the "red race," but as the human race. And that, like it or not, is the only race that really counts.

Another pill is that America will never succeed as the "great arsenal of democracy" so espoused by a long line of long-winded presidential kings. Our economy lies shattered, everyone is tired of hearing about how other countries are making the United States look so third-worldish, and our collective nose has been bashed far too many times for sticking it where it didn't belong.

JARED GREGOIRE

To elect leaders who don't go blaming our economic woes on everyone else except themselves, who don't say we won a war that was won by no one, and who don't then puke at formal speeches might be the greatest contribution our generation can give to the future.

There's certainly more than a little to be said about that radical faction who believe incumbents are the scourge of God, and I suppose our bloated, self-serving Congress really believes the Japanese should just go and farm rice for awhile while we cry and beat our pillows at night.

Perhaps an easier pill to take is to realize that our defense budget exists only to protect against one enemy — our own self-conceived fears. Is it really all that necessary to perfect the art of war anymore that it already is? The only wars now worth waging are those on homelessness, ignorance, illiteracy and the ideas that people should shut up less they insult some poor soul's precious ego. To live is to speak freely, and to bottle up the voice is to kill the very heart of life.

To be sure, this is not a self-righteous column by some almighty student who thinks he's better than anyone else. No. It's just one voice asking anyone who'll listen that it is possible to rewrite the rules and make them our rules — the Rules of Reality. What has been written is only the very top of the tip of the iceberg on which we live. Let's get rid of the shattered playground left to us and build a park where our own children will be safe to play in.

LETTER

▶TOO MANY NEEDY, NOT ENOUGH HELPING HANDS

Editor,

How ironic it is that as we are remembering Martin Luther King Jr. for his human rights activities, many people are celebrating a Supreme Court decision which ensured that pre-born humans would not be given the same rights as post-born humans.

In his letter to the editor ("Activists should re-channel energy.") on Dec. 5, Brian Bell assumed that Alan Oberley and Matthew Vajnar spend all their free time "writing letters to editors and picketing clinics," rather than helping those mothers who choose not to abort their children. This is as far from the truth as his statement that writing letters to editors is a waste of time. Matt is a volunteer at Life Choice Ministries and is in the process of setting up a crisis pregnancy telephone hotline, and Alan spends his summers working as a camp counselor, has been a playground supervisor, and is a volunteer for the Diocese of Dodge City Youth Office, among other activities.

Do write letters to the editor. Fight for what you believe in. Read everything — all of the pro-choice literature and all of the pro-life literature. Make informed decisions about everything you do. Practice responsible sexual behavior. Do spend your time helping the homeless, the poor and the parents who are without the resources to care for their children. There is one thing we can all agree on: There are many people in need but few who are willing to help.

Area groceries differ in services, prices

Cost of common goods consistent; customers pay more for convenience

ERIN PERRY
Collegian

Having the munchies for a frozen pizza or microwave popcorn can be most economically fulfilled at Food-4-Less.

But for those who want their grocery store to be a bank or a post office as well, Dillons and Dutch Maid supermarkets are the way to go.

A comparison of Manhattan's three main grocers shows they differ slightly in food prices and significantly in services.

Common goods such as milk, eggs, meat and produce are priced consistently among the stores.

Some of the biggest price differences come from pasta, coffee and lunchmeat, which vary by as much as 50 cents to $1 on the lowest-priced brand.

The same size for each product was compared in each store.

Food-4-Less lives up to its name's claim by coming in just below the other stores' prices on almost every item compared.

The differences are as narrow as 1 cent more on Dutch Maid's 5-pound bag of potatoes and as large as $2.30 between Dillons' and Food-4-Less' least expensive 2-pound can of coffee.

A self-serve policy is what helps keep the store's prices down, said Mike Mailea, assistant manager at the Anderson Avenue Food-4-Less.

Customers sack and carry their own groceries, and items are shelved in the shipping boxes they arrive in.

This eliminates about four job positions per day the store would have to pay, he said, and saves at least $17 per hour in paychecks.

"That makes quite a difference. It's one reason we can keep our prices down," Mailea said.

About 60 percent of the store's clientele is students, Mailea estimated, which he partially attributed to the number of apartment complexes near his store.

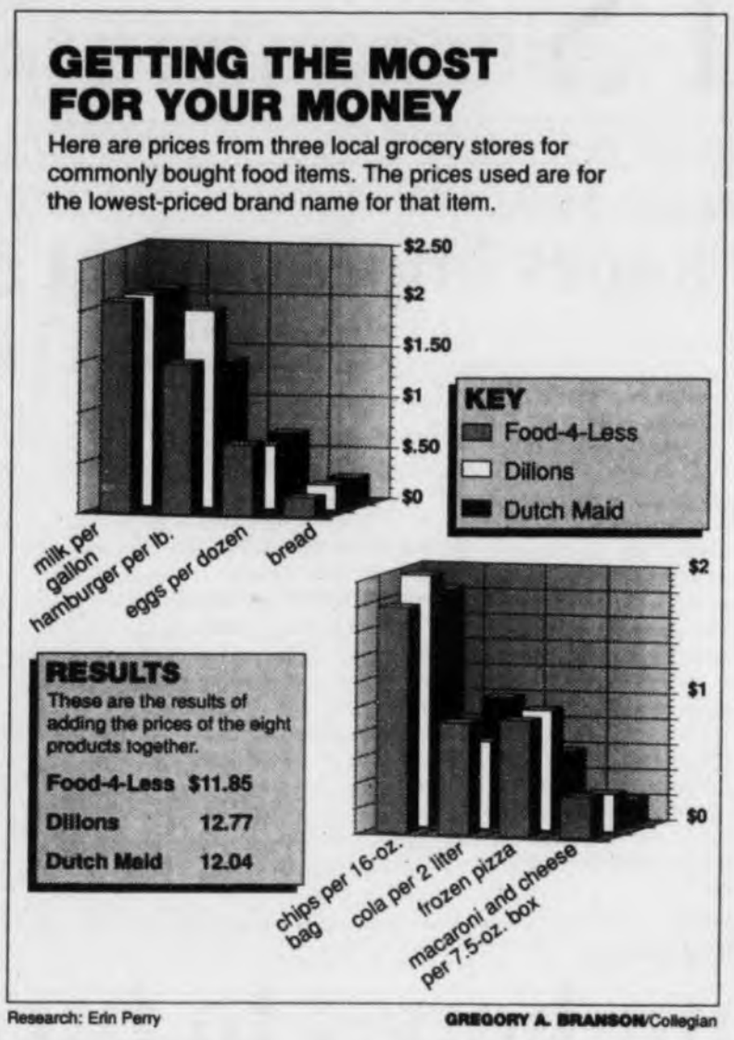
While students often complain of being poor, they don't seem to use coupons any more than other shoppers, Mailea said.

"Today, everyone's pretty price aware and using coupons when they think about it," he said.

However, he said he does notice more women than men using coupons.

Amy Fleury, night manager at the Poyntz Avenue Dutch Maid, said the same thing.

"Some of the men (students) tend to just go through the store and pick up what they want," she said. "They buy things that are easier to fix."



Overall, Fleury said, families bring in the most coupons at her store.

Dillons sees a lot of coupons because it offers double value on them, said George Kandt, manager of the Tuttle Creek Boulevard Dillons. But he said he didn't notice students using them any more or less than the rest of the customers.

Dillons gets about 25 percent of its business from students, Kandt said.

Fleury said the same fraction of Dutch Maid's customers are students. Her store's regular customers tend to be older, she said.

"They appreciate the service they get," Fleury said.

Research: Erin Perry GREGORY A. BRANSON/Collegian

Dillons and Dutch Maid both sack customers' groceries, and Dillons employs "courtesy clerks," whose job it is to sack and carry the groceries to the customers' cars.

Kandt said students seem to take advantage of this service just as much as anyone else.

These two stores also act as banker and mail carrier for their shoppers. Both cash checks without a purchase, and Dillons customers can buy money orders, mail letters and packages, and use the Western Union office, all at the cashier's cage.

Panel discusses understanding among greeks

CHRISTA CONGROVE

A panel of students discussed the importance of further understanding between black and white greeks at K-State.

"Black Fraternities and Sororities: Uplifting the Dream," a Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week event, was sponsored by the Department of Housing and Dining Services.

Tracy Henry, junior in nutritional science and co-coordinator of the program, said she believes Pan-Hellenic, the black greek system, promotes many things that were important to King.

"Black greeks are about leadership, scholarship and a lot of things Martin Luther King stood for," she said.

The program began last year because many people didn't understand what black greeks do, or that they even exist, Henry said.

"There aren't a lot of blacks on this campus from the get-go," she said.

"Most white greeks don't understand black greeks, or even know we exist. At the residence halls, you hear a lot of girls talking about rush. They want to know if we have rush. We hope this program will clear a lot of those questions and misconceptions."

Vanda Oxford, senior in marketing, said she hopes the program will help end misconceptions about the black greek system.

"It will give others the chance to see what we're all about. We're founded on community service," she said.

Unlike last year's program, which offered general information about the black greek system, this year's program focused on Pan-Hellenic's goals, purposes and philosophies.

Pendants, pins and other greek paraphernalia were displayed to depict each chapter's individuality.

The panel, consisting of one representative from seven of the eight black sororities and fraternities, answered questions ranging from their role on campus to how they are contributing to King's dream.

Calvin Mayfield, senior in electrical engineering and Phi Beta Sigma, explained why no one outside of the organization will ever wear the Phi Beta Sigma letters.

"Our reasoning behind that, I guess, is that they haven't earned the right to wear them," he said.

The Phi Beta Sig chapter recently had an all-day literacy program at the

STUDENT SENATE

Interns chosen; program faces evaluation

Routine business was the rule for the first meeting of the semester for Student Senate Thursday night.

Senators took care of swearing-ins and discussed plans for many of the upcoming issues.

After the Senate interns were sworn in, a bill was passed to create a committee to investigate the intern program and recommend changes to make it more effective.

Important upcoming issues discussed included the proposed implementation of an academic minors program, the possible return of ICAT, a ticket campout and a combination football/basketball ticket.

Other issues expected in Senate this semester are the allocation of funds for the fine arts and K-State Union fees, which come up every three years, and the tentative agenda for the K-State lobby team.

The lobby team will travel to Topeka Feb. 10 to meet with legislators and talk about problems with higher education.

The lobbying effort for all Kansas Board of Regents universities was addressed by Tim Nimz, state director of Associated Students of Kansas.

BASEBALL: George gettin' hitched

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — George Brett of the Kansas City Royals is getting married.

Brett, 38, will marry Leslie Davenport of Kansas City, in the "near future," Royals spokesman Dean Vogelaar said, adding that no date had been set.

Vogelaar would not release Davenport's age or whether she had been married before.

The marriage will be the first for Brett, who is in the last year of a five-year contract extended through 1992 with an option for 1993, with the Royals.

Davenport worked in a retail store on the Country Club Plaza mall but recently stopped working, Vogelaar said.

Brett has won three American League batting titles.

FOOTBALL: 'Canes get Chris Walsh

ST. PAUL, Minn. (AP) — Chris Walsh has committed to the University of Miami, where his brother Steve was an All-America quarterback. Chris, too, is a quarterback.

"I decided to commit to the University of Miami because I felt comfortable when I went down there," said Walsh, who completed 107 of 170 pass attempts for 1,828 yards and 20 touchdowns for his high school team last season. "It's a good situation, both academically and athletically."

Miami finished No. 1 in the AP poll this past season with a 12-0 record.

Steve Walsh is now with the New Orleans Saints.

NFL: Esiason to call his own plays

CINCINNATI (AP) — New Cincinnati Bengals coach Dave Shula says he may let Boomer Esiason call his own plays next season.

"Boomer's very much capable of it," Shula said. "It's an option. We've only discussed it. We'd have to look at it in training camp and exhibition games."

Shula, who succeeded Sam Wyche last month, has said he probably will act as his own offensive coordinator, as Wyche did.

Under Wyche, the Bengals signaled plays to Esiason from the sidelines, but gave Esiason the option of altering the play at the line of scrimmage.

"I know I can do it," Esiason said. "I did it in the first half of the New England game, and look what happened."

The backyard warm-up.

Now, K-State's track and field athletes have to face the rough road of strong competition.

After last weekend's indoor season opener at Ahearn Field House, track coach John Capriotti's team will meet Kansas and Missouri at 11 a.m. Saturday at the Hearnes Center in Columbia, Mo., for the Columbia Triangular.

This year's meet is the third annual meeting among the three schools. At the contest, men's and women's individual results in the different events are added to the overall team points. In the previous meetings in Manhattan and Lawrence, K-State's thinclads were the winners.

J. KYLE WYATT/file
John Capriotti expects a battle.

Capriotti said he hopes to repeat the victories in order to keep the trophy in his office.

"We are going into the meeting with the effort just to win as a team," Capriotti said.

"KU and Missouri are pretty competitive teams. The athletes don't necessarily run and jump their best, but when these three teams meet the level of competition is always very high."

K-State came successfully out of the starting blocks with its showing last weekend in its quadrangular. The women placed first or second in 12 of 15 events while the men place in the top two 10 times.

Capriotti said, however, he sees some difficult hurdles on the way to defending the trophy.

"This meet is not the peak of the season. It's another step into the season," he said. "I don't want to burn out the team early in the season."

Each athlete will start in only one event, Capriotti said.

"As a matter of fact, we don't even have starters for some events," he said. "In those cases, we're giving away points."

Injury problems and as-of-yet ineligible transfer students are the main reasons for the inconveniences, Capriotti said.

"Some athletes we're depending on, like Janet Haskin or long jumper Marc Kimbrough, who sits out this season, aren't with us now," Capriotti said. "And we'll miss them."

"The sprint is a little bit thin," he said. "And that's the field we made some good points in the previous meets."

LADY CATS BASKETBALL

Yow hopes improvement continues against ISU

STEVEN ROCK
Collegian

The K-State women's basketball team, 1-2 in Big Eight play, will not overlook cellar-dwelling 0-3 Iowa State Saturday.

"We can't look past a team whether they're No. 1 in the league or No. 8 in the league," Lady Cats basketball coach Susan Yow said. "We're taking it one game at a time."

The players are also cautious about heading into the game with too much confidence.

"We're going to go in like we'd go in against any other Big Eight team," Lady Cat guard Mary Jo Miller said.

According to Yow, the Cyclones — despite an overall record of 2-13 and a last-place ranking in the Big Eight in both team offense and team defense — are not a bad team.

"They have very good guard play," Yow said. "Their perimeter game is good."

It's their team unity that is struggling, she said.

"I don't think they have any chemistry."

A victory in Saturday's game depends on the play of the Lady Cats, not the play of the Cyclones.

"We need to continue the way we've been playing," Miller said.

The Lady Cats have been putting together strong defensive efforts, she said.

"Hopefully our offense will be in sync."

The team needs to go into the contest and play consistent Lady Cats' basketball, Yow said. If such an effort is put forth, she said, "Good things are going to happen."

The Lady Cats, 4-12 overall, were beaten by league-leader Nebraska 87-82 Tuesday. The loss, however, may have been a step in the right direction.

"At this point in the season, it's your mental fram of mind that's so important. I've been real pleased with the team's fortitude."
— Susan Yow

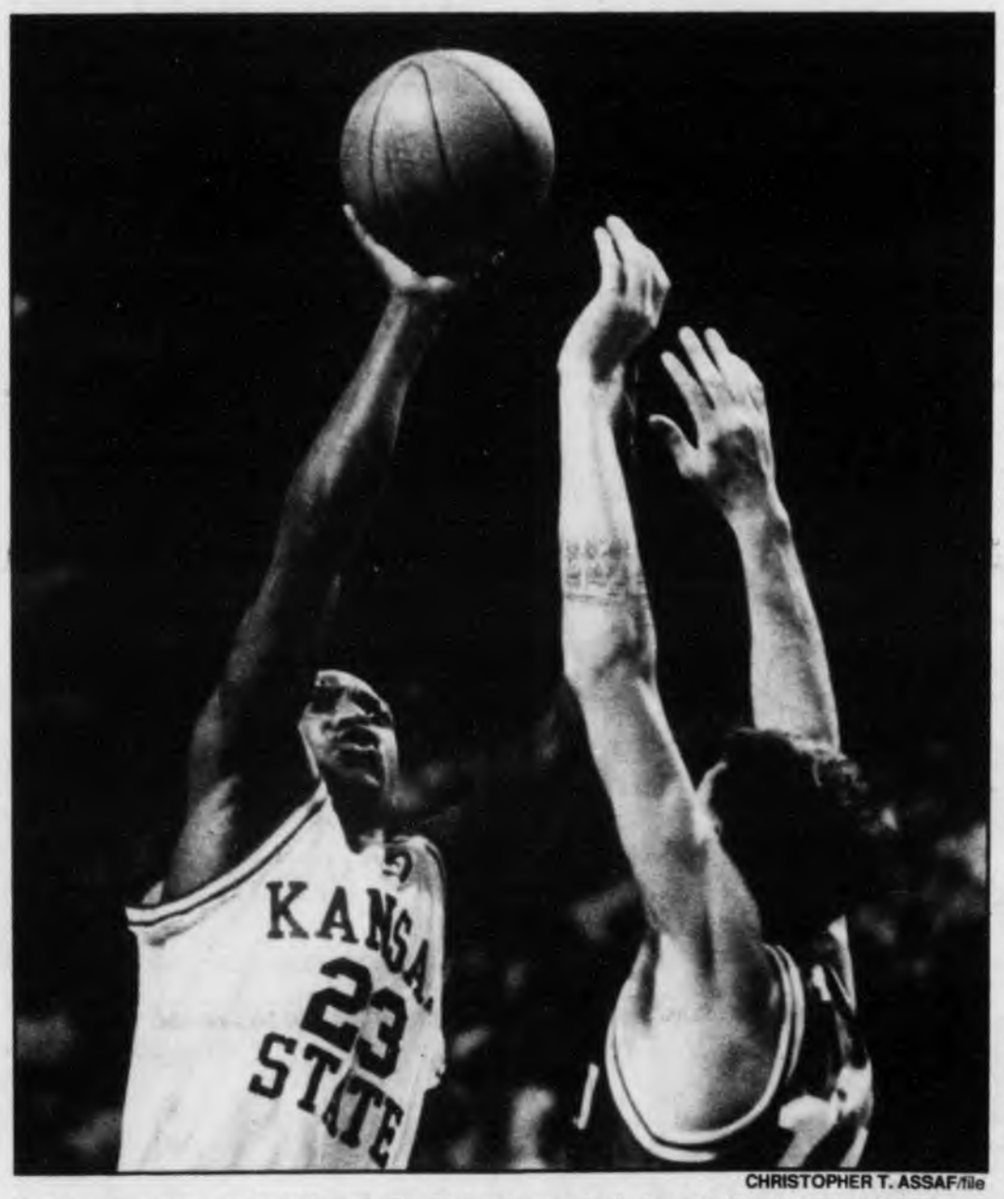
"It's going to give us a lot of confidence to know that K-State can compete in the Big Eight," Miller said. "We surprised a lot of teams."

Yow also said a lot of good came out of the Nebraska loss.

"There was a lot of substance in that game for us," Yow said.

At this point in the season, Yow said, the games depend largely on mental abilities, as well as physical.

"At this point in the season, it's your mental frame of mind that's so important," she said. "I've been real pleased with the team's fortitude."



The Lady Cats seem to have maintained a positive attitude about the season, despite the disappointing record.

Perhaps that's because of confidence built during the new yea has changed their mindset.

"We're going to beat some teams we're not expected to beat," Miller said. "They've got a winning attitude."

Team hopes to turn luck around

PATRICK OBLEY

Two teams, same makeup, different results.

That's the deal when K-State takes another stab into its Big Eight schedule Saturday at Iowa State.

Like K-State, the Cyclones have had several new players come into their program this year, creating a situation where individual play has to be transformed into team performance.

However, the Cyclones are 14-3 and have been ranked in the Top 25. The Cats aren't.

"I am very impressed with the way Iowa State has come together and performed," said Cat coach Dana Altman. "They've beat good teams."

One of those teams was Oklahoma, the team that handed K-State the brutal 117-76 slam last week.

Tuesday, the 'Clones went on a 21-2 rampage to start its non-conference game against Drake. Iowa State went on to win 92-61.

Though Altman said he wasn't sure what venerable Iowa State coach Johnny Orr had done to mesh his team, he did say he knew what he and his staff had to do to get similar results out of his Cats.

"Coaching is getting your team to do what it takes to win," Altman said. "To win you've got to get them to play as a team. We've always had some strong individuals, but that doesn't make a team a good team."

Rather than having several players with great individual talent, Altman said he wants a leader.

"We haven't had anyone step forward," Altman said. "Sometimes, I think a coach has to take that role, but it should be a player."

Altman said he believed such a leader could come from his point guard corps.

"I think the easiest position to lead from is the point guard," Altman said. "At some point, that person has got to say to himself that he's got to be a leader."

Though making the insinuation that he would like to see freshman Brian Henson or Ski Jones step forward, Altman said the choice isn't his.

"There's nothing I can do to influence that," Altman said.

K-State regrouped from the Oklahoma game by dumping its frustrations on a decent Southern Utah team 84-74. In that game, Henson answered the call to leadership.

After seeing the Cat lead dwindle to 6 points, 56-50, with 10:48 left, Henson hit a key trey, stripped T-Bird Rod Dixon for an easy layup and

"Lisa the Greek" chooses a side

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Even "The Simpsons," TV's most lovable cartoon family since Fred and Wilma, got caught up in the excitement in a pre-Super Bowl show on Thursday entitled "Lisa The Greek."

Poor Lisa, in an effort to bond with father Homer, tried to share his interest in football by predicting the outcome of games. When Homer started to win money on her predictions, Lisa started winning Homer's affection.

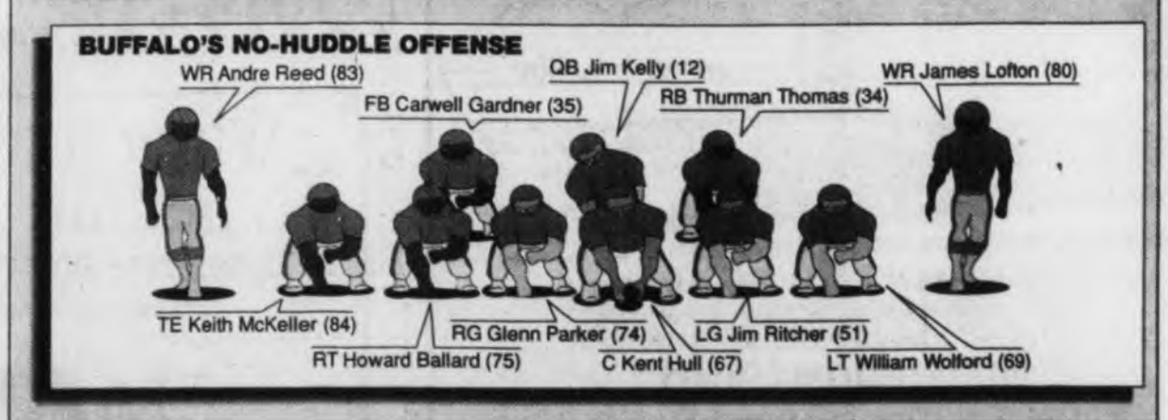
But she wouldn't cough up the Super Bowl prediction after she realized Homer only loved her for her uncanny foresight. Sorry, Homer.

Because the game is indoors at the Hubert H. Humphrey Metrodome this year, it creates problems for CBS.

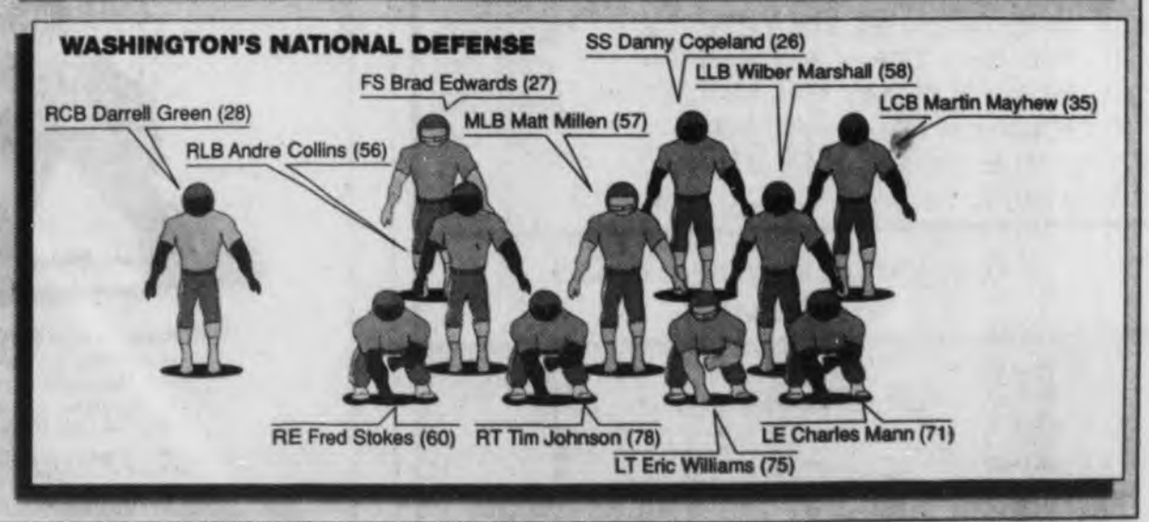
"There is a little problem for those of us who like to see those great, snappy pictures of green grass and blue sky like you have at the Rose Bowl," said Sandy Grossman, who will be directing his seventh Super Bowl. "Indoors, the pictures are always a little duller, a little flatter."

And, of course, the Goodyear blimp is consigned to the role of an outsider in this game, but CBS has a solution.

There will be blimpettes tethered over each goal line.



"Of course, they're not as big as the regular blimp," Grossman said. "They're 25 feet long with cameras that can pan, tilt and zoom right over the goal lines."



Oh, Lisa Simpson's pick, you ask?

She refused to tell Homer, but through the producers of the show, she tolds us: "My dad's betting on Buffalo, so I guess the smart money's on Washington."

SPORTS COLUMN

Public forum not place for coaches to criticize a players' performance

DAVID SVOBODA

Human emotions.

They're fragile, and yet they're seemingly played with by some, likely with no idea of the ramifications that can hang in the balance.

Coaches are in the difficult position of dealing with a variety of different constituencies — assistant coaches, players, fans — and dealing with them in a forum that is almost always public.

As a high-school baseball coach, I'm beginning to learn about handling people — the right way to go about it and the wrong way.

Recently, I received a bit of criticism — coaching, let's call it.

It came in a very public forum, and it was in the form of printed word, readily available for viewing by my most important constituency: my peer group, my friends.

And it stung. It stung like few things I've ever experienced. And though I was at least partially guilty of what was written of me, the way in which the coaching — or criticism — was offered left quite a bit to be desired.

What this personal experience did — accompanied by the recent grace under pressure I've witnessed from Dana Altman — was to bring back to the fore a topic I seemingly get stuck on almost every semester.

That topic is emotion, and it's seemingly inescapable.

Last spring, Lady Cat coach Susan Yow may have made her biggest tactical mistake since she's been in Manhattan, and it had nothing to do with game strategy or recruiting.

It had to do with handling people.

Frustrated that her team was failing to meet the expectations of so many different groups, she lashed out at her players in a very public forum — a press conference.

All the while we sat there, scribbling feverishly, she continued on an unabated roll, seemingly unaware of what she was doing.

Oh, it could be said she was just attempting to motivate her players. And, it's true, only a coach who's been with a team for a great while can make those vital decisions that lead to motivation.

But blasting her team in print did nothing more than rip a scab off an already oozing wound. It's a wound Yow still finds herself trying to heal.

She took a big step in that direction recently with her handling of the decision of Jaime White to leave the team and her suspensions of Joey Ward, Nicole Brown and Michelle Johnson.

Yow handled this situation in a professional manner, and if she was truly angered by any of the individuals in question, she failed to let on in public. What should have been private was just that.

Ward, in fact, has been reinstated, and White, Brown and Johnson have retained enough pride and dignity to have been seen at several of the team's contests since.

As for the aforementioned Altman, he's been a model of consistency lately in what has been a very tough time.

Instead of taking a backhanded slap at any of his struggling players — and believe me, he's had many an opportunity — Altman has simply risen above the fray.

No shots taken at this player for not scoring, none at that player for failing to take a more active leadership role. Altman, in fact, has even assigned blame to himself.

What Altman has done all along, what Yow is doing now and what volleyball coach Patti Hagemeyer — haunted by a rash of player problems — would be wise to do in her second season, is handle internal, personal matters where they should be handled: internally.

The front page of a newspaper is no place to call someone out on the carpet. Neither is a dugout, ala former New York Yankee manager Billy Martin.

"Human emotions, regardless of the situation, can't be played with like Tinker Toys. Tinker with them, and the coach, the teacher, the adviser will always lose, and what's lost normally takes a long time, if ever, to return."

People, I've found, tend to listen more and learn better when they receive instruction in a one-to-one forum. If that doesn't work, the instruction comes in front of teammates, but only in the heat of the moment.

And heat of the moment instruction most always ends with both parties feeling the worse about their involvement.

It's a credit to Altman and Yow that they are handling themselves so well under such immense pressure to perform. It will be Hagemeyer's greatest test to see if she can follow suit.

Human emotions, regardless of the situation, can't be played with like Tinker Toys.

Tinker with them, and the coach, the teacher, the adviser will always lose, and what's lost normally takes a long time, if ever, to return.

BASEBALL

Brett looks forward to proving his worth at spring training

Royals veteran wants to bat third, not fifth in lineup

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — George Brett, designated hitter for the Kansas City Royals, says he's ready to do battle over something dear to his heart as a big hitter — the batting lineup.

"It's pride," the 38-year-old Brett said Wednesday. "I like to hit in the first inning. You get into the flow of the game and get more at bats."

Brett, the first player to win batting titles in three different decades — 1976, 1980 and 1990 — also says he thinks he can get the 164 hits he needs to reach the 3,000 hit plateau this year.

Manager Hal McRae said Tuesday he planned to put newcomer Wally Joyner in the No. 3 spot. That may be, but McRae will get an argument from Brett.

"I don't want to hit fifth," said Brett, a former first baseman for the Royals, who says he's primed for a fight for the No. 3 spot in the batting order.

"I'm going to tell him I don't want to hit fifth, and he's going to say, 'Well, you're better off hitting fifth.' And I'm going to say, 'Well, what happens if I go to spring training and outhit whoever you want in there by 100 points and I have 10 or 15 more RBIs and I hit with some power and I don't strike out and I hit left-handers good? Would that change your mind?'"

Brett also said he misses playing the field and hopes to log time at first base and maybe even third. He said he's feeling frisky right now and was just fitted for a smaller knee brace that should give him more agility.

"If I can stay healthy and play 150, 155 ballgames, it's definitely going to come (the 3,000-hit level). The ultimate would be to do it here in Kansas City in front of 40,000 people. It'd bring the house down, and it'd be a very emotional moment for me."

Brett played 131 games in 1991 and 142 in 1990.

If he doesn't reach 3,000 hits this year, there's 1993.

"I'm not ready to quit yet," he said. Brett will turn 39 on May 15.

But his major effort now is focused on getting that No. 3 spot in the batting order.

"I've always had jobs given to me before," he said. "It's to the point now where I'm a rookie fighting for a job."

Cats

sank two free throws in a one-minute span to give the Cats an insurmountable lead.

Another leader stepped forward in that game as well.

Rusty senior John Rettiger, after spending most of the last three games on the bench, provided 17 minutes and two blocked shots to inspire a slacking defense.

"I really wanted to take advantage of my time in the game," Rettiger said.

"I really wanted to provide some leadership on defense, especially on the little things like defending out-of-bounds plays and setting up the defense as we come down court."

Senior center Wylie Howard said he hopes the pieces are in place to turn around the team's luck in the Big Eight conference.

"You read articles and listen to the radio and get those bad looks around town when you have things like the Oklahoma game happen to you," Howard said.

"A lot of that is because we want to do so much each time we go out there that we get a little too tight.

"But now I think we're all a little more comfortable with each other and ready to turn ourselves around."

"Anything negative that's thrown at us, we can make a positive out of it," Trasel Rone said. "When people talk on us, we'll turn that around and play harder.

"We're all ready for Iowa State. We've got to have this game. We've got to get a win somewhere."

"We can't wait to play Iowa State," Howard added. "All the guys are ready to go up there."

Aaron Collier, who quietly scored 12 points and grabbed 15 rebounds against Southern Utah, may have said it best in uttering a phrase that has been incorporated into the team's persona.

Attina Hanna, Breadbasket executive director, said this year is the first time the Breadbasket has applied. Hanna also said they have created a proposal with the church pantries for high-protein food items.

"When money is tight, we must tighten our resources, and our proposal would do this in a very effective way," Hanna said.

Margaret Freshnock, coordinator of the First Lutheran church pantry, said she is positive about the proposal and working with the Breadbasket.

"This seems like the best way to organize things. The Breadbasket will help us decide what to buy and make sure protein items will be available," Freshnock said.

Freshnock said the extra money will also help the pantries save money.

Manhattan Town Center. The members read stories to children, gave away prizes and encouraged the children to read for themselves.

"We are very involved in the community and will continue to adapt to meet the ever-changing needs of society," Mayfield said.

"What you gain from a black greek organization is analogous to the benefits you would get from any organization — camaraderie, a sense of belong, a unity of purpose, a family away from family."

Two members of Pi Beta Phi sorority said they attended the program because they were curious to hear from the black fraternities and sororities.

"As the Panhellenic delegate for my chapter, I am often asked questions about the black greek system. The women want to do more with the black greek system and learn more about it," Amy Miller, senior in marketing, said.

"This interest has grown even more since we had a member of Alpha Kappa Alpha stay with us during the rotating roommate program last year and our participation in the Alpha Phi Alpha step show," she said.

"The system does so much for the community, and I think people should know about it."

The Pan-Hellenic panelists said they would like to come together with the Interfraternity and Panhellenic councils to work on a community service project.

"If we all work together, we can become a greek system, not a predominately black system or a predominately white system," Oxford said.

Commission denies KPL appeal

Despite December increase, rates should remain steady for 3 -1/2 years

STEVEN ROCK
Collegian

Many customers have not even noticed, but the price of natural gas provided by KPL Gas Service has increased.

For the average resident, a monthly bill will increase anywhere from $3.59 to $6.03.

"I didn't know anything about it," said Char Kinson, junior in general business.

"I probably won't notice, because I'm not real money conscious."

The Kansas Corporation Commission in December approved $39.3 million of a $52.1-million request in rate increases made by KPL .

Wednesday, the KCC denied KPL's request for reconsideration of the full amount.

This means that the monthly bill of KPL natural gas customers shouldn't increase again for another three and a half years.

In November 1991, the KCC prohibited KPL from raising rates until 1995.

The amount of inflation, as well as increased operating expenses, are the reasons given by the KPL for the recent rate increase.

"We needed the rate increase to keep up with the rate of inflation in the general market," said John Johannes, Manhattan division manager of KPL.

"Our taxes and material costs have continued to grow, and the earnings have continued to shrink."

"It's a result of inflation that has continued to deteriorate our earnings," he said.

"This will affect all gas customers in the city of Manhattan and the surrounding area."

For the students at K-State, this explanation may not be enough.

"We're already getting nickeled and dimed to death," Erik Olson, junior in accounting said.

Also, some of the effected students don't agree with the timing of KPL's increase.

"I don't agree with the principle of raising rates at this time," Olson said.

"Being in a recession, it did kind of surprise me that they raised rates."

In 1989, a law was passed that required KPL to take full responsibility for natural gas service lines.

According to Michel' Quakenbush, director of media relations for KPL, this is an important reason for the increase.

"KPL was mandated to assume responsibility for natural gas yard-service lines, which previously were installed and owned by customers," she said.

"This totaled more than 70,000 service lines."

students of the future may change during the planning period, he said. Many of the changes to the library, then, will cater directly to students, because so much of the money for the expansion will be provided by students.

"It is unusual for a state-funded organization to have student contribution, but this just shows how the students feel," he said.

While the expansion will make the library larger and more modern, it also includes funds for renovation and integration with the current structure.

Forty percent of the total cost is designated for renovation.

The library will be totally renovated, said John Johnson, chairman of references and information.

Walls will be taken out, an up-to-date electrical system will be installed, and the primary renovation will be done on the 1927 building, which is the oldest part of Farrell.

One-fourth of Farrell's collection is now in storage at Nichols Hall.

"We are in the process of identifying books and moving them to the old Farm Bureau building (Foundation Center) on Anderson Avenue," Johnson said.

"This should be completed by mid-August. Then, hopefully, it will give us the space we need."

About 20 percent of Farrell's collection will be installed at the Foundation Center permanently by 2020, Johnson said.

There are only 850 seats for 21,000 students, approximately one for every 25 students. The goal is to have one seat for every 10 people.

Since 1982, Hobrock said, 1,000 seats have been lost for the expansion of the collection. The expansion will allow the library to integrate the seating by designating study areas and still having enough room for the collection.

Fifth-year architect students have been doing a programming study of the expansion.

Johnson said these students have been calculating the total space needed by determining the square feet of each unit and how these units interact.

At the semester, these students will be asked to have a report completed and a model of what they have designed turned into their instructors.

"It's been good to have something continuing in front of the public," Johnson said.

"It will give the library a good idea of what a programming study will do for us. Also, it's a real project for the students."

Once the programing, design and funding issues for the expansion have been resolved, the construction can begin. The construction will take place on the south and west sides of Farrell.

"The construction will take many years, and I wish it weren't true," Hobrock said. "But acquiring any state money in this decade is difficult at best."

Negonsott said he disagreed.

"We are in the understanding that this compact does not require legislative action. Other states have had their compacts signed by the governor, as the authority of the state, without any problems." he said.

Negonsott said this is not the first time Stephan has tried to squelch projects the tribe has tried to accomplish.

"We've won almost every fight, and we're going to win this one," he said.

Negonsott said in the past, Stephan has tried to stop a tax compact and a number of other things. He mentioned the raiding of the businesses on a Pottowatamie tribe's reservation and said his tribe had put a restraining order on Stephan to stop him from doing the same on their reservation.

Negonsott said after speaking with Carl Shaw of the department of interior, he and other council members have been reassured that Finney's authority to sign is legitimate.

"It is the law that the federal government supersedes the state in this situation," Negonsott said.

Finney signed the compact under the Indian Gaming Act that states if a state allows gambling, Indians can use and set up casinos as a means of helping the industrial development of the reservation.

Negonsott said the public needs to understand that the Kickapoos are working for their economy and their heritage.

"We don't want to spend our time fighting with Stephan and legislators, we have more important things to do," he said.

Rich Ferone, senior in mechanical engineering and president of the American Indian Science and Engineering Society, said he doesn't think the Kickapoo tribe had much of a choice other than gambling as a means of boosting their economy.

"Steve Cadue has been trying for years to create industry and has been unsuccessful," Ferone said. "When he spoke at one of our functions he explained how he had tried to create legitimate businesses on the reservation, and they had failed."

Negonsott said the tribe thoroughly researched the building of a casino, and it will be done for a good cause.

"For years we have tried to market our area to industries to create a better economy, but many things, like our lack of an adequate back-up water reservoir, have prohibited an attraction to the area," he said."We have been working since 1983 to get it completed, but the money just hasn't been available."

Ferone questioned gambling being the best choice, although he said it may be the only one.

He said gambling may give a distorted view of what reservation life should be, especially to the children growing up there.

"I think it's also possible that gambling can create an addiction because you never know when you will be rewarded. When dealing with a variable ratio, the anticipation can keep you playing the games," Ferone said.

Negonsott said the Indians aren't necessarily promoting gambling as a whole. The new casino will also be accompanied by the building of a golf course and restaurants, bringing more than just gambling to the area.

James Shanteau, professor of psychology, said the key to gambling is the risk and uncertainty of a potential payoff associated with it.

"The prospect of winning is what motivates people to gamble initially, and the thought of what they could do if they were to win," Shanteau said. "I think gambling itself can become a compulsive behavior. People become intrigued with the level of excitement involved,"

He said like an addiction to an addict, gambling can have a similar effect on those who participate.

"I have heard that there are gambling counselors now, but overall I don't think casinos are the root to these problems," he said.

Negonsott said people have the right to make choices and must decide for themselves whether or not they wish to gamble.

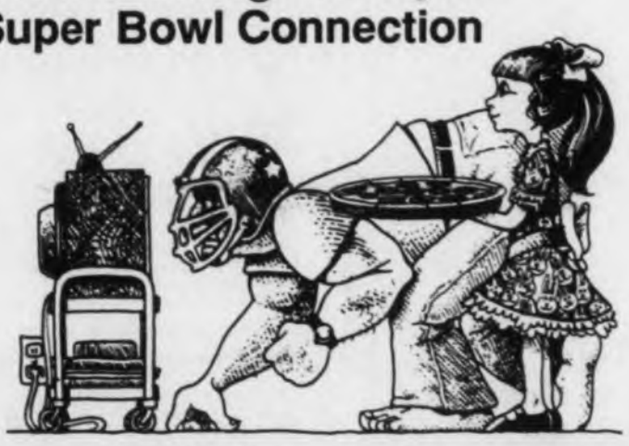
This study provided a ballpark figure as to how much the addition would cost.

The total budget for the expansion is about $7.9 million, based on the square footage requirements, bond capacity and the passed student referendum, Halverson said.

"I'm optimistic about the project, because the total funding for this will come from student fees that are already in place through the retirement of existing bonds," Halverson said.



The expansion will provide larger areas for weight lifting and lounging.

There will also be larger areas for basketball courts, as well as a suspended running track.

Providing there are favorable bids, improved softball fields, improved parking, resurfaced tennis courts and upgraded outdoor lighting will be added. Sand volleyball pits and more storage tanks are also a part of the project.

"Once the building opens, we're just going to be bigger and better," Robel said.

K-STATE 2001

STUDENTS

WHO WILL BE AT K-STATE

CHRISTOPHER T. ASSAF
Collegian

Trying to predict the composition of K-State's student body in 2001, as well as the challenges facing those students, is like trying to use a Ouji board to contact Elvis.

Legislative action, the economic situation and the number of Kansa higher education institutions will determine who will attend University in the year 2001.

"It's very difficult to look in a crystal ball and predict where K-State — but more importantly where the state of Kansas — is going in higher education," said Pat Bosco, associate vice president of institutional advancement and dean of student life.

"Things in higher education change very slowly," Richard Elkins, director of admissions said. "The best predictor of the future is the past. I don't see the University changing much and switching things around."

Elkins said the prospect of qualified admissions will cause students wanting to enter K-State in 2001 to be better prepared.

"Right now any Kansas high school graduate will be admitted. Now, the Legislature is saying we want to be like all the other states (by going to selective admissions)," Elkins said.

"And I think that's going to come because it's an economic factor, because the state is saying we cannot do all things to all people, and we're not going to increase the dollars we're going to put into the University," he said.

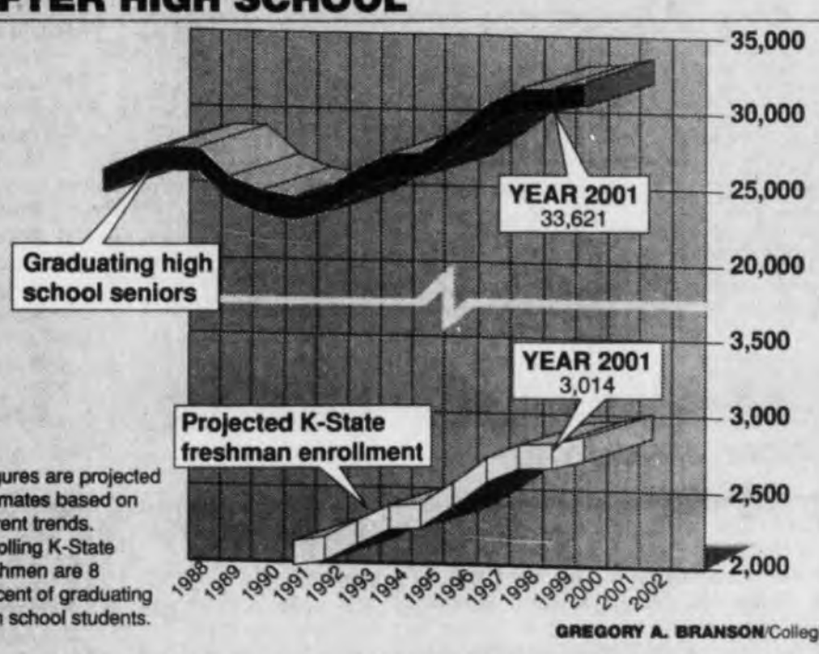
Elkins sees a smaller number of state higher education institutions in the future. He said there is the possibility of more consolidation between schools.

The Legislature will have a big effect on how community colleges will play into this. Legislators will have to ask themselves whether or not community colleges should be under the Board of Regents or stay as separate entities.

"We have a tremendous amount of educational institutions," he said, "and the public, as we get back to looking at dollars, are going to say they cannot afford to support all these, we're going to have to have consolidation."

Bill Pallett, director of assessment, planning and evaluation services, collates the information from which future enrollment projections are made.

Traditionally, anywhere from 7.5-8.8 percent of all Kansas high school graduates attend K-State, Pallett said.



In spring 1982, there were 29,804 Kansas high school graduates eligible to enter higher education institutions. Of those, 2,689 of them attended K-State. In 1991, 26,089 Kansas high school graduates were available, and 2,757 of them went to K-State.

For spring 2001, 33,621 high school graduates are predicted. This number is determined by looking at the number of freshmen who have in the past come from Kansas high schools, the number of third graders currently enrolled in Kansas elementary schools and will go on to fourth grade and the number that will probably attend K-State if it keeps a consistent market share.

Anywhere from 2,522 to 2,958 freshmen will want to attend K-State — a

FRANK KLEEMANN

While 2001 is still nine years away, the University's enrollment management team's job is to live for the future.

Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement, heads the team that recruits students to K-State.

"We have a centralized intention in the recruitment program," Bosco said. "The team was established by President Jon Wefald in 1986, and we were able not only to increase the number of the students here, but also to significantly increase the quality of all enrolled student body over the last five years."

Wefald said the team was created because of the decline in enrollment from 19,500 students in 1981 to 16,500 in 1986.

"At that time, many of K-State's alumni, faculty and students were concerned about the future of K-State," Wefald said.

Wefald and Bosco said they agreed the enrollment management team has been a success.

Football debate leads to stabbing

TAD MUSSELWHITE
Collegian

Police have arrested a Fort Riley soldier in connection with the early Saturday morning stabbing of a K-State student in Aggieville.

Patrick S. Saavedra, Headquarters and Headquarters Company 2/ 16th Infantry, Fort Riley, was charged with aggravated battery and confined in lieu of $5,000 bond, a Riley County Police Department official said.

Bruce Hamill, sophomore in business administration, was allegedly stabbed by Saavedra at the end of a fight that erupted in front of Hardee's and moved into an alley behind Bushwackers.

Saavedra was arrested around noon Saturday.

Norman Chase of Fort Riley said the fight started after two men argued over which team was No. 1 in college football: Florida State University or the University of Miami.

As the fight progressed, Hamill, attempting to separate the two, became involved and was stabbed. The man who allegedly did the stabbing then ran from the scene, evading the crowd that was watching and police, who were on their way, Chase said.

Hamill walked away with the wound in his side. The RCPD located him at the Kwik Shop at 14th Street and Anderson Avenue. Hamill was then transported to Memorial Hospital with a stab wound to the lower left side of his rib cage and admitted in stable condition.

Hamill was kept in the hospital for the weekend and was scheduled to undergo tests to determine whether the knife caused any internal damage, said Rob Randall, sophomore in physical education. Randall, who is Hamill's roommate, was also a witness to the incident.

Hamill and another friend were standing in front of Hardee's teasing each other over which college football team was best, FSU or Miami, Randall said. Then another man came along and intervened, starting the fight.

Randall said Hamill's friend ended up fighting this man, despite several efforts to walk away.

"Hamill was thrown against a fence, and after Hamill defended himself, he got stabbed," Randall said.

Another witness to the incident, Terry Wackly, junior in finance, said that he looked out the window of his apartment at 525 N. Manhattan Ave. and saw two men fighting in the alley behind his apartment.

Wackly said one man clearly had

Breadbasket director resigns after 5 years

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian

Atina Hanna, executive director of the Flinthills Breadbasket, resigned this weekend, during the organization's 10-year anniversary.

After working with the local food bank for more than five years, Hanna said it was time for new blood and leadership at the Breadbasket.

"I have resigned primarily because the Breadbasket is at a good point now. It is on its way to doing many things," she said.

Hanna said her resignation was a positive action.

"In the long term, it will benefit the people the Breadbasket is serving, to continue looking at the needs of the community rather than one person trying to achieve goals from years before," she said.

Linda Thurston, Breadbasket president, said the Breadbasket board is not making any big changes as a result of Hanna's resignation, and their mission remains the same.

"We are still working with the same strategy to involve the community in various parts of our mission, which is to alleviate hunger and poverty," Thurston said. "We will miss Atina and her tremendous energy and commitment to the Breadbasket."

Thurston said a search committee will seek a replacement for Hanna, and the current staff will take over her responsibilities in the meantime.

"I don't think the community's commitment to Breadbasket will change," Thurston said. "The people, the volunteers and the board believe in what we do."

Ruth Ann Wefald, former Breadbasket president and current board member, said she has nothing but the highest praise for the kind of job Hanna has done.

"She's one of the most compassionate people I've ever known."

Brax forced to leave K-State in mid-semester

BECKY DARBY
Collegian

Jeff Brax, freshman in business administration, was forced to withdraw from K-State in the middle of last semester because of a rare disease no one knows much about.

Brax is currently at home in McPherson.

At first, the illness didn't appear to be too serious, Brax said.

"I thought it was just a sinus infection," he said.

When the sinus medication didn't work and the disease started to affect his lungs, he was taken to the hospital where it was thought he had pneumonia.

The disease was finally diagnosed as Wegener's disease, an auto-immune disease that can affect any part of the body.

The disease has affected Brax's lungs, sinuses and small intestines, causing bleeding, which makes repeated blood transfusions necessary.

The disease is officially called Wegener's granulomatosis. It is an uncommon disease with an unknown cause.

Brax was in intensive care for 17 days at the beginning, spending three or four of those days in critical condition. A normal hemoglobin count for someone Brax's age is 16. His count was down to five, causing the need for blood transfusions every other day.

"It was pretty scary at the beginning," Jill Brax, Brax's mom, said.

She said the support has been really great from the staff at the hospital. She and Brax's father take turns spending the day at the hospital with Brax.

Brax has been in and out of the hospital for the last several months with setbacks, trying to get the disease into remission. Steroids and chemotherapy are the treatments being used to get the disease under control.

The first year to year and a half are the hardest, Brax said.

He has had to have over 50 blood transfusions in the last two months. After the first year or so, after the disease is under control, Brax will have to continue having blood tests every few months to check the disease.

There is also an increased chance for other diseases to develop later in

▶ CLINTON DENIES ADULTERY CHARGES

PORTSMOUTH, N.H. (AP) — Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton and his wife, Hillary, sought to put to rest lingering questions about whether he, a Democratic presidential candidate, has been faithful to their 16-year marriage.

Appearing on a special edition of "60 Minutes" and in an interview with the Associated Press, Bill Clinton vehemently denied allegations of a 12-year affair with a former Arkansas TV reporter.

The allegations about the affair were made by Gennifer Flowers in an interview in the supermarket tabloid Star.

Star paid Flowers for the interview.

"There's nothing I can do to stop people from saying things for money," Bill Clinton said. "It's not true."

Flowers is scheduled to appear at a news conference Monday. Hillary Clinton predicted Flowers would not back down.

"She has a contract with the Star," Hillary Clinton said.

Manhattan firemen squelch the final flames of a fire that burned 17 portable restrooms to the ground and heavily damaged six others at a storage facility at 2150 Fort Riley Blvd. late Saturday night. A cause has yet to be determined. User fees become popular nationwide

JANELLE ESAU
Collegian

Recipients of government services are paying more of the costs at all government levels as user fees are becoming more common.

A user fee is an extra fee paid by someone using government services.

"The ideology, pay as you go, has become much more of a predominant strain," Aruna Michie, associate professor of political science, said. "When you have deficits going up, the tendency is to say people will pay for it as they go."

K-State President Jon Wefald said he agreed.

"With the national debt we have and the national federal deficit — yet the demand for services are skyrocketing — I think you'll see more and more user fees in the next 10 years, and that, no doubt, will have impact on public education," he said.

This trend can already be seen in education through the rising costs of tuition.

"It's difficult to determine the extent to which that's an intended trend versus something that results due to the lack of other tax monies," said Ray Hauch, director of planning and budget for the Kansas Board of Regents.

Hauch said the proportion of educational costs that were paid by the students was 25.8 percent in the fiscal year 1986. Right now it is 30.8 percent, and if the governor's budget is adopted for 1993, the proportion would be 32.9 percent, or roughly one third.

"We've certainly seen an increase in the rate of user participation in tuition in our own state. Now part of that is clearly intended, because there is an opinion on the part of many legislators and board members that earlier it was entirely too low," Hauch said.

Engineering is another example of a user fee.

"That's what the engineering students of K-State decided, that they would self-assess themselves for allowing the College of Engineering to purchase state-of-the-art equipment," Wefald said.

Kenton Epard, junior in electrical engineering and Engineering Student Council treasurer, agreed in part that the engineering fee is a good idea.

"As long as we're seeing positive results from it, I see it as an investment in the future," Epard said.

Epard also said, however, that he thinks it should be the state's responsibility.

"That's like the library. The students kicked in the money to entice the state down the line to see if they will give us some money for it," he said. "As far as I'm concerned, that's what I'm paying my tuition for, but if they don't have enough money, then we've got to have it, that's the bottom line."

Mark Evans, member of the Engineering Student Council, said the engineering fee was a necessity because of the threat of the loss of accreditation.

Evans said he thinks the public really does not oppose user fees because there are some advantages.

"People put their taxes in a big fund and it goes out to other countries, and they just don't realize how their taxes are spent," he said. "But when they are forced to pay for something on top of that, I think they'll use it more to their advantage. I think people appreciate knowing where their money is going."

William Richter, head of the political science department, said the government turned in the direction of user fees during the "Reagan 1980s."

"The federal government cut taxes, reducing much of the support for social services at the federal level and putting the burden on the states," he said.

Richter said "foolish moves" were made at the state level to eliminate public support when states cut taxes instead of taking advantage of the windfall taxes at the federal level.

John Exdell, associate professor of philosophy, said user fees are a regressive measure to fund government services.

"The support of government services should come from income tax gained according to the principle of the ability to pay," Exdell said. "When user fees are assessed, they tend to land heavily on those with a lesser ability to pay, which results in a regressive rather than progressive cost.

"Society as a whole should pay for services, if there is a social reason for providing services, based on the ability to pay," he said.

Dole announces re-election bid

MITCH HIXSON
Collegian

The chorus of cheers is all anyone needed to hear.

That is how people knew U.S. Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., would indeed run for re-election to his fifth six-year term as Kansas' senior senator.

Dole announced his long-awaited decision Friday afternoon in Topeka during Republican Kansas Day activities at the Ramada Inn Downtown.

Senator Dole said he decided just earlier in the day on Friday to make the announcement in Topeka.

"I told Liddy (his wife Elizabeth) just this morning that I was going to go ahead and announce it. And I haven't said a thing about it until right now," he said.

His decision to run or not has been a big question mark for Kansans the past few months. The biggest question about Dole was his health.

Dole is 68 years old and underwent prostrate surgery to remove cancer only five weeks ago.

The Republican party was also concerned about his health because if he experiences health problems and cannot complete his term, Democratic Gov. Joan Finney would appoint a successor.

There was some speculation he might retire. But, Dole assured the overflow crowd at the press conference Friday that he is feeling fine. He said his surgery was a success, and he has no concerns over his health.

"I have a certificate of health if people want to see it," he said.

Dole said he will need to take the next two or three months easier than normal, not working late at night or early in the morning, but after that he will be back to speed physically.

Due to the anti-incumbency mood pervading the nation recently, Dole said the election will be difficult this year.

Dole said one of the reasons he decided to run again, however, was the fact that Kansas continues to lose congressional representation. Kansas will have only four in the coming election compared to six when Dole was first elected.

"Small states such as ours have to keep their strength," he said.

Controversial artist to be showcased

Curry's son-in-law discusses option for University to expand collection

JENNIFER NICHOLS
Collegian

The son-in-law of Kansas-born artist John Steuart Curry visited K-State Thursday to see his father-in-law's art.

Daniel Schuster, a retired psychologist from Rush, N.Y., dined with President Jon Wefald and his wife Ruth Ann, to discuss the possibility of purchasing more of Curry's works for the University.

Curry was born in 1897 on a farm near Dunavant. In 1916 he began studying art, and in 1919 he became a freelance illustrator on the East Coast.

While on the East Coast, Curry gained recognition as an artist for his painting "Baptism in Kansas." The painting portrayed a girl baptized in a stock tank.

According to the book "Rethinking Regionalism" by M. Sue Kendall, Easterners liked Curry's paintings because they provided a window to the lesser-known world.

"Curry's New York audience, weary of the monotony and mass culture and commercialization all around them, had appreciated the novelty of witnessing a country baptism in a stock tank," Kendall wrote.

"In a curious sort of way, they had discovered a pure, unchanging and primitive culture existing within their own."

However, Curry's paintings were not as well accepted in Kansas.

Kansans did not like Curry's paintings, Kendall wrote in the book, because they thought the paintings showed a negative stereotype of Kansas.

Daniel Schuster, Curry's son-in-law, said he did not know exactly why Kansans disliked Curry's paintings. Schuster said he guessed it was because Curry painted the dark side of Kansas — such as in his paintings of tornadoes and drought.

"He wasn't interested in just painting pretty pictures," Schuster said, "he was interested in painting some of man's soul."

In 1935, K-State purchased the first of six paintings by Curry. Jessica Reichman, K-State assistant art curator, said K-State was the first institution in Kansas to recognize Curry and buy his paintings.

"They wanted to honor Curry," Reichman said. "They wanted to acknowledge his contribution to art."

Schuster said Curry was a modest and unassuming man who is just beginning to get the recognition he deserves.

"His colleagues and friends, Tom Benton and Grant Wood, had acclaim and fame, and he never shared in that." Schuster said. "But I think that's changing now, and as I put it to somebody, it's his turn to have his day, you know."

The six Curry works that K-State owns include three prints, a drawing, an oil painting and a watercolor. They will be displayed in the new art museum. The value of each is unknown, Reichman said.

Big Apple native opens big-city bar

A new bar opened its doors in Aggieville Friday night with the intention of bringing a little bit of the big city to the Little Apple.

Club Soho, occupying the old Amigo's location in Aggieville, 710 N. Manhattan Ave., is owned by Len Potillo, who said he is striving for a big-city atmosphere.

"We wanted a place that is more upscale, where you can dress up," he said. "Where friends can go to have a good time and dance."

Potillo, originally from New York City, came to Manhattan seven years ago, and said he has been toying with the idea of opening a bar for some time.

Potillo said he likes Club Soho's location.

"Although there have been some cosmetic changes to enhance the place, Amigo's had some nice stuff that reflects the image of Club Soho.

"The atmosphere and architectural element makes it," he said. "When you step through the doors, you're not in Manhattan, Kansas, anymore."

Potillo said there is a dress code for the club.

"We don't want people to cop an attitude," he said. "Baseball hats and jackets with an affiliation are some of the restrictions."

CAMPUS CRIME

■ On the K-State campus last school year, only one rape was reported to the K-State Police. No one knows how many rapes actually occurred.

EDITORIALS

Mysterious "missions" unsafe and immature

Thursday afternoon a female student leaving a women's studies class was asked by a tie-and-sportcoat-wearing male student to give him her name, address and phone number.

Similar incidents, no doubt, were happening in other halls in other parts of campus.

Grow up guys, whoever you are.

Little "missions," as the tie-and-sportcoat-wearing guy called it, are stupid, degrading and immature. And hazing, in case you've forgotten, is against the law. But even these are not the most important reasons this incident was so very wrong.

Campus safety is the real issue.

On a college campus where statistics say one out of three women are victims of rape or attempted rape and better campus lighting has been a priority for the past few semesters, things like this aren't funny.

And women, if something like this happens to you, don't give out your number. Unless, of course, you enjoy prank phone calls or goodness knows what else at all hours of the night.

Who knows if these "missions" are from God, the greeks or the CIA. But they have no place on a college campus where our mission should be enlightenment, not regression.

And men, have some respect for yourself, as well as the people you are pestering. And find something better to do with your time. Maybe enrolling in a women's studies class yourself would be a good start.

Young generation must lose apathy

The economy, the environment, the crime rate, the future. It all sucks.

And no, it's not our fault.

But no one else is going to fix it.

Arthur Fletcher, chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, told his McCain Auditorium audience Thursday morning he hopes to start a revolution. He said revolutions begin on college campuses.

They begin here.

Our elders call us the most apathetic generation of all time. Let's face it — they're right.

In China, students are crushed by tanks for what they believe in. We can't even take five minutes in the SGA office to register to vote.

We should be challenging the establishment and demanding change.

We're not.

If the "save the world" mentality seems too overwhelming, start by saving ourselves.

We need to arm ourselves for the future. College is a great place to start.

Pick a major that will be in demand in the future. If your current major isn't, find a way.

Decide on a personal game plan for the next five years or the next 10 years. See yourself reaching a lofty goal.

Become an informed voter. If you don't vote, don't complain.

As Fletcher said, a strong nation is one that is both internally and externally secure. It starts on an individual level. It starts with us.

In terms our generation can easily understand: "Just do it."

GOOD TIMES, EASY MONEY AND A DEAD LANGUAGE

"Speaks Latin, that satin doll"— Duke Ellington

So I take this class about John Milton. I open the book to the first reading, Milton's juvenile elegies, and the damn things are in Latin. Jesus, I don't know from Latin beyond E. Pluribus Unum and E. Coli. A translation is provided to make sense of the mess, but I forecast boredom.

The first poem slinks by like a panther escaping a tribesman. Maybe by turning off the CD player I can get closer to the text. So as not to offend the three other guys in the room, I wait for the song to finish.

It's a long song. Perhaps long enough to play a game of Tetris on the roommate's Game Boy. Surely long enough for a Pabst Blue Ribbon. Hell, hand me two. Studying — even back at Hold'emdown High I knew K-State would be rough.

Milton wrote his elegies and prolusions 350 years ago when he was about twenty. No one had held a conversation in Latin for some time, although important men wrote important ideas in Latin rather than English. Nowadays, Latin is more arcane than literature or alchemy; a professor kept here and there just in case, like cryogenically frozen cadavers.

ED SKOOG

Latin finally died in America sometime during the FDR years. My grandmother tells me she had to learn Latin in grammar school back in Virginia. She says she liked Horace and Ovid but didn't care much for Homer and Virgil. I thought she was talking about geeky boyfriends. My father had to take some Latin in high school but doesn't remember any of it. A high-school pal wanted to learn Latin, but the last Latin teacher was already dead.

So Latin's dead, and many people are glad. Next afoot is a movement to teach urban children "Street English," under the double belief that these children will never leave the inner-city so they don't need to learn the language of the suburbs ("the language of the oppressor" — Adrienne Rich). This shows a decline in concern for teaching structure, and also asks: Why teach people fancy stuff they'll never use? Cui Bono?

I know jive roughly as well as I know Latin. I suspect one can do marginally well without either. But when educators are afraid of teaching irrelevant concepts, education itself becomes small. Relevant information becomes relevant once learned.

Should K-State require Latin for the bachelor's degree? Yes. A person should also drink eight glasses of water a day and eat liver once a week. No well-adjusted person would suggest it.

Smart and stupid alike tend to side with the business or agriculture major when he or she whines at liberal arts requirements to fulfill their degrees. "Why should I learn Latin? Why do I need to know grammar? I'm never even going to use this crap!" Even the liberal arts major may chime in with these alarms. But is utility the reason colleges exist? Should a university be judged for its percentage of efficiency, like a machine?

A quick digression: From where I stand, which is admittedly far away, the business major seems to learn nothing he or she will not learn again after getting a job. Calvin Hall is little better than a vo-tech or a DeVry franchise, not to insult certified diesel mechanics. The widget manufacturers in the College of Business Administration sometimes become important and influential, so they shouldn't be summarily expelled. Teach the young CEO how to read, because ethics don't come from Business Ethics 110. Morals edge their way in through side doors, like Jehovah's Witnesses and burglars. The title of Milton's seventh prolusion translates to "Learning Makes Men Happier Than Does Ignorance." Perhaps dreams of future income have been substituted for Latin.

This last maxim, however, doesn't explain my position. Why drink beer, listen to punk rock and play video games instead of study? My investments in beer and CDs have very meager returns. But they're damn fun. General decay is always fun. Which killed Latin, money or boredom? The culprit is a cousin to both — cheap and easy entertainment.

Spiro Agnew, the revered statesman, said in 1970, "Today the student goes to college to proclaim, rather than to learn." I don't know whether he knew any Latin, but it doesn't matter anymore. Spiro is dead. These are happier days. We won the last war and a television is always near. You can get a college degree on low-interest loans and never have to learn anything. College is now a form of entertainment, like a Disney cartoon before the real flick.

Confessions of a traveler

It was cold in Mexico. Sergio, our waiter, explained this to us. The cold north winds came over the mountains from El Paso, he said.

Still, we enjoyed ourselves. Not only was Sergio a good waiter, but he was great for conversation. And the three beers only cost $3.25.

"You obviously see Americans down here all the time," I said to Sergio. "But don't you ever get tired of them?"

"Oh, they're all right," he said and smiled, "but if I went to a different country, I think that I would go with an open mind."

Sergio explained that when he approached Americans and invited them to sit down and have a beer, they were frightened. He said they probably thought he had a knife or something.

Sergio copped an American accent and did an impression for us.

"Leave me alone!" he yelled.

We laughed and sipped our beers. Silly goddamn Americans.

Of course we went back to Juarez that night. America doesn't have everything, you know. Mexico has cheap beer.

We crossed the border and walked along an old highway that led to the city. There were holes at the sides that had been there since its construction. No one had bothered to fill them. A person could get hurt falling into one, we noted.

Damn, the night was cold.

"Well, mister, we're in Mexico," Shawn said.

I kept thinking of other things. I thought of the college student who had turned up missing in Matamoros when I was a freshman. The guy had gone out drinking in a border town, and the next thing you know, they cut out his brain in a ritual sacrifice. A friend of mine was in Matamoros that same night. He told me how the guy's friends had frantically asked everyone if they had seen him.

"Why the hell didn't we take a cab?" I asked.

A little later we saw a cab, and we decided to hop in. The driver spoke broken English, and I spoke broken Spanish. We managed. I told him we would like to go to a tourist bar and have a beer.

TOM LISTER

He said that he knew a nice place with buenas muchachas and grinned. Cool, I thought. There probably would be nice girls everywhere, considering the number of universities in the area. Yes, I said, we'd like to go to a nice bar, a tourist bar.

"Buenas muchachas," he said again. It had become a magic word. In the meantime, Carlos pointed to sites along the road. "Nice church," he said.

The tourist section passed us by like a small town. The neon lights disappeared, and Juarez began to look like news footage of Beirut. We came to a stop.

"Buenas muchachas," Carlos said, hopping out the car and opening our doors for us.

I kept saying "tourist bar." Carlos kept saying "nice place." We went in.

The first thing we saw as we walked in the door were bedrooms. They were on each side of the hallway. Some of the doors were open; others weren't.

"This is a goddamn whorehouse," Dave said.

We had joked about whorehouses before we left for Mexico. I had wondered if you could trade your shoes for sex. I had pictured myself staggering out of a whorehouse barefoot with a bottle of Corona in my hand. It wasn't too funny now, though.

The girls were polite. They sat down by us as soon as we entered the bar. We ordered four beers (one for the driver) for $12. My heart started doing the bass line from "White Wedding," and I took up smoking again. It was the best cigarette I've ever had in my life.

Shawn's girl did the talking. She looked like she was 45 and a little heavier than Shawn.

"You'll love the donkey show," she said, "only $40."

"No," I said. "We just want a beer. I think we're in the wrong place."

"OK," she cooed, "$20. You'll love the show — American women, Mexican women, Oriental women. You can all be in the same room if you want."

Most people there spoke Spanish, but I think that anyone in the room could see what was going through our minds by watching us chug our beers and chain smoke. We could see the girls were amused.

When we got back to the motel that night, I took a warm shower while the other two watched television. Then I changed into a pair of sweats, fixed an extra-strong bourbon and Coke and walked out to the balcony. Juarez was a couple of miles away now, but I could still see the lights of the city in the distance.

Dave came out and offered me a cigarette, but I waved it away.

"What's the matter?" he asked.

"You know, Dave" I said, standing safely on the balcony, "We should've screwed them whores."

LETTER

▶COLUMNIST PUTS BLAME ON WRONG GENERATION

Editor:

This is in response to Jared Gregoire's opinion column in the Collegian of Friday, Jan. 24.

I think, Mr. Gregoire, that you have done a grand job of confusing generations. To be specific, you accuse the Baby Boomers of leaving the world in such a mess for your generation. Mr. Gregoire, a little research would have uncovered the fact that the Baby Boom Generation (hereafter referred to as BBG or simply Boomers), includes everyone born between the years 1946 and 1964. That means anyone who is now between the ages of 28 and 46.

Speaking as one who was born during the first year of the BBG, and who is now approaching the ripe old age of 46, I don't think I am ready to leave the world to anyone — no matter what its current shape — simply because I don't feel like I, or anyone from my generation, has possession of the world. I'm not yet ready to leave the world, period.

Think about it, Mr. Gregoire, not one BBG member has yet been elected to be president of the United States, nor attained top leadership in any of the major countries of the world. Likewise, most of the senior positions in Congress and the Senate are held by those from the generation ahead of the BBG. Our corporate leaders are from that same previous generation. Even the top administration positions of our colleges and universities are filled by those from the generation ahead of us Boomers. Now, I ask you, how could we have made such a mess of things when we're not even in charge yet?

However, that is not to say that we have not yet had effect. Indeed, which generation do you think raised the first issues of environmental stewardship and made them a national concern? Which generation marched alongside Martin Luther King Jr. in Washington and witnessed, cheered and took to heart his "I have a dream" speech? Which generation first examined its relationships with those of color within its generation? Which generation began pushing for equality between the sexes? Which generation was sent to serve in Vietnam and who's veterans have been and are still treated with scorn and neglect? Which generation has seen more of its numbers living out their lives on the streets than ever before in the history of this nation? Which generation is the first generation in this country to suffer a decline in standard of living compared to the previous generation?

The answer to all of these questions should be obvious to you by now: the BBG. Finally, which generation wised up after the angst and turmoil of the 1960s and determined that blaming the previous generation was ineffectual and that changing the system from within would be a more fruitful route? Us, again.

When I finally do retire some 25 years from now (if I'm lucky), I doubt that I will be able to jump in my RV and tour the country before I kick off and make room for you. I probably won't be able to afford it. You see, my generation is the one that is now providing the funds for a rapidly dwindling Social Security system. I'll be damned lucky if any of the money I contributed will be there when I get to it.

In sum, Mr. Gregoire, it is too, too simplistic to blame an entire generation for the ills of the world. Certainly we, like you and your generation, have used our share of resources. But, I like to think that maybe we are trying to use them just a little better than the generation before. And, perhaps your generation will use them better than mine. Perhaps your generation will finally arrive at the unity of the races and cultures begun by mine. Perhaps your generation will manage to establish and sustain world peace. Perhaps your generation will find solutions to war and poverty and crime and overcrowding and injustice and violence. I hope so. Because you see, I have children in your generation and I don't want their lives to end up worse than mine. That was, after all, the wish of my parents' generation too.

9.6 to 13 percent increase over the 2,302 that came to K-State in fall 1991.

"We know through demographics that we're going to go through another couple of years of decline in high school graduations," Bosco said, "and after about the fall of 1995 the number of students graduating from Kansas high schools will increase."

By the end of 2000, there will be about a 20-percent increase in high school graduates from 1995 to 2000, he said.

"So on one end of the equation, if everything remains the same and K-State's market share continues to be the same and we're rewarded for taking more students, you can see K-State being larger than it is today," Bosco said.

The state has recently showed its unwillingness to provide K-State the money to finance its growth from more than 16,000 students in fall 1986 to more than 21,000 in fall 1990, he said.

"The likelihood of K-State growing unchecked during the last part of the 20th century is remote," Bosco said. "K-State has had to face the reality that money doesn't follow students. We're interested today in maintaining our enrollments around 19,000 to 20,000 students. I would predict unless the Legislature begins rewarding K-State for attracting Kansas students, you may find caps. You may find K-State attempting to keep its enrollments in a range where we can continue our quality to our students.

Elkins said funding for higher education will remain the same. He said he doesn't see a decrease or an increase in the amount of funding unless there is a dramatic political turnaround in the Legislature.

As it appears now, ability to receive help to gain access to a college education will be more difficult. Tomorrow's students will be paying an even larger slice of the bill than they do today.

"Without the state's help, Bosco said, "the people who have access to more money will be the ones who can go to school in the next century. Just because a student has a job does not mean that student will be able to work to pay for a college education.

"The state has got to provide some kind of fiscal leadership to help offset these rising costs of higher education," he said. "To pass it off as tuition increases is going to deny access for a college education to thousands of people. I am more pessimistic today then I have ever been."

The fiscal woes of higher education institutions will continue to bite into students' pocketbooks. Because K-State will have financial limitations on what it can do for a student, the financial problems will clash directly with goals the University wants to achieve and will run counter to the charter of the land-grant mission of K-State, Bosco said.

"That's what troubles me. The cost being passed on to the student is on a collision course with issues like demographics and our interest in increasing diversity (among the student body)," he said. "You look around not only at K-State but other land-grant institutions, and they're dealing with the same financial challenge. I don't see it getting any better, not in this present quagmire we're in, but we've been through tough times before.

"You have to look long range past the narrow range," Bosco said. "People will come up with new and creative ways to finance higher education. But there are times I do get a little down about it."

The financial aid area is where ideas are being developed for the future to ease the student's burden. The freshman or transfer student in the year 2001 is probably going to need more of it.

"Taking into consideration financial aid policy," said Mike Lynch, director of the academic assistance center, "if requirements are more lenient and there is more financial aid available, we get more students.

Tuition will continue to go up and won't be able to meet the student's fiscal needs, Bosco said.

"I don't see that changing, I see that exacerbating," he said. "There are several financial aid proposals being debated now in Congress. If we don't receive more of a sympathetic ear, we could find ourselves even more out of balance for low as well as middle income."

Middle income people who pay more in taxes than they or their children receive in financial aid will begin to question the system, he said.

"It's much different now, now it is based upon need. I predict there will be more merit coming into play — that if you can't cut it, or there is a prediction through ACTs and high school performance that you have a less likely chance of being successful, that you may be cut off from some kind of financial aid."

Tuition will most likely be more expensive at Kansas regents institutions, but the question remains as to whether or not K-State will change in its breakdown of the student's flat fee.

Elkins said he sees the flat fee for tuition changing. Also, he said there will be more fees in the individual colleges, based on the fact the engineering fee went through without much opposition from either the state or the students.

Bosco said he disagrees.

"The egalitarian philosophy that is historical at K-State is all students pay about the same," he said. "I don't see the engineering fee spreading as a trend. I see us moving towards a per hour, or maybe after the 15th hour you would pay more.

"I would hate to see us move down the road of nickel and dime our students. I like our philosophy where everyone pays the same."

Changing the size of minority students at K-State concerns Bosco and Elkins.

"We know the non-white group is going to increase dramatically and the white group decrease. There's no question about that. Translating that into who goes to school, most certainly we're going to see some changes because of the shift in the makeup of Kansas' population. You're going to see more non-white students, and K-State forever has been basically middle-class white. How far that's going to go I don't know," Elkins said.

Both Bosco and Elkins predict that money to pay for support services will not increase dramatically enough to allow K-State to alter significantly the number of minority and international students.

"The diversity issue is going to be there, and we're going to respond to it," Bosco said, "but I don't know how because it's going to take more money."

According to the registrar's office enrollment figures, 89 percent of the 16,168 students at K-State were Caucasian in fall 1986. In fall of 1990, 88 percent of the 21,137 students were.

"Since 1981, changes in non-white and foreign students has increased," Elkins said, "but not as much as hoped for. It takes an infrastructure to support international and minority people. With international students, there's so much more need of support for them in terms of interior support than a regular student. Minority students, too.

"If you are going to bring more in, you are going to need more of a support staff," he said. "I'm a little discouraged for the future looking at the dollars available to the University right now. There are so many factors, I can sit back and say yes, there are going to be a lot more non-white students. How much, I don't know, because I don't know how much of this support is going to come in."

Bosco said K-State could significantly increase the international population, but the University is reluctant to do so until it can accommodate them.

"We're not going to sell something we can't provide," he said.

Despite the economic pitfalls, Bosco is confident the student body will continue to change in the direction of diversity.

"Our student body is showing significant progress in diversity, and that will not be derailed," he said.

Another question facing K-State in the next century is how many students will be from out of state.

Since fall 1986, non-resident figures have not changed. In 1986, 20 percent of the student body was non-resident. In the fall 1990, the percentage was also 20. The registrar's office enrollment figures from fall 1990 show 4,176 of K-State's 21,137 students were non-resident. In the fall 1986, the earliest figures available, 3,179 of K-State's 16,136 students were non-resident.

Elkins doubts the University will change in its makeup of resident and non-resident students. Recent changes in tuition paid by out-of-state students tend to discourage them from Kansas schools.

"Right now, 15 percent of our enrollment is non-resident," he said. "I guess that won't increase too much. I think the action they're taking the past few years — increasing the non-resident fee — is a way of keeping that non-resident number down.

But along with the changing diversity of the state, the age of those going to school will probably go up. In 1982, 168 students were first-time, non-traditional freshman. In 1991, that number increased to 182.

"I think our student body will be a little older," Bosco said, "We're seeing signs of that now, where about 12 percent of our student body are over the age of 23 in our undergraduates. I think that trend will continue."

With changes in the industrial segment and the national economy, more people will need to be re-educated or need to earn a different degree.

"We need to make a concerted effort to address the needs of the non-traditional student," Leonard Bloomquist, director of the K-State population research laboratory said. "Many rural people will need retooling in education."

Although there will be a need for continuous education, Elkins said he doesn't see a significant growth in non-traditional students.

"I see the age going up but not as much as other areas," he said, " because K-State is not within a 60-mile commuting distance like Kansas City, Wichita and Topeka.

Predicting the future and making assumptions will always be difficult, Elkins said.

"There are so many factors," said Elkins, "no one can predict how they're going to come out.

Bosco

"If you go back to 1986 and you think about where we are today, I have to say our enrollment management team did an excellent job," Wefald said. "We've recruited the best students in the state."

Close to 25 percent of all valedictorian and salutatorian students who graduated from Kansas high schools during the years the team was at work came to K-State, he said.

Bosco said K-State's recruitment approach has been the key.

"We won national awards," he said. "We are a model for other colleges."

To make sure the number of students coming to K-State will stay steady over the next few years, the team developed a program that keeps the future very much in mind.

"It's a very aggressive, coordinated recruitment program," Bosco said. "We have, as part of our program, a systematic approach to market services and focus groups."

Bosco said market research and meetings with high-school counselors, K-State freshmen and transfer students give the team a picture of what is working well and what needs to be improved.

"I don't see that changing as we approach the year 2001," he said.

He said he does see changes, however, coming for the registration and enrollment processes. He said he is optimistic that students will soon find enrollment and fee payment easier and more efficient.

"We were making some significant investments in computer technology," he said. "I think within the next few years, we may see things like mail-in fee payment, an automatic system for financial aid and voice registration."

With the new computer technology, Bosco said K-State will improve the services to students and faculty to be as consumer orientated as possible.

And since the number of students wanting to come to K-State will inevitably continue to increase, the new technology will become more and more valuable, he said.

"In the year 2000, there will be 20 percent more graduates from high schools than there are in May 1992," Bosco said. "It's very important that K-State maintain the enrollment management program so that enrollment will stay steady through ups and downs in the future."

Thinclad Cats continue domination of Columbia triangular

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

COLUMBIA, Mo. — The trophy stays in Manhattan.

The K-State track and field team defended its title at the Missouri "Sport Shake Challenge" triangular Saturday at the Hearnes Fieldhouse in Columbia, Mo.

After switching the lead during the meet several times with Kansas, Coach John Capriotti's team finished first with 132 points in front of KU (117) and Missouri (80) to win the meeting for the third time in a row.

Coming into the meet with the priority to win as a team, Capriotti was satisfied with the result.

"First of all we're happy to win," he said. "We had some injured people and a few events where we didn't have anybody. We were real thin. That made it a pretty close meet. I think the most gratifying thing is that it was a total team effort."

A strong team commitment was necessary to repeat the two previous meet wins. Right before the final relays and the men's triple jump, K-State and KU were tied at 98, with Mizzou back at 68.

While the first relay started, Dante McGrew won the triple jump with a meet record of 50 feet 3 1/2 inches for the Wildcats.

The Cats won men's and women's 1600-meter relays, in which KU placed third each time and failed to score. With a win in the men's 3200-meter relay and a second place finish in the women's 3200, K-State was assured the overall victory.

"We have some very sore sprinters, but they sucked it up to win the relays," Capriotti said. "And we really needed them."

For the women's 3200, Capriotti even had to use Jennifer Hillier, who had finished fifth in the 3000-meter run just 20 minutes before.

"That's the type of effort we've gotten from the kids," Capriotti said. "And basically, all the way down the line, all the kids did a great job."

K-State athletes won 16 of 31 events with the men finishing first in their last six events. Additionally, the Cats took second in 10 events.

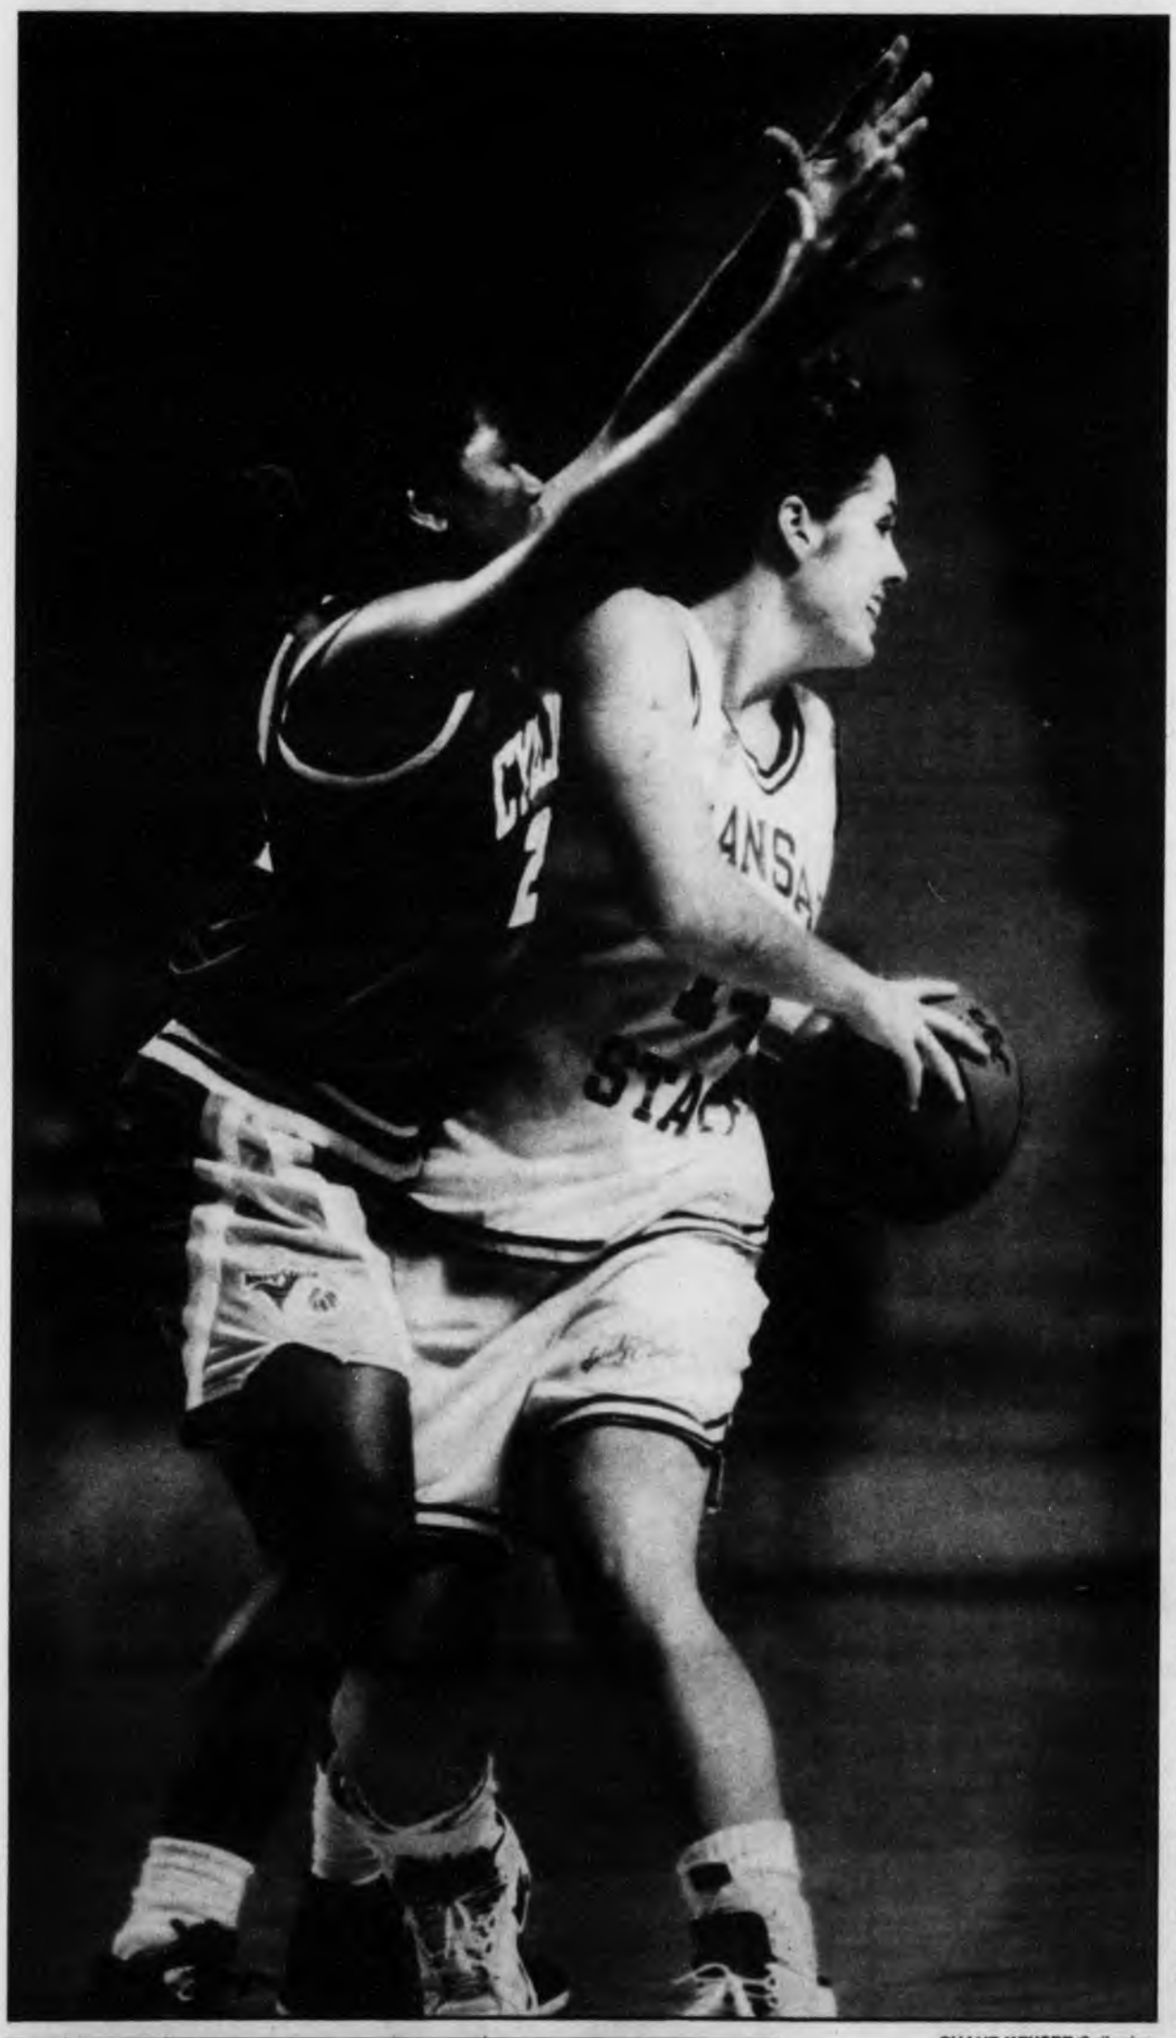
At the triangular, the teams' total points were the sum of the single event points. For first place, the teams received five points, for second place three, and two and one points for third and fourth, respectively. The relays were worth five and three points for first and second place.

One of the best events for K-State's point total was the men's 55-meter dash. Thomas Randolph, Gerald Benton and J.J. Smith, all football players, finished first, second and third.

"I can't say enough about the football players on the team," Capriotti said. "Gerald, J.J. and Thomas, those guys came here to compete."

But, Capriotti said, the sprinters, men and women, weren't the only contributors to the team's win.

"We won the 600, 1000, 3000 and 3200 relay on the men's side," he said. "The men's middle distance runners had a real good meet."



Besides the runners, the jumpers also had a successful day.

Both women and men won the high jump and triple jump competition.

"Connie (Teaberry) and Gwen (Wentland) had very good attempts," said assistant coach Clifford Rovelto about the women's high jump.

Solid rebounding and defense lead Lady Cats to 67-48 win

Team hopes improvement continues after home rout of hapless Cyclones

STEVEN ROCK

This time, it wasn't even close.

After a string of four gut-wrenching games that ended in two tough conference losses, the Lady Cats handled the Iowa State Cyclones decisively, 67-48, Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum in front of 429 barely audible fans.

"We can really feel good about how we're playing," K-State coach Susan Yow said.

The Cats improved their conference record to 2-2 and their overall mark to 5-12 while dropping the Cyclones to 0-4 and 2-14.

The Lady Cat victory was largely due to the intense level of play in the opening half, which ended with the Cats perched atop a 33-18 lead. The initial 20 minutes included a 17-3 Lady Cats run, and the Cyclones could never claw back into the game.

The 18 points by Iowa State in the first half is the worst output by a K-State opponent this season.

"I think the players were really focused in the first half to come out and get a big lead," Yow said. "And they did that."

They did that by, once again, playing solid defense, which held the Clones to just below 30-percent shooting from the floor.

Also, the Lady Cats held a 26-12 rebounding advantage, including a 10-1 offensive rebounding edge, at the midway mark, led by senior center Jennifer Grebing's nine first-half boards. She finished with a career-high 11 rebounds.

"It's amazing what happens when you box somebody out," Grebing said with a chuckle. Grebing tried to concentrate more on keeping her player in check than she had in recent games.

"Something that you have to keep focused in your mind is 'Find that girl, and go get her,'" Grebing said.

"I thought Jen had a great first half," Yow said of Grebing. "It was just fun watching her. She was really, really aggressive."

On the downside, the Lady Cats didn't keep up the same intense level of play for the final 20 minutes, said senior guard Mary Jo Miller, the game's leading scorer with 18 points. She also had a season-high eight assists.

"I think we lacked a little in the second half," Miller said. "We tried doing things that we shouldn't have done."

"I just don't think we were focused in the second half," Yow said. "I don't think the players think we were focused."

Yow didn't appear to be too worried about the second-half letdown, however, which included a 26-17 Iowa State rebounding advantage.

"I think in the second half we kind of lost it," she said, referring to her team's tough mental focus. "And I think that's to be expected."

Despite K-State's declining second-half performance, the Cyclones were held to just eight points in the first 9:45 of the second half.

Saturday's victory marks the third consecutive meeting between the Lady Cats and the Cyclones that has gone to K-State. The Cats, who hold a 28-5 advantage over Iowa State, including a 14-2 mark in Manhattan, have won seven of the last nine meetings.

"We got to play a lot of people," Yow said. "And I'm glad for that. A lot of people got some experience."

In fact, for just the second time this season, every Lady Cat who played scored.

Cats' return to Big Eight play ruined by horrid second half

Huge 19-2 Cyclone run, poor shooting doom team to 85-59 battering on road

COLLEGIAN STAFF

To the optimist, there was a slight improvement in the Cats' fortunes regarding their play in the Big Eight Saturday — they actually held a nine-point lead in the first half against Iowa State.

To the pessimist, the Cats still got destroyed.

K-State's 23-14 lead evaporated in 97 seconds under a hailstorm of Cyclone 3-point goals. After that, Iowa State never looked back, charging to a 85-59 victory.

At least for awhile, K-State didn't look like the team that had been battered so badly in its previous league forays against Oklahoma and Oklahoma State.

"I was pleased with the first 20 minutes," Coach Dana Altman said. "I thought the players did a good job executing what we planned."

Though Cyclone Skip McCoy's barrage of treys quickly ended the early Cat domination, K-State was only down by four points at the half, 38-34.

Up until halftime, the Cats had employed a successful mix of man-to-man and zone defenses, stopping the Cyclones' inside game and perimeter game when either attack began to work.

All of that didn't matter in the second half though. After Wylie Howard scored the first points of the second half with a put back, Iowa State's Justus Thigpen countered with a trey that sparked seven unanswered Cyclone points.

That run triggered an avalanche of Iowa State buckets. A 45-36 Cyclone lead became a 54-41 lead, then a 69-49 lead, then a 74-50 lead, then a ... well, you get the picture.

Iowa State's largest lead came at the 2:25 mark of the second half when it had opened up an 81-51 margin. That margin was opened up by a torrid stretch of Cyclone shooting and a horrid stretch of K-State missing.

From 13:11 to 2:25 in the second half, the Cats made just two shots from the floor and just two free throws. During that drought, sandwiched between baskets by Gaylon Nickerson and Vincent Jackson, the Cyclones went on a deadly 19-2 run, punctuated by two dunks by Fred Hoiberg and a barrage of treys by McCoy and Julius Michalik.

McCoy's game-high 17 points had caught the Cats off guard. Coming into the contest, McCoy had made just six treys all year before burying three of three against the Cats.

"Never heard of him," Howard said of McCoy. "He came in and was launching. I don't know if he spent the night in the gym or what."

Brian Henson admitted the Cats didn't pick up on McCoy like they should have.

"We let him get one, then another, and another," Henson said. "You'd think we'd start guarding him after two in a row."

As a team, Iowa State hit six treys, all during key stretches, mainly against a collapsing 2-3 zone defense, not a man-to-man perimeter-killing defense.

"We didn't feel like we matched up very well in a couple of places," Altman said. "It kept them off-balance for awhile, then McCoy had those three 3's and really set us back."

In the second half, the Cyclones shot a searing 76 percent compared with the Cats' meager 25 percent. The 26-point margin of victory marked the Cyclones' biggest win over K-State since a 74-39 killing in 1946.

"We're going to look positive at the first half and learn from the second half," Altman said.

With the loss, the Cats fell to 9-6 overall and 0-3 in the Big Eight. The Cyclones improve to 15-3 and 2-1. Next up for K-State is Wednesday's non-conference game against Missouri-Kansas City in Bramlage Coliseum.

SUPER BOWL XXVI

No-huddle? No problem: Redskins use it, defuse it in 37-24 rout of Bills

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) — The no-names on Washington's defense were too much Sunday for Buffalo's no-huddle offense.

The Redskins won their third Super Bowl in 10 years, 37-24, putting the game away with 24 straight points after a scoreless first period in which they blew two touchdown chances.

The Bills, one-point losers to the New York Giants in the Super Bowl a year ago, never were in this meeting of the teams with the two best records in the NFL. Only two touchdowns late in the fourth quarter made it seem that way.

This Washington win was as much the work of obscure defenders like Kurt Gouveia, Brad Edwards, Fred Stokes, Jason Buck, Alvoid Mays and Andre Collins as any of the team's stars.

"Our defensive guys gave them a lot of looks and I think that held them," Redskins coach Joe Gibbs said.

Sure, MVP Mark Rypien was 18 of 33 for 292 yards and two touchdowns as Washington ran the NFC's streak in the NFL's marquee game to eight straight.

Sure, the "Posse" — receivers Art Monk, Gary Clark and Ricky Sanders — led a 17-point explosion in 5 minutes, 45 seconds of the the second quarter after a scoreless first period. That surge saw the Redskins use the no-huddle offense themselves in a modified reprise of their record 35-point second quarter in their Super Bowl rout of Denver four years ago.

But just as important was the work of a blitzing defense that shut down the NFL's most explosive offense until the Redskins had that lead.

It sacked Jim Kelly five times, got four interceptions — two by Edwards, one of five Plan B free agents who start on defensive coordinator Richie Petitbon's unit. It also forced a fumble in helping Gibbs to his third Super Bowl win, tied with San Francisco's Bill Walsh and one behind Pittsburgh's Chuck Noll on the all-time list.

Kelly set a Super Bowl record by throwing 58 times, and completed only 28 for 275 yards.

It held Thurman Thomas, the league's MVP this year, to just 10 yards in eight carries through the first three quarters, limiting the league's leading running game to just 15 yards over that period and without a rushing first down until midway through the third.

Thomas finished with only 13 yards on 10 carries, and was never a factor, either.

"We gave them a lot of different window dressing. I think we confused them early on," defensive end Charles Mann said.

Frustrated them, as well.

Trailing 17-0 and having had a couple of officials' calls go against them, Bills coach Marv Levy railed at the refs as the half ended, and television cameras caught him apparently shouting "you've been bought" at field judge Ed Merrifield.

It got even worse for the Bills before it got better.

On the first play of the second half, Gouveia returned an interception forced by Collins' blitz to the 1. That set up Gerald Riggs' second 1-yard TD run for a 24-0 lead.

The defense did it again when Mays sacked Kelly, forcing a fumble that was recovered by Stokes. That set up Chip Lohmiller's 25-yard field goal that made it 34-10 six seconds into the fourth quarter. And the third was Edwards' second interception, tipped to him by Martin Mayhew and returned 35 yards. That set up Lohmiller's 39-yard field goal for 37-10.

"Early on, they put some pressure on me," Rypien said. "But they didn't get to me. We were still able to make some plays."

And that more than made up for Buffalo's one quick offensive spurt — a run of 10 points that followed the Gouveia-Riggs touchdown.

SPORTS COLUMN

Of small town rivalries and steaming hot dogs

DAVID FRESE

My little sister turned 14 last week, and she had asked me way back in October to come home to watch her play basketball on her birthday.

"We play the Rockets," she said.

The Rockets she spoke of were from the neighboring town of Dwight. If you played sports in Alta Vista (pop. 453) back in 1983, it was better to be a red Russian Commie than a purple and white Dwight Rocket.

I have grown a little since then, and my tall, leggy, blond girlfriend has lectured me that it was the Alta Vista Bulldogs who were the true bad guys. She's a little biased, though, because she was a tall, leggy, blond cheerleader for the Rockets when she was an eighth grader in '83. I do not argue the finer points of this thinking of hers because I hope someday she will be the one supporting my writing habit.

As soon as my sister, Amy's her name by the way, told me she'd be playing the Rockets that night I knew someone would have to shoot Jon Wefald for me to miss her game.

Now I was no Larry Bird when I was an eighth grade Alta Vista Bulldog. I stood a full 4 feet 10 1/2 inches in my too-big uniform, tipped the scales at 86 pounds after a big meat loaf dinner and wore size 11 Winner's Choice hi-tops my momma bought me at Wal-Mart. Coach Andres played me at point guard, mostly because I couldn't get hurt too badly there. I was the guy in control, and I felt pretty big when the power forwards on our team looked to me for the one-two-two or the two-one-two or the one-four and the zone or the man "D."

My momma used to come to the games and yell at the refs when I'd get steamrolled by the opposing players or called for traveling because I couldn't control my feet. Once she embarassed the hell out of me by bringing a cowbell to our final game against the Dwight Rockets. She said she was going to ring it every time I scored, though I hardly ever shot the ball because Coach Andres told me not to.

That was the game plan most of the time, but that night the Rocket guard, my now-girlfriend's then-boyfriend, kept leaving me open on the perimeter so I shot 10 times and scored 6 points, the most I ever scored. My momma clang-clanged that bell 'til it broke, then cheered the rest of the game like she'd won the jackpot at the Alta Vista Friday night bingo games.

When we both lived at home, Amy and I used to shoot baskets in the back yard where no grass grew near our red, white and blue netted goal. She'd granny shoot while I pretended to defend her. Once when she and I and my brother were playing I threw the ball to her a little too hard. It knocked the wind out of her, and she cried in the dirt. Instead of telling her I was sorry, I told her if she was ever going to play basketball she needed to be a little tougher.

My sister's ballteam plays in a different gym than the one I played in. They built a new school sometime after I left. Our gym was about three-fourths the size of a real basketball court and had dead spots in the old wood floor where the opposing players would always lose the handle on the ball, and I would steal it away for an easy lay-in (or I'd get steamrolled). My sister's new gym has that new flooring that feels like puttified cement and has the 3-point stripe painted on it.

My girlfriend and I got to the A.V. gym last Thursday night late but just in time to see Amy leading her team around the floor in the obligatory pregame laps. She had her fiery red hair tied back in a ponytail that bobbed up and down on the back of her blue and gold uniform. We found our seats next my mom and dad and watched as Amy shot and ran warmup drills during the pregame. My momma leaned over to us and said she forgot her cowbell. If she had brought it I would have moved over to sit with the Rockets' pep club.

The principal called out the starters. Amy was the second one.

"Number 44," he said into the staticky P.A. "AY-MEE FUH-REEESE."

I was going to clap like hell, but the Bulldog crowd beat me to it.

The game started. We got the jump, and Amy took the point. She called the one-two-two right off. The power forward swung left then right. Amy heaved it in to the power forward, who swooshed it. Dwight came back with two off a drive by the left flank. Amy brought it down and pumped one in from the key, then she stole the inbound, dumped off to her teammate and Alta Vista was up by four.

Eventually the game evened out, became neck and neck for a while, then them dirty Rockets pulled ahead. Amy went in to the locker room at half-time with an empty water bottle and a 1-point deficit. She had her game face on, but she looked over to me, and I gave her the thumbs-up. She smiled and ran to the lockers.

My girlfriend and I spent the half at the concessions stand, and in lieu of listening to how Dad would've coached the game, I got to hear from my girlfriend how much rowdier the Alta Vista crowd was than the Dwight crowd. Instead of arguing, I ordered a humongous steam-cooked hot dog and a soda.

The second half went pretty much the same as the first.We got ahead, then the Rockets pulled ahead, then we pulled ahead, then the Rockets pulled ahead.

The coach pulled Amy out of the game with three minutes left. The Rockets were up by four. Amy sat on the bench with 2:30 left. With 2:15 left. With 2:00 left. With 1:50 left.

Dwight got called for traveling at 1:48 with a 6-point point lead, and the coach sent Amy in. They were talking back and forth, then the coach patted her on the back and held up three fingers. Amy nodded and checked in.

The Bulldog power forward got the ball from the ref and looked for Amy. She was covered well, but faked left, bolted right and got the inbounds. She dribbled to the right side, got open, checked her footing behind the trey line and heaved it towards the bucket.It hit the backboard, bounced on the front, the heel, rolled around and rimmed out. The Bulldog power forward got the board and passed back to Amy. She got behind the line again, the clock at 1:11, shot and aired it out. The Dwight pep club chanted, "Air-ball. Air-ball." The Rockets got the rebound and went into the stall. The buzzer sounded and it was over. Dwight 27. Alta Vista 21.

She went to the locker room with her head down. She came out during the boys game in her blue and gold cheerleader uniform. I went over and hugged her.

"Happy Birthday," I said. "You played awesome."

She smiled. "I had six points," she said. "That's the most I ever scored."

Distinguished Kansans influence state, world

Festivities show appreciation for accomplishments

MITCH HIXSON
Collegian

Ewing M. Kauffman was honored as the Distinguished Kansan of 1991, and Marynell Dyatt Reece was honored as 1991 Kansan of the Year at a banquet in their honor Friday night.

Many distinguished guests were in attendance, including U.S. Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., Gov. Joan Finney and members of the Kansas House of Representatives.

The celebration, in appreciation of the honorees' achievements, was Friday night in the Regency Ballroom at the Topeka Ramada Inn Downtown. The banquet was the highlight of Friday's Kansas Day activities in Topeka.

Mike Herman, president of the Ewing M. Kauffman Foundation, accepted the Distinguished Kansan of 1991 award on behalf of Mr. Kauffman, who was unable to accept in person due to illness.

"Mr. Kauffman's life is one success after another," Herman said.

After Kauffman worked for a pharmaceutical company for a few years, he decided to start his own company. The first year it netted $1,000.

He has since guided the Kansas City-based firm from that small beginning to become one of the major diversified health care companies in the world today.

Marion Laboratories and Merrill Dow merged in 1989, and Kauffman is now chairman emeritus of the newly formed Marion Merrill Dow, Inc. He is also majority owner of the Kansas City Royals Baseball Club.

Kauffman also provides financial support for numerous charitable programs through the Ewing Marion Kauffman Foundation, which is funded entirely by him. Kauffman's goal in starting the Kauffman Foundation was to help solve social problems, Herman said.

The foundation is currently involved in many projects in the Kansas City area. Project Choice pays for the college education of many youngsters if they stay in school drug free, Project Essential builds teens' self-esteem and morals, and Urban Partners teaches principals of public schools management techniques.

In 1989, Kauffman was named by the 16th Daily Point of Light in the president's "Thousand Points of Light" tribute to Americans who make a positive difference.

In a videotaped response to the award, Kauffman said, "I should be given credit for recognizing problems but my associates given credit for figuring out solutions and making it work."

1991 Kansan of the Year honoree, Marynell Dyatt Reece from Scandia, Kansas, said she wants everyone to remember "No one does anything alone."

"Make the world a better place to live, not just for you, but for everyone," she said.

Reece has made distinguished contributions to the Republican party, the United Methodist Church and economic education in Kansas.

"Her participation in so many aspects of the life of the state has been characterized by dedication, enthusiasm, and wisdom," said Gov. Finney, who presented the award.

Reece said she was honored but humbled by receiving the award.

"I only represent the many people of Kansas. There are so many volunteers who are not recognized," she said.

Kansas has a bright future, Reece said.

"Kansans were not born by a race of dreamers, but by pioneers, who attacked problems. This will serve us well in the future," she said.

"Kansans must show the nation that Kansas is a state of mind, not just a place on a map."

EDUCATION

Techniques focus on learning

SUSAN DONOVAN
Collegian

Whole-language teaching techniques are implemented in 15 percent of kindergarten through sixth grade classrooms across the country, Jerome Harste, president-elect of the Whole Language Umbrella, said.

Harste was speaking to a group of approximately 400 Kansas teachers as part of the second annual Kansas Teachers Applying Whole Language Conference, which took place Saturday, Jan. 25, in the K-State Union.

Harste, professor of language education at Indiana University, was the keynote speaker and one of the originators of whole-language learning and teaching techniques.

Whole-language teaching technique is a way of doing research into how people actually learn. Harste said whole language emphasizes reading, writing and inventive spelling.

Harste said an important component of whole language is personal involvement between teachers and students.

"No one becomes literate without personal interaction and involvement. Teaching and learning go hand in hand, and how we teach is just as important as what we teach," Harste said.

Barb Maughmer, president of the Kansas TAWL chapter and assisting teacher at Amanda Arnold Elementary School, said whole language concentrates on the relationship between teachers and their students.

"Whole language learning comes in degrees," she said. "It assumes that the teacher is a learner. So, whatever I get out of the conference I'll take back to my classroom and to my students."

Maughmer added that teachers need to be researchers and discover their own definition of whole language and apply that individuality to their teaching techniques.

Julie Giersch, senior in elementary education, observed classrooms at Amanda Arnold Elementary School where whole language techniques are used.

She said whole language focuses on the how-to of the learning process.

"Whole language is teaching for process, not product," Giersch said.

Users of whole language believe learning is easiest when information is taught from the whole to parts.

Harste said the way to get the program of whole language started is to let students read and write about what is happening in their lives and what is interesting to them.

Harste said he thinks this is more productive than just doing problems, assignments or handwriting for response from a teacher.

"When we really write what's on our mind, the basis of whole language is started. This is when you have good conversations take place between students and teachers," Harste said.

Clark Reinke, principal at Amanda Arnold Elementary School, said as an administrator, it's his obligation to make changes in education to better both students and teachers. Whole language is one of the school's efforts.

"I consider myself a leader, and it is my job to facilitate people to become leaders and innovators in our building," Reinke said.

Reinke said that more educational decisions need to be made by teachers, not just legislatures.

"Traditionally, schools have been so bureaucratic from the legislative aspect that teachers have had very little say-so in making decisions, much less in power of children to take responsibility for their learning," Reinke said.

Team wins 2 in Minnesota

B. CLAY MOORE
Collegian

The K-State forensics team traveled to Moorhead, Minn., last weekend and came home with two first-place finishes.

Speech Unlimited competed at Concordia College on Friday and Saturday and at Moorhead State on Sunday. K-State received top awards at both competitions.

Since the season began in September, the team has finished first in six of 17 tournaments while finishing second or third in the other nine.

During the Minnesota swing last weekend, the team members placed in the top four 26 times, including eight first place finishes. Fifteen schools competed at Concordia and 14 competed at Moorhead State.

Craig Brown, instructor of speech and the team's coach, said while the team has been successful so far this year, the true test of a team's overall quality will be at the national tournament at St. Louis University in April.

To qualify for nationals, an individual must place at least third in an event at three different tournaments.

Among the top participants in Minnesota was Mark Esfeld, junior in milling science management.

Esfeld has qualified for nationals in five events. He qualified in the informative speech category at Concordia.

"Last year we had 25 entries for nationals," Brown said. "This year we already have 19 qualified, and we're not even into February. Last year we had people reach finals 210 times. This year we've already placed 203."

Brown said he feels the team will only get better next year, because this year there is only one senior competing on the team. Also, Brown said there are three students on five-year college programs who sat out this year.

Valerie Marsh, graduate in theater and an assistant to Brown, said she agrees with Brown's assessment.

"There's a lot of natural talent on the team. It's exciting to think where these freshmen and sophomores will be when they become juniors and seniors since people seem to get better with experience," Marsh said.

Craig Caylor, freshman in physics, is spending his first year with Speech Unlimited. He has qualified for nationals in the after-dinner speech category, and he said he hopes to qualify in other categories. Caylor said he predicts a strong national showing.

"It's conceivable that we will be in the top 10 or top five," Caylor said. "We have a huge wealth of experience to draw upon with our coaches."

Brown said K-State's program has been one of the strongest in the nation since its inception in 1976. However, he said, the potential is there for K-State's forensics program to be analogous to what Nebraska is in football, or Kansas is in basketball.

The increased financial support from the University and the College of Arts and Sciences has played a part in the program's success, Brown said.

As the University saw the successful results of such support for the debate team, the forensics team benefited as well. He said the trip to Minnesota is an example of the things the team can do now that it hadn't been able to do in the past.

Brown also gave credit for the program's success to John Burtis, instructor of speech. The debate and forensics programs are branched under the same department and are directed by Burtis.

beaten the other and then turned to look for someone else to fight. Hamill, who had tried to break up the fight only moments earlier, was being held up against a fence by someone, Wackly said.

"I began to walk toward my door to go outside and see what the problem was when I heard a man scream," Wackly said. "As I was walking around to the back of the apartments, I saw a man run and jump another fence. I later discovered that he had stabbed someone."

Wackly said there seems to be some kind of fight in the Aggieville area most weekends.

"In the three years I've lived here, Friday night seemed exceptionally rowdy compared to other nights," he said.

life.

Because of his repeated blood transfusions, Brax was interviewed in December by Channel 3 news in Wichita as a part of a blood drive campaign.

Brax said after seeing him on the news, several people called to tell him that they had the disease also.

"There are only about six or seven people in Kansas that have it," he said.

Brax was released from St. Francis Hospital in Wichita Friday after stabilizing from the disease's latest setback. He was taking an experimental drug for several weeks, and it appeared to be helping, but after about two weeks, it stopped working.

Because doctors are having trouble with the bleeding from Brax's small intestine, he may have to fly to New York Thursday to Mt. Sinai Hospital for additional tests. The hospital in New York is the only one with a special scope to look inside the intestines. The procedure takes eight hours to complete.

"He's done great mentally," Jill Brax said.

She said he has his down days, and it was hard on him having to withdraw from K-State, but he's taking it well.

Brax plans to begin classes this February at McPherson College and resume classes at K-State next fall.

go where you can go out and dress up.

However, Stroebel said Club Soho did disappoint him in a way.

"You pay $3 at the door, $2.75 for a drink, yet you drink out of a plastic cup," he said. "If they're trying to portray an upscale atmosphere, they could at least serve drinks out of a glass."

Potillo said he wanted the opening of Club Soho to be a surprise.

Stroebel said even though the opening of the club was an initial surprise, there were quite a few people there.

"I think it was more of a curiosity thing," he said.

Troy Warnken, manager of Snookies Bar, said he does not think the opening of Club Soho will change Snookies' business much.

"It depends on the kind of clientele they are after. It may hurt some of the other smaller bars, but I don't think it will affect us any," he said.

Megan Brown, junior in graphic design, said she attended the opening of Club Soho Friday.

"We didn't know when the club was opening, but we saw some flyers," she said. "For there being no real advertising or promotion, there was a good-sized crowd."

Fragments from shuttle continue to be found

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Almost every month, Kennedy Space Center gets a call from people who believe they may have found a piece of Space Shuttle Challenger.

Six years after the nation's worst space disaster, the searching and sorting of debris go on.

Most of what's sorted is ocean junk — chunks of unmanned rockets or other flotsam and jetsam. But occasionally, the real thing turns up. Early last year, fishermen found a small tank and a metal fragment a few feet long in the Atlantic Ocean off Cape Canaveral.

The articles are locked in a holding area, awaiting burial in the abandoned missile silos that hold a quarter-million pounds of Challenger remains.

"I think it's about over. I don't think we're going to see much more," said Elliott Kicklighter, a National Aeronautics and Space Administration official in charge of the crypt. "It hasn't been a very busy job, thank goodness."

The two 90-feet-deep silos have been opened only three times since the bulk of the shuttle was buried in 1987. Ten-ton concrete caps cover the silos, which are surrounded by a chain-link fence at the Cape Canaveral Air Force Station.

Only hardware is contained in the silos; all 5,000 pieces are cataloged. The remains of the seven astronauts killed in the explosion and their personal effects have long since been turned over to the families.

For the first few years after the accident, Kennedy security officers tracked down reports of illegally held debris, considered government property. No charges were filed, although some people surrendered the items with reluctance, said Calvin Burch, the space center's chief of security.

Now, most of the detectives' time is spent checking objects found by fishermen and beachcombers.

Just a few weeks ago, officers received several chunks of lightweight aluminum, a spring coil and piece of hard, black plastic in the shape of a half-moon found on a beach 30 miles south of the space center. The discoverers thought maybe — just maybe — the articles came from Challenger.

They didn't.

"It had nothing to do with the shuttle program at all," Burch said.

Burch isn't surprised by the public's lingering preoccupation with Challenger.

"It's still, I think, in the minds of people that that event occurred," he said.

Americans watched in horror six years ago Tuesday when the Challenger exploded in a ball of flames 73 seconds after liftoff. The time was 11:39 a.m. EST.

Almost immediately, Coast Guard ships began searching the Atlantic for shuttle remains. Hundreds of pounds of metal were salvaged that first day. The remains of the astronauts were found in March in the debris of the crew cabin. The dead included schoolteacher Christa McAuliffe, the first in a program to send private citizens into space.

By the time the search officially was called off late that summer, several hundred-thousand pounds of shuttle debris had been recovered, including the failed booster components. A leak in a joint on the right solid rocket booster was blamed.

About 9,000 people took part in the search, the most comprehensive underwater hunt ever conducted. They covered more than 90,000 square miles of ocean by air and by sea, using sonar to identify anything bigger than a coffee cup.

Ed O'Connor, a retired Air Force colonel who directed the search, said the team located more than 90 percent of the spaceship. Only the critical pieces were retrieved. The rest — half the orbiter and boosters, two-thirds of the external fuel tank and a fourth of the satellite payload — was left at sea.

STATE OF THE UNION

Nation's mood uneasy on day of Bush speech

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — It's the recession, but not just the recession.

It's a pervasive sense of politics-as-usual, of a government out of touch with its people.

It is a feeling that the Japanese, indeed, make better products and will be hard to catch up with.

It is a perception that, for the first time in this country, kids will have a harder time than their parents.

As President Bush prepares to go before Congress and the nation tonight with his State of the Union prescriptions, the country seems agreed that something has gone haywire, and that something quick and easy won't fix what's wrong.

"What's the 20-year plan?" asked paper shop owner Cass Rankin, 37, walking her dogs, Chelsie and Tuxedo, in Phoenix, Ariz.

"Where does he see our economy, our lifestyle, our country, our power, the whole shebang — where does he see it in 20 years?"

Was it only a year ago that America — united, patriotic, uncertain but largely convinced it was doing right — was engaged in an air war against Saddam Hussein's Iraqi aggression in Kuwait, and braced for a ground invasion?

Hardly anyone mentions the war in this kitchen table sampling of American opinions. When foreign affairs are mentioned, it is usually to complain that America is too generous.

"I think President Bush should look inward toward the country, rather than outward toward the world," said Lex Cleary, a fishing guide and consulting engineer of Plattsburgh, N.Y.

Too much money is being sent abroad, said Dan Legere, owner of the Maine Guide Fly Shop in Greenville, Maine.

"Not to say the Russian economy can't use it," he said.

To be sure, Americans haven't lost the dogged optimism that characterizes them.

"Times are tough, but you just grit your teeth," said Dianne Gray, 36, of Sutton, Vt.

"If you're really willing to work, there's jobs out there to be found — I've got three of them," she said.

Gray works in a florist shop part-time, cleans a woman's house, sweeps the post office. Her husband is out of work.

"We're not living high on the hog," she said. "But the bills are paid."

▶ COLLEGE DRUG USE DECLINES

WASHINGTON (AP) — Illegal drug use by high school and college students continued a decade-long decline in 1991, but overall use levels show "we've still got a way to go" in the fight against drugs, experts said Monday.

An annual survey said 29 percent of high school seniors last year said they had used an illegal drug in the previous year, down from 33 percent of seniors in 1990. The percentages were the same for college students.

"We have continued to make steady progress in dissuading our young people from being involved with illicit drugs," said Lloyd D. Johnston, principal investigator of the study and a social psychologist at the University of Michigan's Institute for Social Research.

Marijuana is by far the most widely used illegal drug for both groups of students. Annual use by seniors dropped from 27 percent in 1990 to 24 percent last year. For college students, it declined from 29 percent to 27 percent.

Shouting crowd harasses U.N. team

Inspectors roughed up, pushed, pinned against wall by Iraqi people

ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — With Iraqi police looking on passively, U.N. weapons inspectors were roughed up and menaced Monday by a shouting crowd of Iraqi men, the United Nations said.

The United Nations said Iraqi police looked on passively during the harassment of the inspectors.

There were no reports of injuries to the inspectors in Monday's confrontation.

The United States denounced the Baghdad government's clear breach of agreements covering the inspections.

It was the latest in a series of ugly incidents involving the inspectors, whose work is being carried out under the terms of the Persian Gulf War cease-fire.

U.N. spokesman Francois Giuliani said the team's leader, U.S. Army Maj. Karen Jansen, and two colleagues were jostled, shouted at and pinned against the wall of the lobby while police looked on.

The crowd — about 40 Iraqi men — was described as being made up of demonstrators, but protests are often orchestrated by the government in Iraq. A U.N. official called it a hired mob.

Despite pleas for help from the police, the rest of the inspection team was trapped inside a bus in front of the hotel for about 25 minutes before they decided to force their way through the crowd into the hotel, he said.

Giuliani said police watched without intervening as the men shouted slogans and jumped up and down on the U.N. vehicles.

"The police, in response to questions why they did not do anything, said they 'were not allowed to,'" he said.

The 18-member chemical and biological weapons inspection team had just arrived in Baghdad from Bahrain, where the U.N. inspectors have their headquarters.

"I understand it was an organized protest by a hired mob in which about 40 people were involved," said Alastair Livingston, U.N. special commission regional officer in Bahrain.

He said there was some pushing and shoving when the team got there, but he did not hear of any injuries.

The incident was reminiscent of other confrontations involving U.N. inspectors.

In September 1991, 44 U.N. nuclear weapons inspectors were detained in a Baghdad parking lot by Iraqi guards for four days after the U.N. officials refused to relinquish documents on Iraq's nuclear weapons program.

Police discount decapitation, gang activity rumors

COLLEGIAN STAFF

Rumors about gang activity have been going around K-State.

According to the most widespread rumor, decapitation of a sorority woman is supposed to take place this week as part of a local gang's initiation rite.

The K-State Police, Riley County Police Department and the Office of Greek Affairs have been inundated with phone calls from concerned students, parents and Manhattan citizens.

Campus police Lt. Robert Mellgren said there is no truth to the stories.

"The whole thing has just been a big headache," he said.

The RCPD cannot validate the rumor either.

"This has been a very extreme rumor, but if this is supposedly an initiation rite, it has never happened before," Capt. Allen Raynor of RCPD said.

Barb Robel, greek affairs adviser, said the greek adviser at the University of Kansas called her last week to tell her about a similar rumor in Lawrence.

"Obviously, the rumor has been enhanced since reaching K-State," Robel said.

She also said the same rumor, only regarding cheerleaders, was circulating in Wichita.

One caller to the greek affairs office heard the police department had leased helicopters to survey the campus. The RCPD said this is not true.

"There has never been any discussion of that," Raynor said.

Although the rumors seem to be getting out of hand, Raynor said they can't ignore them.

"We trace them as best as we can until we find out if they are true or untrue," he said.

Robel has been in touch with both police departments.

"There is no indication to lead us to believe it's true," she said.

Mellgren said he hopes they can find out who started the rumor, so they can disprove it.

"These things just get crazy when they get started," he said.

Robel encourages everyone to take normal precautions, but said she hopes no one blows it out of proportion.

Raynor said the rumor has been discounted so far. However, he said, people should always be alert.

K-STATE 2001

ACADEMICS

HOW WE WILL LEARN

DEREK THOMAN
Collegian

The year 2001 seems far away, but K-State has been preparing for the 21st century for about five years.

By the year 2001, many sweeping academic changes will have taken place at K-State, including some departmental reorganization, the requirement that each incoming student purchase a computer, the possible assessment of individual college fees and changes in methods of instruction.

According to Provost James Coffman, there will be no University-wide reorganization, but there will be some reorganization within the different college departments.

Some departments have seen some sort of reorganization already.

A part of the leisure studies program in the kinesiology department was combined with the forestry department in July 1991.

Then in September, the Department of Forestry in the College of Agriculture merged with the Department of Horticulture, creating the Department of Horticulture, Forestry and Recreational Resource Management.

"Through the merger, the leisure studies program and the parks and resource management program kept their accreditation," Coffman said.

Coffman said minor reorganizations will continue in the future, and money could be saved in the long run.

Another plan for the future is to have every entering freshman purchase a personal computer.

Michael Holen, dean of the College of Education, said by the year 2001, every student will be computer literate.

"Every student should have a computer or should buy one as they enter college," Holen said.

Currently, the College of Education is the only college on campus equipped with Macintosh computers.

Every faculty member has a Macintosh computer at his or her desk.

Also the college graduate lab is equipped with Macintosh computers, and the undergraduate lab will soon have them also.

The instructional labs in the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications are also fully equipped with Macintosh computer equipment.

Some universities have already begun to require students to have their own computers. Northwest Missouri State

Enrollment predictions consistently accurate

BRIAN KRATZER
Collegian

Ron Downey, interim director of planning and evaluation services, is predicting the future enrollments of K-State with more accuracy than a meteorologist could dream of.

Downey's figures in the past have deviated only 1-1.5 percent from the actual enrollment figures. He has been using his method of conducting enrollment projections for 11 years.

"The numbers become planning guides. They tell us 10 years from now what we are facing," Downey said.

Downey has projected about 33,000 high school graduates will be available for the fall of 2001. Of that number, there could be a freshman class of about 5,500 students. In contrast, there were about 4,500 freshmen during fall 1991.

"By the time we get to the end of the year 2001, we expect to be back over the 20,000 mark significantly," Downey said. "But that figure can be misleading. Our ability to attract

Richard Hermann, K-State investigator

DAVID FRESE

The sign on the door in East Stadium read, "Investigations." The office was small, windowless, like a well-decorated jail cell on a rainy morning.

The sideburned man in the thin gray tie handed out a business card. "Richard W. Hermann," it said in plain, easy-to-read type, "Investigator. Kansas State University." That's him in the picture.

He's the guy they call in for the tough jobs; the one they call when the president is coming to town or when a pair of three-dollar nylon socks is missing from a Jardine washer.

Before he said anything about it you could tell he'd spent some time in Nam; he had that battle-hardened look of someone who didn't like to shave each morning but did it anyway. He celebrated his 19th birthday in-country. It wasn't something he wanted to return to.

After the Army he came home and got married. Then he turned to a vocational-technical school to become a mechanic. He said he got tired of washing the greasy dirt off his hands each evening so he turned to the K-State Police.

He began his stint here in '73 as a patrolman. The country was coming out of the 1960s and leftover hippies would spit on anybody in a uniform. In nine years the University's investigator was promoted. Herrman got the job. He's been there since, bringing home his non-administrative paycheck

INTRAMURALS

Entrants expected to increase

Rec Services offers 22 spring competitions

CHRISTA CONGROVE
Collegian

Getting involved in sports is easy at K-State.

There are 55 intramural activities offered at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex throughout the year. Activities include horseshoes, golf, racquetball, wallyball, a track meet and wrist wrestling, just to name a few.

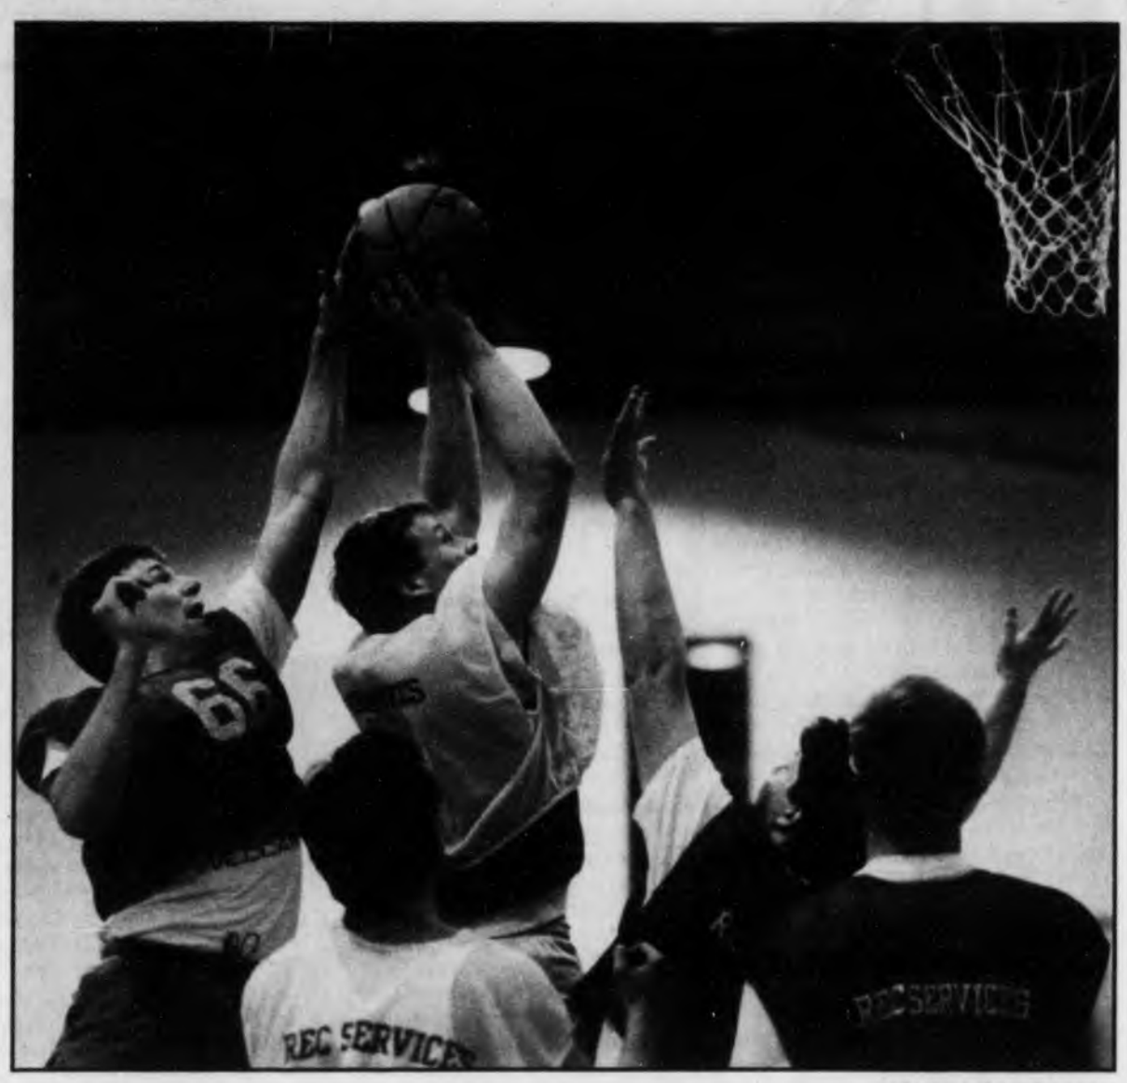
Last year, there were approximately 22,000 intramural entrants. So far this year there have been approximately 10,000.

Steve Martini, associate director of recreational services, said participation has generally stayed the same over the past few years, but he expects it to increase this year because there are 22 spring events scheduled.

"It could have possibly increased this year because we had 35 more flag-football teams," he said.

Students get involved in the intramural program for many reasons.

Ed Enyeart, senior in accounting, said he likes the fact that he gets the opportunity to compete with friends.



"I think playing intramural football has taught me a lot about the people that I see everyday. Things that you just don't learn from day-to-day contact," he said.

Doug Labbe, senior in marketing, has a different reason for getting involved.

"I've always wanted one of those intramural champion T-shirts," he said.

The intramural champion T-shirt is awarded to division winners in team or individual sports. The T-shirts are made with a different design each year.

Martini said the intramural program at K-State has been around since the early 1900s. Like most universities, the intramurals program preceded the athletic program, he said. It laid the groundwork for the now elaborate varsity athletic program.

TODD FEEBACK/Collegian

Les Wagner, freshman in pre-med, goes for two points as Quinton Guhr, junior in electrical engineering, tries to block the shot during an intramural game in Chester E. Peters Rec Complex.

The intramurals program has its own regulations and rules of sportsmanship. Like other rules, these are sometimes broken.

Martini said that every case of breaking the rules is different and is handled as such. He said some people are caught playing on two teams or under assumed names.

Recreational Services makes every effort to catch those people through a system of cross-checking. Common sense and experience alerts them to foul play.

"There are officials, supervisors and members of other teams who check," Martini said.

He said some participants are thrown out by officials for unsportsmanlike conduct. He said those situations are pretty cut-and-dried.

Profanity, delay of game, arguing with officials or any action that shows disregard for the rules or policies of the intramural program is considered unsportsmanlike.

Martini said the amount of unsportsmanlike conduct they see depends on the sport.

Soldiers offered benefits for early discharge

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian

One year ago, leaving the Army early could earn soldiers criminal prosecution. Starting this year, the same action can earn soldiers money.

Since Jan. 1, a plan has been implemented at Fort Riley to offer monetary incentives to soldiers who choose to leave the Army before their enlistment is up.

The plan consists of two programs: The special separation benefits program and the volunteer separation incentive program.

Both programs are available to men and women who have served from six to 20 years and are being used to reduce the Army's forces.

The SSB program offers soldiers a one-time lump sum equal to 15 percent of their annual basic pay multiplied by the amount of years served in the service.

Soldiers taking this option also will receive two years of privileges in military exchanges, as well as four years of medical service.

For example, a specialist in the service for six years would receive $13,135, and a major serving 18 years would receive $121,150.

Soldiers accepting the VSI program will receive annual payments equal to 2.5 percent of their annual basic pay times the number of years in the service.

This plan then continues for two times the number of years they served.

However, this program does not offer any transition benefits, such as the exchange and medical privileges. It is also mandatory for the soldiers to Health problems cause Finck to resign

K-State's athletic bands will be without a director — at least for the time being.

After nine years, Stanley Finck, assistant professor of music and director of athletic bands, has decided to relieve himself of some of the more rigorous duties associated with the position.

Slowed mobility from health problems has caused Finck to step down from certain positions, but he declined to comment about any specifics.

"He has had the position as athletic band director for a long period of time. It's a vigorous job for a younger man," said Jack Flouer, chairman of the music department. "He has continued to do the job of two people for several years," he said.

Although Finck won't work with the band anymore, he will continue to teach some classes. He also will continue giving private lessons.

Assistant Band Director Ben Rohrer will fill in as director of the pep band, and the search for a new athletic band director is underway. A committee in charge of the search met Jan. 15 to take a first look at the resumes it had received.

"We have been discussing the possibility of his stepping down for some time now. It was no surprise when it happened, and we have ample time to select a new director," Flouer said.

Iraq

Organized groups of demonstrators railed against the inspectors for days, until the Iraqi government gave in to international censure and allowed the inspectors to leave with the documents.

On June 28, 1991, Iraqi soldiers fired shots over the heads of U.N. inspectors trying to photograph a speeding convoy carrying crates of nuclear-related material, including electromagnetic separation equipment.

The U.N. Special Commission, which is charged with dismantling Iraq's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons programs and ballistic missiles, immediately lodged a protest with the Iraqi government over Monday's incident.

Giuliani said it represented "a clear breach by Iraq of various special arrangements, undertakings and U.N. Security Council resolutions concerning the immunities, privileges, safety and access of U.N. inspection teams."

Under various Security Council resolutions adopted since the end of the gulf war last year, Iraq is bound to cooperate with the U.N. weapons inspectors and protect them while they are on their rounds.

Observing the Persian Guld War anniversary this month, Iraqi President Saddam Hussein told 17 million Iraqis that Iraq had won a moral victory, despite being trounced by the U.S.-led coalition.

Hussein has managed to hang on to power despite a crippling trade embargo and uprisings by Kurds in the north and Shiite Muslims in the south.

The Bush administration has recently renewed its urging that Hussein be toppled by his people.

POLITICS

"If we are going to let our politics be driven by pecple who hand out money for people to say whatever they can say ... I'm not going to be a part of that."

— ARKANSAS GOV. BILL CLINTON ON ALLEGATIONS THAT HE HAD AN AFFAIR THAT WAS PUBLISHED IN A SUPERMARKET TABLOID.

EDITORIALS

Campaign polluted with tabloid garbage

In 10 months this country will be electing a president. Before that day comes, nearly a year of campaigning, fund raising and mudslinging will occur. Candidates will win, candidates will lose, and a few will drop out.

This year's campaign brings back recollections of the 1988 election when former Sen. Gary Hart withdrew from the campaign due to allegations of marital misconduct.

The tabloid axe has begun to fall again, with the current allegations about Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton.

The Star, a supermarket tabloid, published accusations from a former TV reporter who claims Clinton had a 12-year affair with her while married to his wife, Hillary.

Rumors like this, especially from the grocery store shelves, should not guide voters. The line between private life and public life moves as often as the sun sets and cannot be drawn with permanence.

The media (that's television, radio and newspapers who don't print or broadcast stories about six-eyed vegetarian Martians being born to women in Florida) oftentimes jump on the headline bandwagon far too quickly. We should walk with soft shoes on private issues about public persons.

Even more damaging is the response of readers. News consumers, viewers and readers should be hungry for information, but critical of the way it is presented and how it was obtained.

Read everything you can get your hands on. Watch as many sound bites the TV stations provide. Listen to National Public Radio.

Make an informed decision based on credible sources. Not from a tabloid that reports weekly Elvis sightings.

Environmental capitalism benefiting only the greedy

It was only a matter of time.

Profiting from the environment is nothing new. People have been doing that for years now.

Making money from environmentalism, however, is a relatively new concept. And folks are doing it left and right.

Take Biosphere 2 for instance. This experimental project near Tucson, Ariz., looks like it's going to turn out to be nothing but a tourist trap.

Originally, the project was four men and four women living without help from the outside world in a contained, self-supporting environment for two years.

But one crewmember who injured her finger has already left, and critics charge she returned with a duffel bag full of supplies and equipment.

Scientists say the project has already been invalidated as a closed experiment because the Biosphere is equipped with a machine designed to scrub carbon dioxide from the air, and outside air has been pumped in since the doors were sealed.

Officials in charge of the project have contended that Biosphere 2 is not pure science, but rather a science-oriented business. A little more openness is what the public deserves.

Right now, people are being charged $9.95 to tour the outside of the project. One has to wonder, now that the initial media hype has subsided, if the main objective behind the project is just to make money.

Those who stand to profit from Biosphere 2 are not the only ones who have found a way to make money from people's growing concern for the environment. The trendiness of post-consumerism has hit its all-time high in the last several months.

Just look at some of the so-called recycled paper available. Much of it contains only 5 percent recycled fibers.

The government needs to take a stance on environmental legislation, setting standards for industries and businesses to follow. And projects like Biosphere 2 need to be exposed for what they really are — a roadside desert Disneyland.

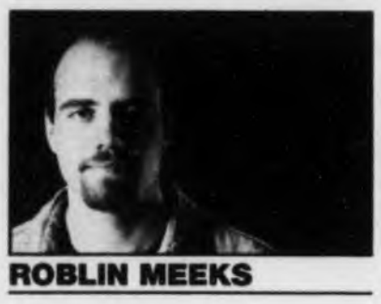
Mud-made men still slinging namesake



In the beginning, if I might be biblical for a moment, there was the word.

And the word was mud.

Before rain had been spilled upon the planet, and before there was a man to work the soil, Yaweh (or God, if you prefer) brought forth a mist from deep inside the earth to moisten its surface. From the resulting mud, Yaweh threw together something that looked like a man and blew the breath of life into its nostrils, as only a supreme being could do. Bingo, man was created.

(I'm not making this up. It's in Genesis.)

What proves even more interesting, I think, is that men seem to have been throwing the stuff around from that point on — as if being the first official mud pie gave us some sort of pitching license.

ROBLIN MEEKS

Training begins early. When I was a kid, we used to toss dirt clods at each other. Mud is pretty tricky stuff, and when you're a young boy, you want to start out dry and work your way wetter.

Mud has soiled all parts of our lives. Take a moment to think about the many things involving mud and men. We've got 10-foot, "monster-mudder" trucks, mud volleyball and football. In nearby creeks, mud puppies dig for insects; under awnings, mud daubers silently build nests.

Politics has also become quite a mud bath. This Democrat is throwing mud at that Republican, which makes for more mud on TV screens, in town halls and all over our country's precious white marble. I'm nearly positive that President Bush keeps a little ball of mud in his pocket. He rolls it tighter during speeches.

How many times have you thrown mud in a friend's eye before taking a drink, but not wanted it on your own face?

How long have men been tracking mud through clean houses?

Which, conveniently, brings me to my next point: If men have been (and still are) constantly throwing this much mud around, you would think this place would be about six feet under topsoil. It would be, were it not for our pulling the mud over someone else's eyes, so to speak.

After Yaweh had created man and the other beasts, he wanted to give him a companion. He put Adam to sleep, extracted a rib, and created woman — not out of mud, but out of bone.

From that point on, we men have been asking, begging and most often forcing women to clean up after us, to somehow wash this dirt from our skyscrapers, tractors, pick-ups, houses, faces, hands, feet and our clothing.

How do we thank women for their troubles? We ask them to jump in a pit and wrestle in the stuff, hoping their fig leaves will fall off.

It seems most men have developed some deep-seated fear of cleaning. We have tried to find ways to get our stuff clean without touching it. Now we can drive our Jeeps through the deepest ditch, and then through an automatic carwash. We even put protein in the laundry detergent so women can get our mud out easier.

Why should women cleanse us of our mud? They weren't created out of it. In fact, I'd bet they are put together much better. The second time around, things always go better and improvements are made. Even men do that when we make things.

Along came the feminist movement, shouting "We're sick and tired of all your mud!" (Some were even quoted as saying that they were tired of other things.) They have been telling us to clean up our act.

Response-wise, men on the whole have been nothing but, you guessed it, sticks in the mud. (Sorry, but it needed to be said.)

However, just as theories of evolution have eclipsed Biblical interpretations of the beginning of life, so can men re-interpret what it means to be masculine. We aren't made of dirt and water, so we should stop acting like we are.

The beginning of change, as I see it, is basically twofold. First, the brunt of projectile mud exchange happens between men. Therefore, men need to stop building forts and start talking to each other. The whole process is going to involve attacking a few taboos, namely that a group of men talking honestly and openly without testosterone masks does not necessarily presuppose homosexuality. Or if it might, so what?

We should also start cleaning up after ourselves, spending more time around sinks, bathrooms, and washers and dryers.

As mud dries — which it eventually does — the ground cracks, people thirst. It's not simple, by any means, to make a heavy societal gender identity 360-degree pirouette, especially in the wake of Super Bowl Sunday when manliness levels reached jagged peaks, but our evolution as a sex is long overdue.

It's time to stop playing in the mud.

EDITORIAL CARTOON

GO AHEAD, SURPRISE US

In 1917, the men of Phi Beta Sigma founded Delta chapter at K-State. The first black fraternity at K-State, Delta chapter members were visible in the community and on campus.

Current members of Delta chapter are also visible on campus and active in the Manhattan community.

What is the difference between these men and their modern-day counterparts? They weren't segregated into a section designed only for black greeks.

I was surprised when I came across the Sigmas in the 1922 Royal Purple. Although I knew they had been here, I didn't think they would have been allowed to be a part of the yearbook because of the racial climate of the times.

I was also surprised when this year all of the predominantly black fraternities and sororities were included in the portrait schedule that appeared in the Collegian periodically during the fall semester. We weren't even separated into a special group. We simply fell into alphabetical order.

I showed up Sept. 6, 1991, for my first individual yearbook picture. I paid all the appropriate fees and put on the little velvet drape and pearls. I was proud of the opportunity to represent my sorority.

When the proofs arrived, I chose the one I wished to appear in the Royal Purple.

Everything was cool.

That is, everything was cool until Jan. 17, 1992. The eight predominantly black fraternities and sororities were to meet at Holton Hall to be photographed as a group and then broken down into individual organizations. We were also told to wear our paraphernalia.

EVE WILSON

Several of the people questioned the purpose of the photos. They had already paid for and chosen an individual portrait to appear on their page in the yearbook, along with the rest of the sororities and fraternities. So why did they have to take a group photo? And why hadn't each group been contacted about this change?

Answer: Only three of the eight groups had come in for individual portraits, and that meant only about a quarter of the expected pictures had been taken. That would mean empty pages.

So, in an effort to keep the group of eight together and not have empty pages, we would all be photographed as a group and then in our individual groups. Everyone would be included, and no one would go unrepresented.

That may not sound like a problem to you, but it is to me. Why punish the groups that did take their pictures on schedule because others didn't? You don't do that to Interfraternity Council and Panhellenic Council groups. And since the yearbook is a journalistic endeavor, couldn't the journalists find something to fill the empty pages?

For far too long, black sororities and fraternities on this campus have been thought of as campus organizations. Not very many people are aware they even exist or what their purposes are. Actually, we're not recognized as greeks by the University.

I guess that's part of the reason why it is so important to me to have my picture included in the greek section of the yearbook. I want wider recognition for my affiliation on this campus. I want to be able to have an individual photo like anyone else who pays to be in the yearbook, and at the same time be on the same page as my sisters just like any other K-State greek. The excuse of black greeks not having houses doesn't fly, because not all of the IFC or Panhellenic Council members live in their organization's house, and they are still allowed to be in the greek section of the yearbook.

It may have taken a little work, but what would have been the problem with simply adding Alpha Phi Alpha — Off Campus between Alpha Kappa Lambda and Alpha Tau Omega? Isn't that the way other new entries to the yearbook are handled, like the Sigma Kappa's addition between Sigma Chi and Sigma Nu? It would have taken less work than separating greeks into sections of predominantly black or white.

It also would have given the Royal Purple an opportunity to be one of the first links between today's Black Pan-Hellenic Council members and the University as a whole. The K-State yearbook is an award-winning innovator in the world of yearbooks, and the staff could have even made other schools stand up and take notice.

K-State's Black Panhellenic Council members still aren't sure how we will appear in the 1992 yearbook.

Surprise us.

FINANCIAL AID

Work-study jobs convenient

1992 application deadline March 15; funds limited, go fast

AMY CLARK
Collegian

K-State's work-study program offers students with financial need a part-time job in a convenient location.

In order to apply for the work-study program, students need to fill out a financial aid statement and request the work-study program.

Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance, said the priority deadline for the fall 1992 financial aid application is March 15.

"Most likely any application received after that deadline would not be considered for work-study because the funds would be gone," he said.

A student must apply for work-study through the financial aid office. The application process considers parental income, tax information and family size. The amount of aid is determined by looking at how much the family can pay for college, Moeder said.

He said the amount of family contribution is subtracted from the institutional cost to get the amount of eligible aid.

"Because it's limited funds, the high-need students are the first ones to get college work- study if they requested it," Moeder said.

He said the financial assistance office has a pool of applicants that are ranked by their financial need.

Moeder said their financial pool of money comes from the federal and state government. The financial aid office uses the money until they run out, he said.

The maximum amount of money that the financial assistance office is able to give out is $2,000 per student.

He said because minimum wage is $4.25 an hour, work-study students can only work approximately 14 hours per week. An employer can switch to departmental funds if a student works more.

Every department on campus employs students, he said.

"There are some places on campus that prefer only work-study students because of the cost savings," Moeder said.

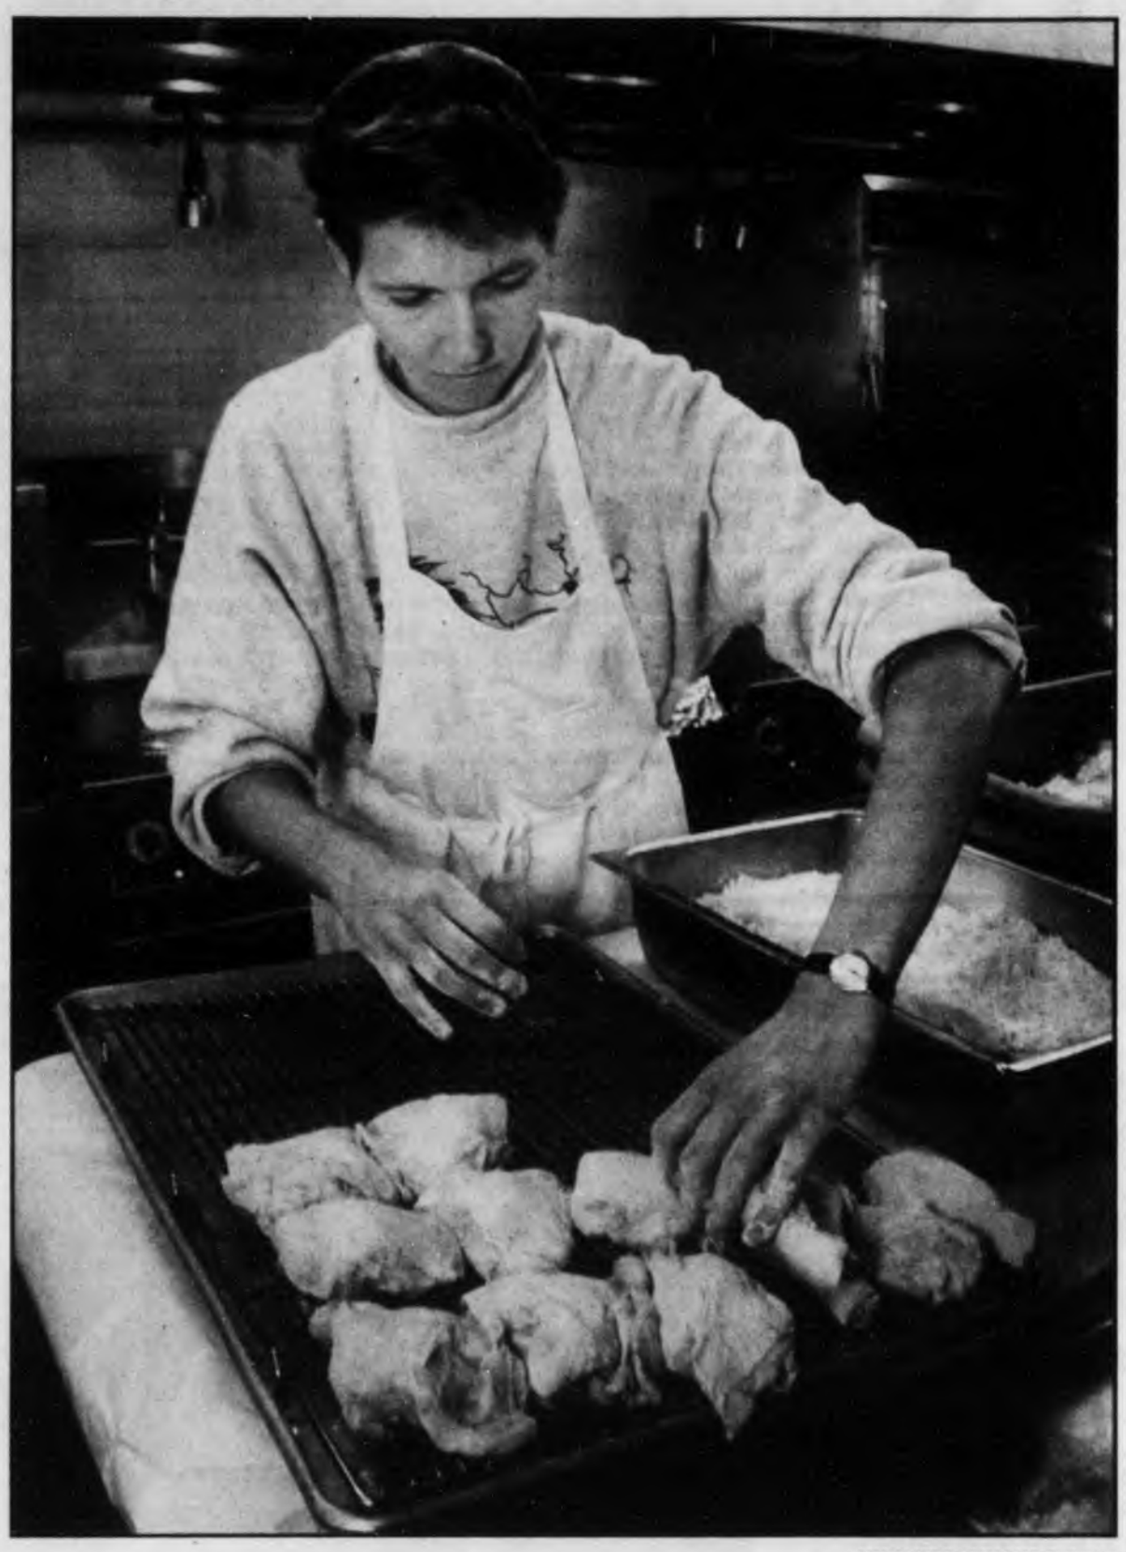
His department is one such place.

Moeder said 70 percent of the earnings of a work-study student comes from the work-study account. The other 30 percent is the responsibility of the employer.

Moeder said 1,081 students were in K-State's work-study program in 1991.

"It varies from year to year, depending on the amount of federal money that we get," he said.

Moeder said the work-study program benefits both K-State and the students in the program.



"It's a benefit to K-State because it allows the university to hire more students because of the federal contribution that's put in there. It benefits the student because it makes it easier for that student to find a job," he said.

It also helps work-study students gain experience, he said.

Moeder said there is no guarantee the work-study student will find a job. However, the chances are greater because hiring that student would save the employer money.

"All the studies show that a student who works part-time while they're in college has a higher success rate in college," he said.

The financial assistance office has a listing service to help students find jobs.

FORT RILEY

Hospitals gear up for Desert Storm baby boom

HEATHER RESZ
Collegian

Many Operation Desert Storm veterans returned home to Fort Riley and joyous reunions. Now, nine months later, their joyous reunions are coming to life in a lot of little ways.

One such way could be the fact that Irwin Army Hospital is expecting more the twice the usual number of births for the months of February, March and April.

"Usually there are 75 to 100 babies born a month at Irwin, but for the next three months, we're expecting closer to 142 to 159 babies for each month," Mark Meseke, Fort Riley media relations officer, said.

This glut of babies expected by the post's hospital has precipitated the need for other delivery arrangements to be made.

The hospital has made arrangements with both the Saint Mary Hospital and Memorial Hospital to assist with some of these deliveries.

"Both hospitals are involved," Kathy Schwartz, night supervisor at Memorial, said. "This is a community effort."

Don Adamchak, associate professor of sociology and department demographer, said that while the national birth rates are increasing, it is not war-related.

"This is a location-specific increase. Across America, this will have no impact on overall rates," he said.

Meseke said while rates for the next three months are expected to be higher, he expects to finish out the year with figures about equal to past years.

Robin Higham, professor of military history, said possible reasons for these increases could be tied to a biological imperative to leave behind a genetic legacy to preserve some part of the soldiers in the case they did not return.

"When a man is sent away, the woman wants something to remember him by," Higham said.

"War makes people realize how much families mean to them, even though they might not be able to put this into words."

Alden Williams, professor of political science, said although numbers of births are expected to increase locally, it is doubtful this small increase will even show up as a blip on the national birth rates.

"Births are up a little here, but nowhere near the post-war rates of 1945," he said. "In 20 or 25 years, no one will even remember this birth increase."

Williams, while admitting there is a local increase, said he doubts fundamentally its alleged connection to Desert Storm.

"As a political scientist, I wouldn't attribute this little increase to Desert Storm," Williams said.

One reason for the lack of comparison between the huge post-war baby boom of the 1940s and the minuscule increase expected in the coming months, Williams said, is the duration of the war.

"World War II was a five-year, full-scale effort instead of a four-day war," he said.

After most wars, economic declines and increased birth rates are expected, but the current recession and small local increase in birth shouldn't be attributed to hastily to the recent gulf effort, he said.

ATHLETIC ENDORSEMENTS

It's gotta be the shoes — or the socks, or the copier or the beer ...

MARGO KELLER
Collegian

Shoes, signage and sponsors are the signs of the times for corporate endorsements in college athletics.

K-State receives about $150,000 from corporations and an equal value of gifts-in-trade. More than 100 companies are involved in sponsoring K-State athletics, with 10 to 20 new companies targeted each year, said Chris Peterson, associate director of intercollegiate athletics.

Peterson provides packages for corporations wishing to donate money or gifts-in-trade. Packages range from $600 to $40,000 depending on the games. Most packages are locked in for three years, with the company having the first right of refusal.

"The golden egg" of sponsoring athletic events has even expanded to businesses sponsoring high school athletics. While money doesn't directly affect student performance, the funds allow the University to host the events, Peterson said.

The bottom line to gaining sponsorship is the tradition and winning potential of the teams. Advertisers look at cost per person, the TV recognition and the attendance levels at games, but CEOs or employees from companies can sponsor their alma mater, Peterson said.

The economic climate and competition create obstacles to financial support. Other universities, Kansas City Royals and Chiefs games create competition among the corporations supporting athletics.

Ten sponsors, including Zerox, Pizza Hut and USAir, supported the football team last season. Peterson said the sponsorship of football has increased more than 17 percent in the past year.

Basketball sponsors providing signage for Bramlage Coliseum include Taco Grande, MacSource, Pepsi and Coors. The sponsors for basketball have been stable for the past 3 years, because of its "emotional buy," Peterson said.

Various athletic shoe companies provide their products to the athletic teams.

Dana Altman, men's basketball coach, said most major basketball programs have some shoe company that provides them with their shoes. More than 15 universities including Clemson, Pittsburg, USC and North Carolina lace up L.A. Gear shoes. Most yearly contracts specify that the team receive shoes to wear exclusively on the court.

While company logos and signs abound, Altman said he feels the evident advertising doesn't affect the players, but contributes to the entire athletic department.

"Because of financial pressures there are very few athletic programs that are actually making money, and costs are continuing to rise," Altman said. "With women's athletics, it has been hard to fund those teams. Women's athletics has come along so far and is the newest department to get those monies."

Endorsements on the national level have just begun with support from Sara Lee and Eastman Kodak financing women's collegiate basketball, Susan Yow, women's basketball coach, said.

Converse and Baden are two other companies that have provided support on the national collegiate level.

"There are not nearly as many sponsors for women's athletics," Yow said. "We are just 'coming of age.' We only had television coverage begin three years ago. Unless your program is really good, you don't have that opportunity to endorse many products."

Nike donates tennis shoes, travel bags and T-shirts, which Yow said saves the team $5,000 a year.

The football team is looking into having an athletic shoe contract next fall, but no company has been named yet. While endorsements provide the impetus to continue hosting the athletic games, the athletes are still playing for the fun of it.

"You play to play the sport. In college athletics you're out to play, not to make money. If they let you endorse a product, then you might as well get paid for it," said Michael Orr, senior football offensive tackle.

Connie Teaberry, senior track team member, said she feels endorsements are beneficial. Nike provides track shoes and new uniforms for the track team every two to three years.

"I think it's a way for athletes to get up-to-date equipment. It's very helpful to any school or athletic team," Teaberry said.

ONE LAST SHOT

Senior John Rettiger remains upbeat despite fewer starts and reduced playing time for Cats

PATRICK OBLEY
Collegian

Last Wednesday night, it seemed no one knew K-State was to play Southern Utah.

The public-address system was not working. A sparse crowd remained deathly silent during the pregame warmups. Even the normally rowdy Bramlage Coliseum student section wasn't filled.

When Marcus Zeigler led the Cats' charge onto the court, a ball boy seemingly taken by surprise accidentally tagged him in the head with a basketball.

Keeping with the unseen, unheard and unknown theme of the night was John Rettiger. Coming into the Southern Utah game, Rettiger led the Cats with 80 career games played and had made 29 starts, including two at the BMA Classic over the semester break.

But with the emergence of post man Aaron Collier, Cats' coach Dana Altman had decided to bench the Strong City senior. And after playing sparingly since Altman made the move Jan. 6 at Oklahoma State, Rettiger wondered if he would ever get the chance to prove himself again.

"I really don't know why coach Altman did what he did, but it's not my place to question him," Rettiger said in the days before the Southern Utah game. "Things are going to happen. This is one of those things. I just have to keep my head up and wait for an opportunity to play again."

Against the Thunderbirds, that opportunity appeared, and Rettiger responded with 17 minutes of defensive leadership.

"John Rettiger responded well," Altman said after the 84-74 win. "He provided us with some solid minutes on defense, and that's exactly what we would like to see from him."

Rettiger said he felt it was necessary to take the role of leader on defense.

"I felt that, when I got into the game, I had to be a leader," Rettiger said. "I knew coach Altman wanted someone to step up on defense.

"When I talk about leadership on defense, I mean directing the little things," Rettiger continued. "Take charge on out of bounds plays, set up the defense coming down court, things like that."

True to form, the Wildcats turned it up a notch with Rettiger in the Southern Utah game. During one stretch, the T-Birds were held to just one field goal — an NBA 3-point goal — for a four-minute span in the second half.

It was during that time the Cats expanded a 56-50 lead to a 70-53 advantage.

"I was pretty pleased with my play," Rettiger said. "Defensively, I felt I knew where I was. My last foul ruined my whole evening, though."

Rettiger fouled out with 4:10 remaining in the game.

With the return to Big Eight play last Saturday at Iowa State, Rettiger returned to his former status of playing sparingly, scoring one point.

"I don't know how much he'll play from one game to the next," Altman said. "We'll see how he does."

For now, the Cats will continue to play with the same combination, according to Altman, which promises Rettiger little playing time and although the clock is ticking on what's left of his college career, Rettiger remains upbeat.

"My confidence is fine. I'm just happy to get into the game," Rettiger said. "My teammates have really supported me and have gotten me to believe in myself."

J. KYLE WYATT/File

John Rettiger (55) leads the Cats with 81 career games played. Rettiger has started 29 games during his career at K-State. Though the emergence of Aaron Collier has reduced his playing time, Rettiger said his confidence is fine and that he'll be ready to start again if he gets the chance.

Triple jumpers improving by leaps and bounds

McGrew, Tribue set sights on qualifying for nationals after strong showing in Columbia

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Hop — step — jump.

The three magic words of triple jumpers.

That K-State's triple jumpers understand the formula is for sure. They proved it by winning the event, on both the men's and women's side, at the Missouri triangular against Mizzou and KU Saturday.

Dante McGrew won the triple jump with a distance of 50-3 1/2-inches. Not only was the jump a meet record and personal record for McGrew, it also put him almost four feet in front of second place.

But McGrew didn't get too excited about it, looking down at his ankle, which just barely stayed away from a big ice bag.

"It was all right for today, but I could have jumped a lot better," he said. "Well, it wasn't bad. But with my ankle, man. ..."

McGrew said he messed up his ankle playing basketball last summer.

"Since then, he's a been struggling a little," assistant coach Clifford Rovelto said.

This time, McGrew made his winning jump on his fourth attempt. After his fifth, McGrew hobbled out of the sand box — the ankle.

But the post-event treatment let him look positively into the near future.

"I think the ankle will be OK next week," he said. "It wasn't as tough as the rest of the season will be. Next week in Arkansas, there will be some of the top jumpers in the nation."

However, this meet was a good start to a better future.

"It was my best jump in a while," McGrew said. "Hopefully I can get better and reach my goal to qualify for the nationals, which is about 54 feet."

For Rovelto it's all just a matter of consistent practice.

"Dante is a tremendous talent," he said. "He does have a lot of potential. The big thing with him is that he's to practice with more consistency and concentration. But there's no question, he's really got a lot of ability."

"Dante is a tremendous talent. He does have a lot of potential. There's no question, he's got a lot of ability."

— John Capriotti on Dante McGrew

Still, besides all good effort and intention, McGrew's health is concern number one.

"He had trouble with his injury," Rovelto said. "If we can keep him healthy over a longer time, that will help a lot."

Dee Dee Tribue was the exact likeness of McGrew in the women's competition.

Tribue won the triple jump with a length of 39-8 1/2, after being disappointed by placing third place in long jump earlier in the day.

"I'm probably more pleased that she was able to take and finish the six jumps rather than the distance she jumped," Rovelto said. "Because that shows that she is getting stronger. And we really need to get Dee Dee stronger."

Like McGrew, Tribue was injured last year. Tribue suffered from a shin stress fracture.

But Tribue showed that she is almost as good as she was before the injury. With three jumps over 39 feet and just a few close faults, Tribue had a good competition.

"Dee Dee had a great series," Rovelto said. "It's not surprising, but we're happy she is doing that."

SPORTS DIGEST

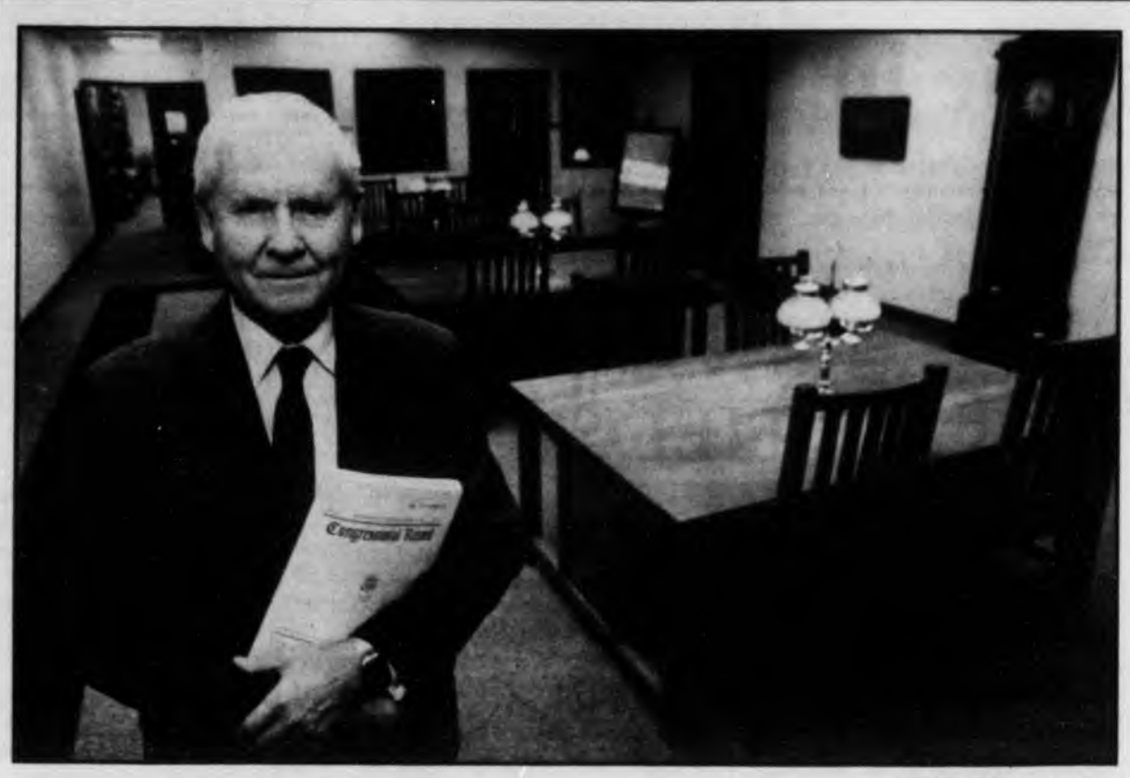
BASEBALL: Thurman, Royals agree on pact

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — Kansas City Royals outfielder Gary Thurman signed a one-year contract with the Royals Monday and won't go to arbitration, team officials said.

Terms of the contract weren't released.

Thurman, 27, played in a career-high 80 games last year, the first time he's stayed with the major league club for the full season. He hit .277 and stole 15 bases in 20 attempts.

The Royals No. 1 draft pick in 1983, he has spent time in the majors in 1988, 1989 and 1990. He has a career .245 average.



BASKETBALL: "Sky" Walker returns to Earth

BARCELONA, Spain (AP) — Former New York Knicks player Kenny "Sky" Walker will likely return to the United States to undergo surgery on a torn right Achilles tendon.

"I'm leaning towards getting out of here Tuesday or Wednesday," Walker said Monday. "The most important thing is to get the surgery done and get started on my rehabilitation therapy as quickly as possible. But I think I'd feel most comfortable having it done in the United States."

Walker was hurt while playing for Granollers in a Spanish ACB league game Sunday night. The 6-foot-8 forward is expected to be out three to five months, effectively ending his first season overseas after only four months.

Walker joined Granollers in October after the Knicks chose not to re-sign him. He was the No. 5 pick in the 1986 draft out of Kentucky.

Retired professor helps create new banking law

Banks must tell how interest is paid to savings, interest-bearing accounts

MITCH HIXSON
Collegian

Richard Morse, professor emeritus, had his day in Congress recently when legislators passed into law a banking bill he helped create.

The law changes the way banks report how interest is paid on savings and interest-bearing checking accounts.

Morse has devoted much of his professional career to campaigning for federal truth-in-savings legislation.

Financial columnist Jane Bryant Quinn even credited Morse as the "father of truth-in-savings legislation" in a December column in the Wichita Eagle.

Morse critiqued the language of the bill for the U.S. House banking committee in mid-December. Much of his suggested wording was included in the bill.

Morse is currently working with Federal Reserve Board officials who are writing the regulations for the bill to ensure the intent of the bill will be preserved.

Morse said the intent of the law is to allow savers to learn what their bank accounts are really yielding and how their rate compares with other local banks and savings and loans.

The truth-in-savings legislation is the sequel to Morse's work from 1959 to 1968 as consultant to the Department of the Treasury.

During that period, Morse testified four times before congressional committees for truth-in-lending legislation.

Morse said this law is important because savings is important to the economy.

"The law will give consumers greater confidence when making savings decisions and in managing savings accounts," he said. "The law was needed to set the rules of the game."

Morse said some banks and savings and loans pay interest that fails to equal the interest promised on savings, and truth-in-savings will set up rules that halt this type of confusion.

"Let's face it, there is money to be made from confusion," he said.

Truth-in-savings will mean consumers will be told up front of time limitations, fees, charges, penalties and how these are computed, plus many other elements about what their money is doing.

In defense of the banking establishment, Morse said that many times, banks are not trying to deceive patrons.

"If there were no rules to govern — saying this is right or wrong — there was no way to know if something was wrong or not," he said.

In many of the hundreds of documented cases of misleading advertising examined by Morse, banks just did not know for sure how they figured interest payments on savings deposits. Morse said this is because there are literally 7.8 million ways to figure interest.

Cynthia Hostetler, compliance officer at 1st Savings Bank in Manhattan, said the new law, which does not become mandatory until March 1993, should not, in itself, change the rates of interest on savings accounts by her bank.

"These rates are driven by the market and the competition," she said.

Hostetler said, however, that there may be additional costs to the bank because of the new law's rigorous reporting clause.

For instance, 1st Savings Bank will need to purchase new computer software to comply with the law.

Bob Haines, senior vice president of 1st National Bank and Trust in Manhattan, said he worries about the cost of compliance to the law.

"It's a good idea, but the cost of compliance will be paid by the customer," he said.

"The question arises — how to measure compliance. It costs to measure it, and this burden is put on the customer."

Haines said it is likely 1st National Bank and Trust will have to raise some fees somewhere to offset the costs of complying with the law.

Haines also said he believes the new law may make it harder for average consumers to understand what is happening to their money.

"If it's a large, experienced investor, the jargon will be understood, but to the everyday consumer, it will be confusing," Haines said.

When asked if he thought the public will think the banks have been ripping them off, Haines said that should not be a problem.

"The people who trust the bank will always trust the bank," he said, "and the ones who don't never will.

"If someone deals with a person they don't trust, they're the fool."

Hostetler said Congress could change the law many times before actual enforcement begins.

SUPREME COURT

Judges clear way for law against dial-a-porn

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court cleared the way Monday for enforcement of Congress' latest attempt to protect children from sexy telephone messages.

The attempt is a law that threatens to all but destroy the dial-a-porn business.

Without comment, the court rejected a challenge to a 1989 federal law requiring telephone companies to block access to sex-message services unless a customer asks in writing to receive them.

The law has not been enforced while the free-speech challenge, acted on Monday, was pending.

Joel Dichter, lawyer for four dial-a-porn companies that sought Supreme Court review, told the justices the law has unnecessarily curtailed, if not destroyed, adult access to lawful, protected speech.

Dichter was not available for comment Monday.

The court had given the $2-billion-a-year industry a reprieve in 1989 when it struck down a ban on all sexually oriented dial-up message services.

That decision acknowledged that Congress had a legitimate interest in preventing children from being exposed to indecency.

But, the justices unanimously said the blanket ban had the invalid effect of limiting the content of adult telephone conversations to that which is suitable for children to hear.

Congress went back to the drawing board and, under the prodding of Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., quickly passed a new law, one the dial-a-porn industry says places an unconstitutional prior restraint on speech.

The law requires phone companies, if technologically feasible, to block access to such services, available through 976 exchanges, unless written requests are received asking for access.

The law, however, imposes the requirement on a phone company only if it bills its customers for the 976 calls. The law does not appear to apply if the message-service company bills the phone customer directly.

In the dial-a-porn case, the 1989 federal law was challenged by four companies in federal court in New York City.

U.S. District Judge Robert Paterson said the law is unconstitutional because it is not the least restrictive means of keeping indecent messages from children while allowing access for adults.

He said voluntary blocking by individual customer requests to phone companies is adequately protective of children.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in July 1991 reversed Paterson and said the law was valid.

The justices on Monday let the appeals court ruling stand.

Currently, parents can keep sex-oriented messages away from children by asking phone companies to block access to the services.

Past rulings make clear that material deemed to be merely indecent, and not obscene, is entitled to constitutional protection under the First Amendment.

Obscenity is a legal term that does not apply to all sexually explicit, or pornographic, material.

Bush administration lawyers urged the high court to leave the 1989 law intact.

Arab, Israeli peace talks resume in Moscow

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOSCOW — Israelis and Arabs gathered Monday for a multinational conference on Middle East peace, but prospects were clouded by a Syrian boycott and a Palestinian attempt to use delegates opposed by the Jewish state.

Foreign ministers and senior diplomats from more than 20 nations came here at the invitation of the United States and Russia for a two-day conference on regional issues tied to the peace process, such as water-sharing, environment and arms control. The meeting begins Tuesday.

But Syria, the key Arab party in the U.S.-brokered peace effort, stayed away, saying insufficient progress was being made in the parallel bilateral peace talks in Washington. Lebanon excused itself on similar grounds.

Palestinians flew to Moscow with a delegation including members from Arab-dominated East Jerusalem — barred under rules made before the first round of talks began in Madrid, Spain, on Oct. 30.

Israel said it would only accept Palestinians from the Israeli-occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip. Israel considers Jerusalem the nation's capital and not part of occupied lands.

"The Madrid formula is history," said delegate Saeb Erakat. "We are here with an open heart and good faith. We are one people."

The eight-member delegation was headed by an East Jerusalem resident, Faisal Husseini. Only three of the delegates were from the occupied lands.

Erakat said the full delegation will attempt to attend the meeting on Tuesday. "If they prevent us from entering, we will enjoy touring Moscow," he said.

"The fact that Israel has a problem with Palestinian representation does not mean the rest of the world should agree with this," said spokeswoman Hanan Ashrawi.

Secretary of State James Baker, who will address the conference Tuesday, said Palestinians should attend under the Madrid formula.

K-STATE 2001

University, a university of approximately 5,800 full-time students, has a computer terminal in each dormitory room for the student. The university owns the computers and only charges the residence hall students if they use paper.

Sixty percent of the college's student population lives in the residence halls.

"There are 2,500 terminals on campus," said John Rickman, director of Computer Services and Telecommunications at NMSU. "There are 1,500 residence hall terminals, and every faculty member has one."

"Each terminal is connected to the mainframe," Rickman said. "This allows the students to look at their transcripts, to print out their class schedules and even to enroll in classes from their rooms."

Even the school newspaper is online. Students can read the daily newspaper right off the terminal in their rooms.

"Since 1987, we have been known as the electronic campus," Rickman said. "It cost the university $2.4 million initially to set up the system."

Coffman said that K-State would probably never provide computers to students living in the residence halls, like NMSU does. However, the residence halls will be on the network for students with their own computers.

"K-State won't provide computers because computers won't always be state of the art," Coffman said. "Computers in 2001, though, will be as routine as having a typewriter 20 years ago."

An advantage students have with buying their own computer is they can select the brand of computer. All the computers at NMSU are Digital computers.

Another change Coffman anticipates is an increase in tuition, which may include establishing college fees similar to the College of Engineering fee, to cover the increased spending on instruction.

"It wouldn't surprise me if there were fees for each individual college," Coffman said. "In fiscal year 1991, K-State spent $65 million on instruction. At the rate of projected inflation, $90 to 100 million will be spent on instruction in 2001."

The structure of instruction will also change by the year 2001. More emphasis will be placed on process and less on content.

"This will teach students to learn how to think rather than how to memorize," Coffman said.

There are a number of ways to accomplish this change in structure of instruction, Coffman said. One example is for classes to have group solving exercises, where a team of students would use the library and other resources on campus to solve a contemporary problem for that particular class.

"Students could work together and improve such skills as written, thinking and oral communications skills," Coffman said.

Enrollment

students can change dramatically. These figures are also based on open admissions."

He said there should be about a 5-10 percent increase in the enrollment in 2001.

"These figures are only for 77 percent of the campus, which are the undergraduates of the total enrollment," Downey said. "Also included are the non-traditional students and the second- or third-year freshmen."

Downey said K-State is in a relatively stable period from now through the fall of 1995. He said he is projecting a small, but fairly continuous growth that begins to accelerate as K-State approaches the latter 1990s and when the class of 2000 graduates from high school.

"Those numbers are based on high numbers of enrollees about 10 years back," Downey said.

"You can see what we're doing is going back and looking at the first grade and determining about how many students that will yield us as high school students later on. If everything else holds, the number of high school students available is going to grow."

Downey said the basic data used to determine enrollment projection is the number of available students for collegiate study, some history between the freshman, sophomore, junior and senior classes, and the mix of students who don't change their status every year because they transfer or aren't full time.

"It's a little better than a crystal ball," Bill Pallett, director of assessment, said when referring to the procedure.

Pallett surveys the number of seniors graduating in Kansas high schools and applies it to Downey's projections.

"We divide the counties into certain regions and find out which people will become seniors," Pallett said. "From there, we find out how many seniors will attend K-State."

There are many factors which are impossible to be included in the projections, hence many assumptions.

"There are a few assumptions you have to make," Downey said about the formula. "One, you assume the population is reasonably stable within the state. That is a tenuous assumption at that.

"Then, you must know how many children are starting kindergarten because we have some idea about how many kids start in kindergarten and will make it all the way through school."

Since the class of 2001 started kindergarten a few years ago, Downey has the numbers for the graduating class of 2001 and how many students K-State could be expecting under certain conditions.

"Based on the number of students that are in the lower levels, we can make projections about the number of students that will graduate from high school," Downey said.

"For the fall of 2001, there should be approximately 7,400 high school graduates that will attend college. That is a 28-percent increase from this past fall," Downey said.

Downey stressed the importance in the difference between the number of high school graduates and the number K-State receives as freshman.

"The traditional yield is about 12 percent of the graduates for K-State," Downey said.

Fluctuations in the school's enrollment figures can be seen years away as there are changes in the lower education chain, he said.

Since 1857, the northeast corner of the intersection of Claflin Road and College Avenue has been a vacant lot. But not for much longer.

A final vote on preliminary plans to build an eight-building apartment complex on this 14.21-acre tract of land was finalized at the Jan. 21 Manhattan City Commission meeting.

And although the commission gave the plan the thumbs up, the development met with organized opposition from surrounding neighbors.

"When any re-zoning like this is being done, they have to notify the neighbors within 200 feet," said Jodie Slothower, a nearby property owner.

The neighbors notified own the houses to the south of the development on Claflin, and several houses to the east on University Avenue.

Property owners said they were concerned about the development in their neighborhood for several reasons.

They opposed the increase of traffic on Claflin and College because of the development, and the current drainage problem that would be worsened.

Also, part of the solution proposed by the developer are watershed-style ponds to collect the water and drain it off slowly. Parents with children in the area were concerned about the ponds and the potential for children to drown.

Finally, neighbors voiced concern about the density of buildings in the area, as recommended by the Comprehensive Land Use Plan.

It is classified as medium to high, residential. This limits the number of units per acre from11 to 19.

The final development agreement was modified to try to correct some of the neighboring property owners' concerns.

Modifications were made through changing the number of bedrooms, but not the number of apartments.

As far as traffic concerns, Schwab-Eaton, the firm that developed the preliminary plans for the site, did traffic counts by placing weight sensitive lines across Claflin and College to gather a daily count.

From these numbers, the firm determined that Claflin is capable of carrying a maximum of 3,500 cars per day along its four lanes at an average speed of 20 mph. Current peak numbers are between 1,000 and 1,400 cars per hour.

Schwab-Eaton estimated the development will add 80-100 cars per hour to the current traffic load.

Other traffic concerns involve the placement of the driveway entering and exiting on to Claflin directly across from 2313 Claflin.

Area property owners were concerned the slope of the hill and the driveway's placement would not allow drivers sufficient visibility to enter Claflin traffic safely.

Schwab-Eaton looked at the slope of the hill and the 200 feet of visibility needed to enter the traffic.

"The numbers crunch," Kirkland Hoke, Schwab-Eaton representative, said. "Mathematically, there is no visibility problem."

Hoke also said there are always going to be some vehicles speeding or other extenuating circumstances mathematics and computer simulations cannot take into account.

The driveway complaints were raised mainly because of the pending project, but the drainage problem has been brought up by neighbors before.

In a projection of growth from the 1940s, city planners did not anticipate growth in the northern direction, and because of this, storm drains were not installed along University, said Eric Cattell, Manhattan senior planner.

When the area was studied again in 1974, planners recommended installing storm drains, but because of monetary restraints, drains were never added.

Cattell said water run-off drains from as far away as the K-State football practice field empty down into the now vacant lot and onto University.

The water runs down University to Todd Road, and down Todd to Claflin.

Instead of adding storm drains, developers are proposing to collect the water in small versions of water shed dams.

The water from these three retention ponds will be drained off through a 12-inch pipe along the same route it traveled before, but at a rate slower and more controlled than before, Cattell said.

The original plan by Schwab-Eaton called for a fourth pond to store run-off from the football practice field area, but the pond was removed from the plans and the area will be preserved in its natural state, Cattell said.

"The revised drainage plans are still capable of handling a 100-year storm," Hoke said.

A 100-year storm is a storm that, because of the amount of rain and the short time in which it falls, has a 1-percent chance of occurring in any given year.

Inherent in the drainage complaints, owners of surrounding property also said they were concerned with the possibility of their children drowning in these retention ponds.

"The biggest of these ponds is six feet deep when it's clear full and maybe 80 or 90 feet long," said Doug Phelps, property owner on University whose home falls within the 200-feet notification area.

Jerry Donnelly, the land's developer, said he offered to fence in the ponds to make the area safer and less accessible to children.

However, final plans were not modified to include this fencing.

Bill McFarlin, parent and University property owner, explained why the fencing wasn't included in the plan.

"The idea of fencing off the area was not added to the developers plans because of the possibility the water would wash under the fence and wash the fence out," he said.

McFarlin said he is concerned about the safety of his 21-month-old daughter growing up in such close proximity to these ponds.

Neighbors also claim the complex will bring density problems.

remain in the Army Reserves during this time.

To illustrate this option, a staff sergeant with 14 years of service would receive $7,129 per year for 28 years, and a captain with 10 years of service would receive $9,023 per year for 20 years.

"So far only about 50 soldiers have signed up for these programs," said Mark Meseke, Fort Riley media relations officer.

Meseke said although the sign up has not been great, the number of those interested will probably increase with time.

"There are many soldiers who have been in for six years or so who were possibly thinking of the military as a career, and these programs give them an option," he said.

Meseke also explained another program, targeted to younger soldiers, that was announced in October 1991 called the early transition program. Soldiers eligible are those who have been in the active service for three years. The agreement will release them upon request by Aug. 30, 1992, and no other benefits will follow.

"About 1,300 soldiers took this option last year," he said.

Because of the release programs, the Army Career and Alumni Program as well as the Job Assistance Center at Fort Riley have become inundated with many of these soldiers seeking help with employment.

"Whenever new programs begin, there is always a wave of new faces," said Jeanetta Chart, Fort Riley transitions services manager. "We are booked up every half hour with appointments."

The ACAP provides a service to soldiers leaving the Army, seeking employment as civilians.

"Soldiers and their family members transitioning from the military to the civilian world experience a certain amount of anxiety," Chart said. "Our program provides support to those being forced to make the transition into the civilian world as well as for those accepting the voluntary incentive programs.

"We've run into some situations with soldiers who have accepted the separation benefits program. They are given a lump sum of money and may be tempted to buy a new car or begin their own business, and we are here to guide them to make the right and the best choices for themselves by offering job seminars, financial counseling and interviewing skills training," Chart said.

"We believe the soldiers have many skills and are very marketable in a civilian atmosphere," she said. "They have a lot of qualities learned in the army that corporations are looking for."

Although the Army is said to be reducing its troop strength to 535,000 by 1995, recruiting is still in progress.

"Our mission is to recruit individuals who have never been in the service and prior military into the reserves. Right now my primary mission is to recruit reserves members," said Staff Sgt. David Cundiff, recruiter in Salina.

to his wife and three boys at the end of each week.

The pictures of his boys in football and basketball uniforms hung on his wall like trophies and reminders right next to a black-and-white sign that said, "Hugs not Drugs."

"Drugs are probably a bigger problem here than we know," he said in a Midwestern accent he'd picked up in his boyhood days on the streets of Westmoreland, "but it's kept pretty low-key."

He'd spent the afternoon working the "Case of the Stolen Textbooks Sold Back to the Union." He said he hoped it might lead to some things stolen from faculty offices.

He was also looking for leads on a rumor a gang was looking to rub out a sorority woman for some sort of perverse initiation. No one had been able to substantiate the rumors, he said, but he was still investigating.

Investigative work isn't easy, he inferred. When some fat-cat politician or political activist comes to town to speak at the University, Hermann and his team do background checks on the individuals who might have felt some animosity toward the speakers.

"When President Reagan came," he said, "there were several people in this area who had verbally made it known that they disliked him to the point they had made threats."

Hermann checked their backgrounds to see if they should have been kept out of the lecture. Everything turned out all right.

Then there was the "Case of the Missing Socks." Someone had reported a pair of three-dollar socks had mysteriously disappeared from a washer at the Jardine laundry facilities. The questioning was rough. Was the pair of socks lost or did someone sneak in and swipe them? It wasn't just a minor offense to the victim. It was a crime.

A crime like assault, burglary, harassing phone calls, rapes, sexual and racial discrimination. They all have to be investigated. He has to work with other departments around the state or the nation, or in the case of phone harassment, the phone company.

Herrman isn't the hard-boiled detective the movies, Mickey Spillane or hack reporters might make them out to be. He's never had to pull his gun. He's a low-key guy in a low-key job. The Little Apple isn't the place "Top Cops," a favorite T.V. show of his, might find a mecca of good weekly programming. But Richard Herrman, University Detective, likes it that way.

STATE OF THE UNION

Defense reductions are 'the right thing to do'

Don't expect quick fix, president cautions in speech

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — President Bush on Tuesday night proposed election-year tax cuts and business incentives to revive America's economy.

In his State of the Union speech he vowed, "We're going to lift this nation out of hard times."

Bush also outlined dramatic cuts in the U.S. nuclear arsenal.

The president also challenged the Democrat-controlled Congress to back his economic programs by March 20 or face a political fight. Invoking Persian Gulf War rhetoric, he vowed the recession "will not stand."

The centerpiece of his economic plan was a bid to put more money in peoples' paychecks by lowering tax withholding rates — even though it would mean smaller refunds a year from now.

Bush said it would pump $25 billion into the economy. It would increase take-home pay by an average of $300 for more than 90 million wage-earners, the White House said.

In a nationally televised address, Bush discussed the benefits of a reduced military threat from the disintegrated Soviet Union.

"The American taxpayer bore the brunt of the (Cold War) burden, and deserves a hunk of the glory," he said.

Bush said he would ask Russian President Boris Yeltsin on Saturday to agree to eliminate all land-based multiple warhead ballistic missiles.

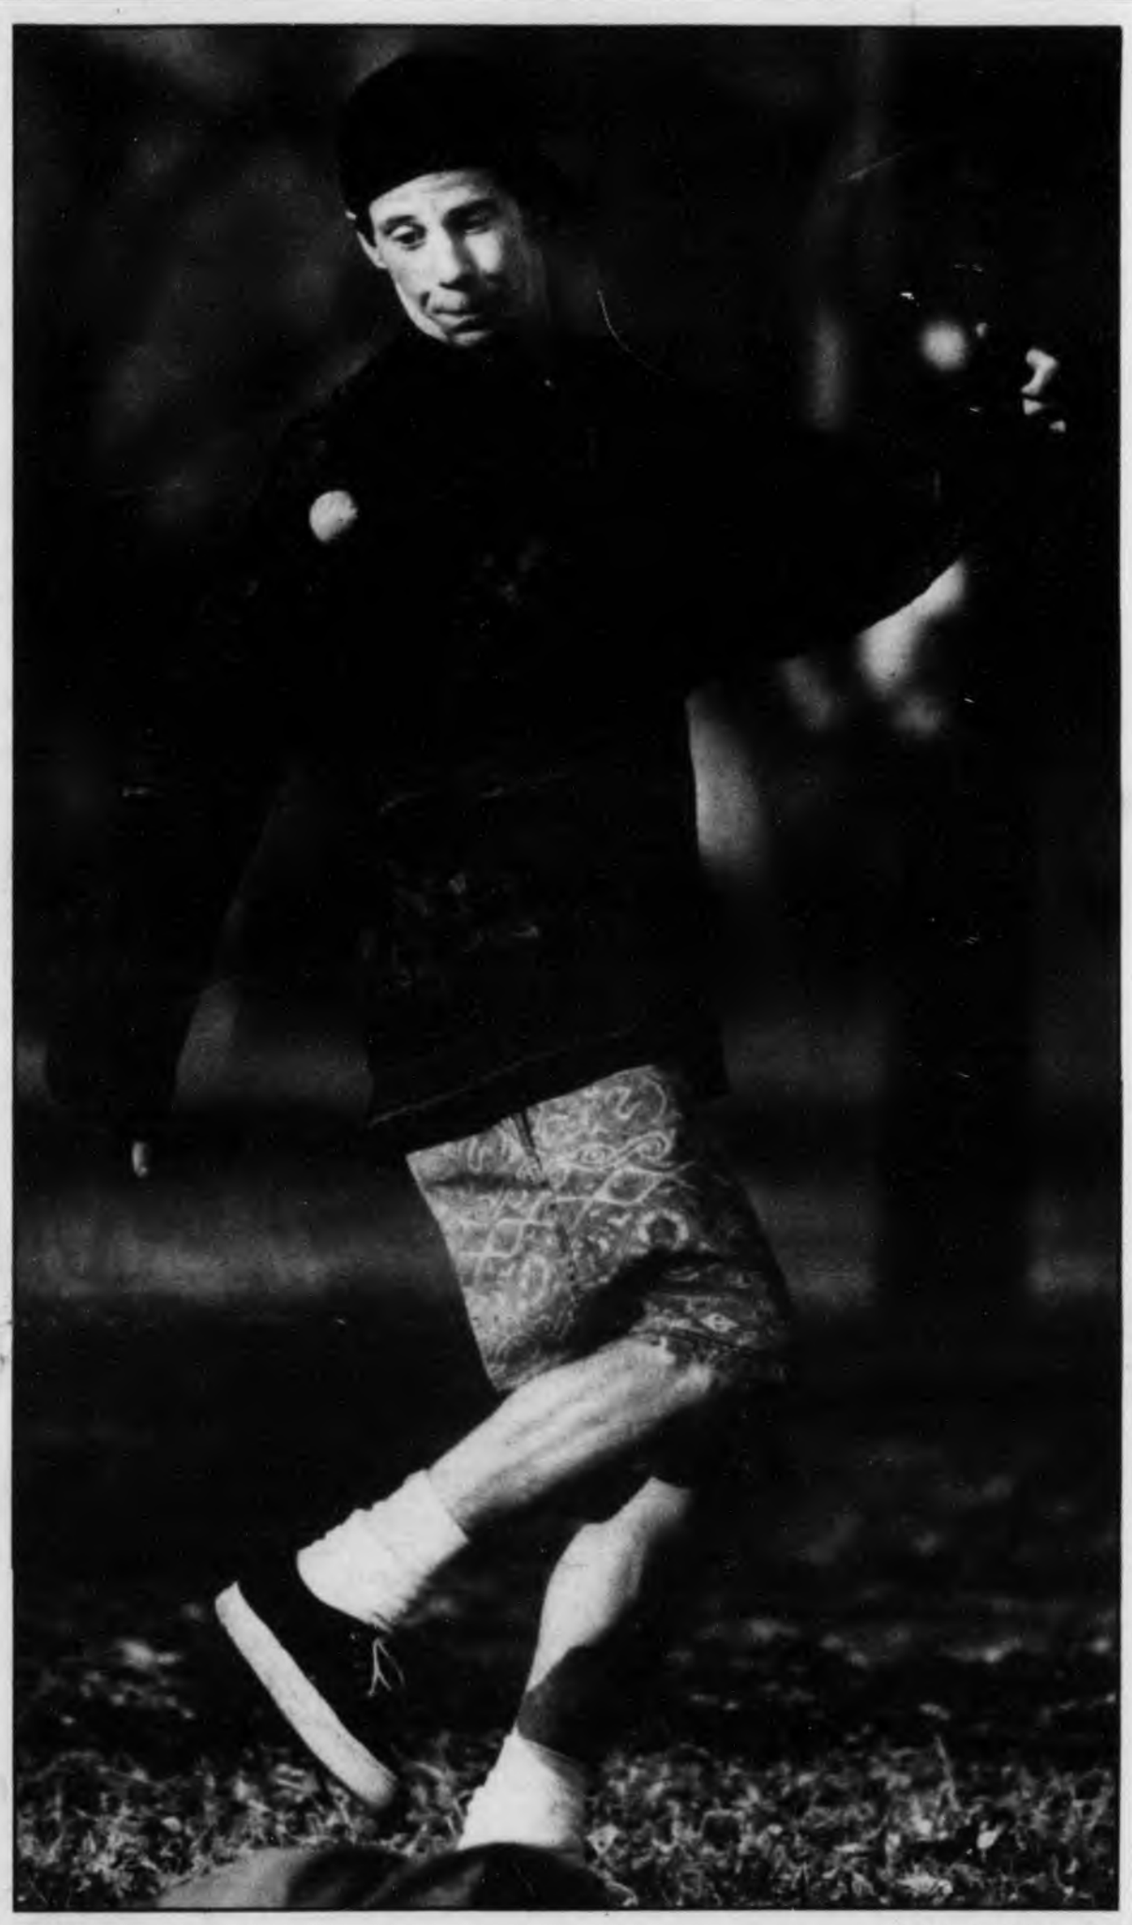
If Yeltsin agrees, Bush said, the United States will eliminate all MX missiles, reduce the number of warheads on Minuteman missiles to just one and cut the number of warheads on sea-based missiles by about one-third.

The arms proposal would mark the first time since 1945 that the United States has no nuclear weapons in production.

Over six years, the president proposed to cut defense spending by $50 billion and use the savings to finance tax reductions.

Bush's plan also would freeze federal spending on most domestic programs at current levels.

The Democrats sought to portray the tax cuts certain to come in terms of haves versus have-nots.



"... We seek a fundamental change from the unsuccessful economic policies of the past 12 years," House Speaker Thomas Foley said. "We will insist that this time, the benefits must go to working families, not to the privileged."

"We will insist that a middle-class tax cut be paid for not by taking money that should go to schools and health care, but by calling on the richest of our citizens, at long last, to pay their fair share," he said.

The president openly acknowledged that his election-year message to the nation would be read by many as a partisan theme for his campaign — an aside that drew groans from the assembled Democrats.

"I am doing what I think is right; I am proposing what I know will help,"

WHERE WE WILL LEARN AND LIVE

Land-grant tradition vital to campus of the future

NIRANJAN RAO

K-State will undergo minor cosmetic surgery between now and the year 2001.

Somewhere in the southeast corner of campus, the Marianna Kistler Beach Art Museum will have been serving the art philanthropists for six to seven years. The exact location is still under consideration.

Students who are tired of seeing the gray walls of monotonous buildings may be found in the northwest corner of campus — smelling the flowers in the K-State gardens.

Phase I of the gardens will be built next to the Veterinary Medicine Complex, said Thomas Warner, head of the Department of Horticulture.

The more diligent-minded may utilize the new additions to Farrell Library, while the brawn-minded could be thinking about the new recreation complex. The addition to Throckmorton Hall also will be completed.

Lee McQueen, director of architecture and engineering services, said the amount of campus facilities that will need to be provided to cater to the number of students is considerable, although the number of new buildings won't seem like many.

For example, with the addition of new buildings, another chilling plant for the air conditioning units in campus buildings will be necessary.

McQueen said any additional classroom space is unlikely, unless there is a significant change in student population trends.

The new handicap accessibility rules, likely to come into effect this year, will require some changes to be made in existing structures, he said.

As for the campus parking situation, McQueen said the only additional parking places will be an expansion to the parking lot north of Justin Hall.

Thomas Rawson, vice president for administration and finance, said the remote parking and shuttle services exist in concept only.

Rawson said the use of a computer network for communication is

The land-grant university tradition will have an affect on University capital planning decisions for the campus.

"We can't lose sight of the fact that our being a land-grant institution requires us to satisfy three criteria," said Vincent Cool, associate director of architecture and engineering services.

"The University has a responsibility to undergraduate teaching, University research and extension work."

Cool, a 1946 K-State graduate in architecture, has played an integral role in designing the campus's building growth since the early 1950s.

He said that the recent completion of Bob Dole Hall and the pending additions to Throckmorton Hall and Farrell Library exemplify the planning service's commitment to the land-grant mission.

Lee McQueen, director of architecture and engineering services, said although the architecture and engineering services staff plans capital projects, student numbers and academic departmental needs provide the original incentives for capital investments.

Community awareness of hazardous waste was the focus of a meeting between Fort Riley officials and members of the surrounding communities Tuesday night in Junction City.

About 30 people gathered in the Junction City High School cafeteria to listen to Fort Riley's Community Relations Plan and to offer feedback.

The heart of the plan is to explain cleanup efforts involving the hazardous waste spills at the Southwest Funston Landfill and the pesticide storage and mixing facility at Fort Riley.

These sites were added to the National Priorities List of Superfund sites Aug. 30, 1990.

The Hazardous Substance Response Fund provides monies for the identification and cleanup of hazardous waste sites.

Fort Riley has established a technical review committee that will act as a watchdog at Fort Riley and conduct a series of public meetings to receive feedback.

The meeting also provided a glimpse of the future.

▶ SERIAL KILLER GAINS FANS AT TRIAL

MILWAUKEE (AP) — A 28-year-old woman attending confessed serial killer Jeffrey Dahmer's sanity trial admits to having a near obsession with the case, which involves descriptions of cannibalism and necrophilia.

"I am fascinated by the whole story, to find out why somebody would want to do such a thing," Angela Zettel said. "The craziness of it. It is totally outrageous."

Two autograph-seeking teenagers sat outside the courtroom on Tuesday hoping for one of the 39 seats open for the public.

"We just want to see him," Amy Di Francesco, 16, said. "We want to get his autograph if they will let us. That would be cool to have Jeffrey Dahmer's autograph, because he is a killer."

She and her friend, Becky Ewing, 16, drove 60 miles from their hometown of Beloit, Wis., and skipped school for a chance to see Dahmer.

One woman was excused from consderation to serve on the jury after she said she "didn't have the stomach for it."

Cheating poses ethical dilemma for students

Tests and term papers popular items to share

COLLEGIAN STAFF

Megan is a chronic cheater.

This freshman in arts and sciences, who wishes to remain anonymous, incorporates many methods — keeping her head still and glancing out of the corner of her eye during history tests to writing on the back of her calculator.

And it doesn't end there.

"I've always used my sister's English papers," she said. "I've never written a research paper. I wouldn't know how."

Most students are aware of the University's academic dishonesty policy; they see it on every syllabus. In light of the recent stolen final exams, however, many have begun to question the overall honesty of K-State students.

According to the Office of the Provost, only one student has been expelled for academic dishonesty during the last year and a half. So in the heart of the Midwest, which is often stereotyped as straightforward and honest, cheating is a dilemma.

"It's a problem," Rod Vogl, professor of psychology, said.

He said it is easy to suspect a student but difficult to confirm what is sometimes a lofty charge.

Some signs of cheating, Vogl said, include frequent eye movement, attempted use of headphones during an exam, tests of the same color next to each other, little notes inconspicuously placed on the floor, and finishing a test within five minutes and only missing one or two questions, which is generally a sign the student obtained a test copy in advance.

Cheating occurs on tests and papers of every type, not only on multiple-choice exams.

Charla Windley, graduate student in speech and graduate teaching assistant, said occasionally there are students who aren't very wise, and sometimes she receives papers with two different handwritings or with notes from previous classes still legible on them.

Assistant Dean of Engineering John Dollar said one of the biggest problems his department has is students programming their calculators prior to tests.

Dollar also said cheating occurs in many forms.

One of the more drastic examples, he said, occurred several years ago during a make-up dynamics test.

The professor stepped out of the room for a few moments. When he returned, he noticed the student had taken out a crib sheet.

When the professor tried to take the sheet, the student crumpled it and attempted to eat it. The professor forced him to spit it out, and there was enough graphite remaining to prove the student was cheating.

"The evidence was incontrovertible," Dollar said.

Evidence, however, isn't always that easily obtained. So what happens when a student is accused of cheating?

"The sequence of events is such that there are a couple of steps before the dean's office," Dollar said.

"The information usually never

RECOGNITION

K-State scholar wins USA Today honors

BRIAN KRATZER
Collegian

A K-State student has earned another prestigious award after receiving the Truman Scholarship last year.

Jean Sonnenfield, senior in biology and pre-veterinary medicine, will fly to Washington, D.C., Thursday to receive the USA Today All-American Academic Team Award.

The $2,500 scholarship will be awarded to Sonnenfield and 19 other recipients.

"I found out I won on the second day of registration," Sonnenfield said. "I called my mother on the phone, and she wasn't there, so I just left a message."

Sonnenfield said her mother immediately asked her to send the newspaper clippings to her grandmother and sisters.

There were more than 12,000 scholarship applicants from 16 states.

"Basically — at least this is what the application said — they were looking for leadership qualities, the type of personality they had, the standard campus activities, all that kind of stuff," Sonnenfield said.

"But you had to write an essay that was about an intellectual endeavor, which was anything from research to art to writing music to giving a song — it was real broad.

"So I wrote about my research for the division of biology, which was my cancer cell research."

Sonnenfield worked on research — "ASSAY of Genetic Rearrangements in Bacteroids" — from January 1991 to May 1991. She received a $500 grant to help with her research.

"Those are the official dates, even though she was working before and after that," said James Urban, associate professor of microbiology and Sonnenfield's research adviser.

"She was in the lab some during last summer, spring and some into the fall," he said.

"She was a delight — clearly bright, cheerful, conscientious, innovative, reliable, creative. She clearly has the drive to pursue a career that it takes to do research.

"In research, you don't usually get results immediately."

Sonnenfield said she hopes to begin another project before she enrolls in the College of Veterinary Medicine.

"There are so many options there, like working for the government, doing research and, of course, small animals," she said.

"Right now, all those interest me, but I could get into vet school and the next thing you know, I could be working on cows for the rest of my life.

"You never know. A lot of people have come in and done 180-degree turns and gone the other way. That's what makes the field so interesting."

Sonnerfield's said her plans to work for college money haven't changed.

As a native of Omaha, Neb., out-of-state tuition, she said, hasn't been easy for her to pay.

From her freshman days as a residence hall receptionist and her work backstage at McCain Auditorium to helping professors with their research in the Department of Pathology in the College of Veterinary Medicine, Sonnerfield has balanced work with school — and life.

Sonnerfield is a member of the K-State women's soccer team, a member of Blue Key National Honor Society and an ambassador for the College of Arts and Sciences.

"Even while doing all the research, who could deny that she is intelligent and socially fit at the same time?" Urban said.

LEGISLATURE

Video lottery risks debated

KELLY KLAWONN
Collegian

Gov. Joan Finney's proposed initiative to legalize video gambling in the state has been met with both enthusiasm and skepticism.

If passed by the Kansas Legislature, the revenue would be used to alleviate some of the property tax burden and supplement educational funding.

Local bar owners have said they view the video lottery as a means of getting more people into the bars and providing a means of additional income.

"With all the added restrictions placed on bars — the higher drinking age, no happy hours, and lack of sponsorship and advertising from companies — all working against you, it would be just another way to get people into the bar and provide an added income source," Brad Meyer, manager of In the Bleachers, said.

Senate debate, on the other hand, has focused on the instability of video lottery as a long-term source of revenue and the accuracy of revenue estimates, which have ranged from $30 million to $100 million.

"The revenue numbers are not hard numbers. We must be very careful not to make the video lottery a windfall for the state," Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said.

The machines work like video games. Players can bet up to $2 in quarter increments, with payoffs ranging from $500 to $1,000.

All machines would be hooked up to a central control in Topeka that would have the ability to shut off any machine at any time.

Legislators have expressed reservations about the importance of education in the state if funding is supplemented by gambling.

"We need to create a solid base for education in the state. Video gambling ought not be the foundation upon which we rest education in the state," Glasscock said.

"By basing the budget on a one-time shot, we would be basing it on marsh land."

ALCOHOL

Drinking laws foreign to international students

Age restriction takes adjustment but isn't bothersome

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

Different countries, different customs, different laws.

When international students come to the United States, they have to adapt to many rules and customs that are different from those of their native country.

One concern of most students is to have fun in addition to studying. Enjoying parties and going to bars is a common activity, but for many younger students the doors to bars often stay closed.

This is nothing new for Americans, who are used to the law, but for underage international students, it could be a problem, especially if the student's home country has a lower drinking age.

Brenda Santana, 20-year-old senior in pre-veterinary medicine from Puerto Rico, said the fact she can't drink in public doesn't bother her a lot. She said it's more that she doesn't have access to several of the bars, being just a few months under 21.

"I don't drink very often, so the age regulation doesn't affect me much," she said. "But I think it's unfair that I can't get into the bars, even if I just come to have fun and to dance."

Martine Shrubsole, freshman in physical education, is 18 years old. She said it bothers her not to be allowed to drink in the United States, because in her home country of Australia, she is allowed to drink at age 18.

Esteban Castro, junior in industrial engineering from Costa Rica, is 20 years old. People are allowed to drink at age 18 in Costa Rica.

The age policy in Kansas basically affects everybody, he said.

"Underage students who like to drink go to parties with their friends, since they can't get in bars," Castro said.

"Then it often happens that they get drunk and drive in that condition, putting other people in danger."

Somehow, that is a result of the age policy, he said.

"I think it's really dumb," he said. "I don't see major differences between students who are 18 or 19 and who are 21. I think a 21-year-old person isn't more responsible than a person who's 20."

Santana, Shrubsole and Castro all agree that it is unfair for bars to charge underage students a higher cover charge than for more those older than 21.

But not all students think the drinking age policy is unfair.

Natsuyo Kema, 20-year-old freshman in pre-journalism and mass communications from Japan, said she has no problems with the age policy.

"It doesn't affect me, anyway, because I don't like to drink," she said.

ALCOHOL

Price not only difference in beers

ULRIKE DAUER
Collegian

Bier is not beer. There are differences, and people have preferences.

"On import beers, kids usually stay with one brand," said Tom Newman, Stroh's and Old Milwaukee distributor for Riley, Geary and Dickinson counties.

With American beer, it's different.

Ed Rickel, owner of Rickels Retail Liquor, said people often switch brands.

He said American breweries offer a lot more sales, and people follow the price.

"They buy what is the cheapest," Rickel said.

Imported beers usually cost more, so people stick with one brand because they know they like it, Newman said.

More than 41 of the almost 80 brands of beer Rickels stocks are imports.

Newman said the Mexican Corona and the Dutch Heineken brands sell best.

"There is a difference between American beer and import beer," Daniel Fung, professor of food science, said.

"European beers are heavier because there is more protein in barley, the only cereal European breweries in general are allowed to use for beer making," Fung said.

American beer can be made with corn and rice, and it has a lighter body because of this, he said.

Fung said American beer contains less alcohol than foreign beer.

"The alcoholic content in import beer ranks from 4 to 6 percent, whereas American beer usually contains 4 percent," Fung said.

Beer sold in Kansas grocery stores can only have a 3.2 alcohol percent content by law.

However, Fung said there are significant differences in the manufacturing process. U.S. breweries are allowed to blend batches of different taste, whereas foreign companies cannot.

"For instance, 100 gallons of Budweiser of different taste can be mixed up to a standard. Japanese manufacturers can't do that. Japanese beer has to be sold the way it is produced," Fung said.

American breweries have to follow a list of acceptable ingredients for beer published by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, an agency of the Department of Treasury.

Michael Barney, microbiologist with the Miller Brewing Co. in Milwaukee, said the Federal Alcohol Administrations Act applies for beer.

American beers are less expensive to produce than imports, because the American law allows different sources of starch, Fung said. Corn, rice and other starches are cheaper adjuncts.

COLLEGIAN OPINION

STATE OF THE UNION

In 1988, George Bush promised 30 million jobs would be created by the end of his second term as president. As of December 1991, 960,000 jobs have been created.

— HARPER'S INDEX

EDITORIAL

BUSH

Read my lips: no new answers

President Bush merely fulfilled his constitutional obligation to Congress by showing up and delivering his State of the Union Address Tuesday night.

Pervaded by platitudes, the president's speech contained few specifics. Not that anyone would take his promises seriously, after asking us to read his lips in 1988.

Although he did crack a few good jokes, he skirted the important issues. Bush rode a Gulf War camel that ran out of water a long time ago.

He wasted a lot of time trying to bring back fond war memories that helped boost his ratings and kept the people ignorant of the economy's inevitable decline.

He took his jabs at isolationism and racism, which inherently chastised his Republican presidential competitors — Patrick Buchanan and David Duke.

And he didn't forget the Democrats. The age-old party lines were decried as he said political futures were less important than the well-being of the United States of America.

If he really believed that, why did he save his attempt to revive America's economy for the State of the Union Address? Why not just jump right in and start helping Americans?

To the demise of Republicans, and the joy of Democrats, Bush's mediocre platform performance didn't do much to improve his re-election bid.

America didn't need another speech about her past triumphs, current problems or political double talk. What it really needs is action, and action now.

Serendipity rediscovered

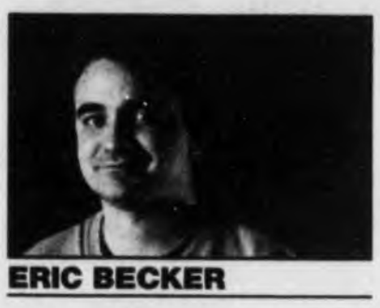
A while back, I was looking up the word "sequester" in the dictionary. I'd heard one of my teachers use it. Not knowing for sure what it meant at the time, I'd scribbled it into my notes, meaning to look it up later.

When I got to a dictionary and paged about in the listings that started with "s," my eye happened upon another word, which has since that time become one of my favorites.

The word is "serendipity." The American Heritage Dictionary defines it as "the faculty of making valuable discoveries by accident."

What a great word. Who wouldn't be happy to add it to his or her vocabulary?

It's the word your tears form when a class you've taken as a general education requirement interests you enough to make you question your previous major choice.



It's the name of the book you happen across in the stacks of the library while searching for a book with some other title.

It may even be the name of the best friend of the woman (or man) you asked out recently. The date may have gone badly; the person you asked out simply wasn't interested. But sometimes you may discover, quite by accident, that it was your date's best friend who was actually interested in you all the time.

(If my name was Serendipity, I'd join a bowling team – just to get a shirt with my name on it.)

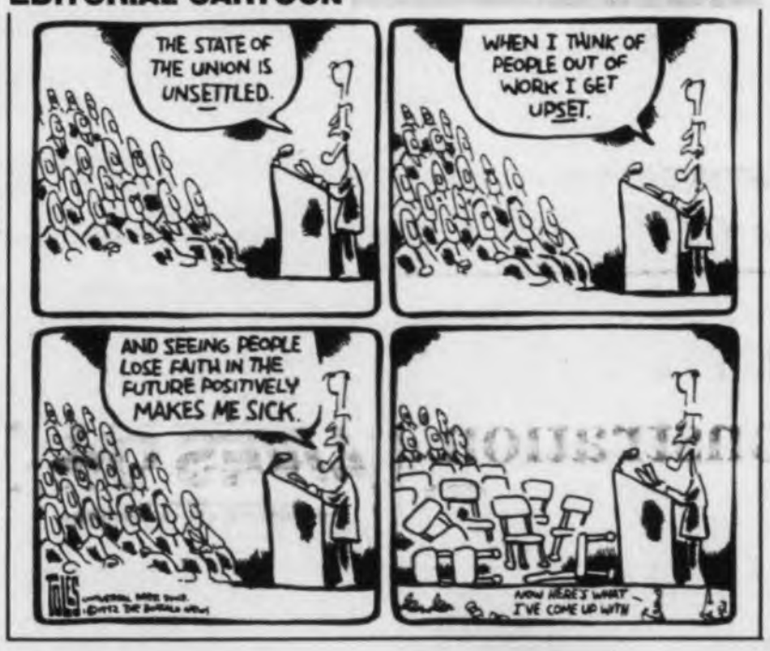
In a world where things eventually come together, but where things seldom seem to make much sense, serendipity can make small winning moments of even minor failures.

If a person, say, writes a column, he or she may inadvertently affect a change of direction in a second draft of it. There have been times in my experience that while reworking a column and trying to follow the language I've employed (instead of trying to follow the idea I have), it has come out quite differently. I suppose I'd like to think that these changes have something to do with some small amount of technical skill. But the discoveries I make (as a result of whatever effort) are often, nevertheless, accidents and surprises.

ERIC BECKER

If we dismiss words like "destiny" and "fate" as lofty and beyond our understanding, a word like serendipity must come into our vocabularies. The concept of serendipity is a pragmatist's tool. What word can better describe the faculty by which we learn from coincidental occurrence?

I've read that coincidence is an undiscovered science. By this thinking, the little accidents and surprises of life are part of an immense, predestined and inevitable plan or plot.



Although serendipity is probably not entirely incompatible within this scheme of things (and although I am myself a bit predisposed to use words like "destiny" and "fate"), it seems that the faculty for making accidental discoveries deserves more credit than predestination can allow it.

Serendipity allows life its humanness, its trial and error, while fate removes or reduces the actions of humankind. There can be a feeling of accomplishment in serendipity, a sense that we can learn from our mistakes and make victories of disasters. It maintains the sense of rational action that it seems desirable to maintain in life — a sense more hard to come by in stilted, stuffier schemes. I rather hope we have some control, some of the capacity for adjustment and change, that serendipity implies.

Serendipity. It was one of the American Heritage Dictionary's most recent offerings to me, and in my opinion one of the most valuable to date.

What a great word.

▶COLLEGIAN NOISE EDITORIAL CHILDISH

Editor,

It is unfortunate that the Collegian has taken such a childish and immature attitude in regards to the recent noise ordinance currently being adopted by the City of Manhattan. Many of us who live in the older neighborhoods surrounding Aggieville do so for several reasons. We like the convenience of having entertainment and other services nearby. We like the diversity of the population — the elderly, toddlers, middle-age people, and, yes, college students.

Fortunately, we live in a country where everybody has rights. When one's activities infringe upon the rights of another, a line is drawn. To say, "Those who live near Aggieville, quite frankly, are getting what they asked for. ... ," suggests that Aggieville is not a civilized society, and any controls or laws that govern a normal law-abiding society should not apply in areas where college students are concerned. And, yet, the author of this editorial has the audacity to complain about a rental inspection program that has yet to be passed. What kind of a double standard is being requested here?

It is unfortunate the Collegian would seek to promote tension among patrons and business owners of Aggieville and nearby residents of the older neighborhoods. It is obvious the Collegian is not aware that the strongest proponents of a viable, rigid rental inspection program for student housing are the residents of the older neighborhoods surrounding Aggieville, the same residents the Collegian is admonishing for wanting, of all things, to be able to go to sleep after midnight!

▶CITY COMMISSIONER WELCOMES VIEWS FROM STUDENTS

Editor,

Students' joie de vivre is certainly an asset to our community. When joie de vivre, however, is equated with "drunk ... rowdy ... fights ... crimes ... " then the primary purpose of higher education has missed its mark, and it is time to clarify where individual freedom ends and individual responsibility begins. If the City Commission has egregiously misgauged the fine line between loud music and public nuisance, I, as one of the commissioners, would like to hear about alternative ways to redraw that line.

▶BLACK GREEK WANTS RESPECT, NOT SURPRISES

Editor,

Thank you, Eve, for stating everything that was going on in my mind about the Panhellenic photos. I am in absolute agreement with you.

I think it is very hypocritical of the Royal Purple to not publish the individual photos of the traditionally black greek organizations. Yet, every year, administrators ask us black students what can be done to promote racial equality and unity on this campus. Last year, we addressed a representation problem with the Royal Purple and the Collegian, and both stated that things were going to be changed. But now the changes are nonexistent.

We, as members of Panhellenic Council, simply ask to be represented in our individual organization photos just as the other greeks on this campus are represented. Is that too much to ask? I do not think so.

There is one thing. Do not "surprise" us by publishing the photos. Give us our due respect by publishing them.

Leslie A. Smith
Senior in Business Management

THERE'S A PERSON BEHIND THAT FACE

Beauty is in the eye of the beholder. So why is everyone so blind? That was my motto in high school. I still think it fits.

Everywhere I went this weekend, I saw beautiful people. I don't know if it was my good mood, or if it's a side effect of all the art classes I have taken.

A figure-drawing class I took at the Kansas City Art Institute changed the way I look at the world and people. In that figure-drawing class, the professor taught us to look at the character and individual components that comprise the whole. He taught us to let go of our preconceived ideas of what the human body looks like and to actually see what is there. The class also taught me to look beyond the facade, at the person behind the face.

CARLA JONES

This is an absolutely wonderful way to look at people. Not only do I see details I never noticed before, but this philosophy also helped me realize how intriguing individuals are.

The America the Beautifuls shop at the 5,7,9 store and are contestants in the Miss Clairol box-cover contest. It's been determined that if Barbie were life-size, she would topple over because she is so top heavy. She's not even anatomically correct. I personally haven't been a size nine since I was bulimic my sophomore year of high school.

The people who are most interesting to me are the so-called "everyday people" who have such imperfections as freckles, wrinkles, and crooked eyes, ears and mouths.

I love to talk to people and listen to their experiences. I think it is so interesting to hear how they got where they are. One of the best conversation openers is, "Why are you here?" The more I learn about people, the more attractive they become to me. The personality behind the face comprises 90 percent of the face's character. The other 10 percent is flesh and bone.

One of the most beautiful people I have ever known is the matriarch of my family, my 75-year-old aunt Sadie. She's full-blooded German and an "old maid" by her own label. She's spent a lifetime taking care of other people around her, anyone in need.

Sadie was in the Women's Army Corps in World War II and broke off an engagement to take care of her ailing parents and help support her nine siblings. She helps feed the poor, takes care of her aging cousin and helps with almost all church functions. Sadie is the closest person to a saint I have ever met. She's not Catholic, but if I could nominate her for sainthood, I would.

I also think she's lovely on the outside. She is so interesting to look at. Sadie has the classic bulbous, long German nose. No ifs ands or buts about it — it's big. She has intelligent, piercing blue eyes that read people like a book. She always knew when I was lying as a child.

Sadie has naturally curly blonde-white hair and a small frame. Her 5-foot-2-inch stature is just about right for me to put my arm around her shoulders. Every day before 7 a.m., Sadie walks a mile. She still mows her own lawn and trims her bushes. She feeds the squirrels, birds and her long-haired cat.

Though she is small, she is mighty. Sadie has a loud, booming voice. Direct and honest, she is also the only person my 6-foot-2-inch father fears and obeys. She raised him after his mother died while he was still a child.

To a stranger's quick glance, Sadie is just an old lady. To me, she is the most beautiful woman in the world. I am thrilled that the figure drawing class I took six years ago helped me learn to appreciate her. It helped me see a beautiful and diverse world. There are no ugly people in this world, only different people.

"If any thing is sacred, the human body is sacred."

– Walt Whitman

Underneath the facade, there is a living, breathing individual with goals and wants and needs. The facade may draw you to a person, but the personality keeps you connected for the duration.

As Walt Whitman wrote in "Children of Adam," "If any thing is sacred, the human body is sacred."

I like to think so.

Seminar helps entrepreneurs get on feet in new businesses

TONDO WALDRON
Collegian

People who see an empty building and envision a flourishing business are a rare breed.

This rare breed, also referred to as entrepreneurs, often have a vast imagination for the possibilities in the business world, but this spark is often doused by the reality of getting the business started.

Thanks to the Small Business Development Center, a course will be offered to turn that spark into the flame of seeing how to get the ball rolling.

The course, Starting a Small Business in Kansas, is a seminar for individuals considering establishing or buying a small business or for those who have recently done so.

The topics of the course will include developing a business plan, legal considerations, financial management, marketing management, record keeping, taxes and personnel relations.

"The exciting part of the business is each client is different, it starts with an idea, and each idea is as varied as the people who come to see us," Fred Rice, director of the business development center, said.

Jack Jankovich, instructor of small business operations, said, "Not only does the class get you on your feet, but it teaches you to walk before you run."

The course is a four-week seminar offered from 7 to 9:30 p.m. Wednesdays, Jan. 29 and Feb. 5-19 in Junction City. The class will also be taught in Manhattan Feb. 25.

Kitty Pursley had a dream of quitting her job as an insurance casualty underwriter to start a business of manufacturing and marketing clothing and bags for horse owners.

She met with Rice and told him about her dream. The business development center helped her design a mail-order catalog/brochure to be mailed to potential customers and members of horse clubs across the country.

Through another business development center client, Pursley was able to have a unique horse trailer built to carry and display her merchandise at horse shows.

She said the business has been extremely successful, and she has had to hire additional help to complete her orders on time.

She has expanded her line to include saddles, boots and tack, and has become a distributor for the trailer company.

Pursley credits the business development center for helping her reach with her dream.

"To work for myself and to do something I enjoy has always been my dream," she said. "From the initial contact, I found them very willing to help me with each new challenge."

U.N. believes Iraq still has chemical weapons

ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — The U.N. inspectors roughed up by protesters in Baghdad are seeking Saddam Hussein's secret biological and chemical weapons production plants, officials disclosed Tuesday.

A private report by Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali to the Security Council that was viewed by the Associated Press shows U.N. officials believe Iraq still has undisclosed chemical and biological weapons factories.

The report, which was circulated Tuesday to the members of the council, said the U.N. Special Commission must identify the components and manufacturing sites for the chemical and biological weapons that have already been found in Iraq.

Boutros-Ghali's report says 10 types of Iraqi chemical weapons have been identified, but inspectors have found production equipment for only two types of munitions so far: 250mm and 500mm aerial bombs.

Baghdad previously declared it made all its own chemical weapons, or modified imported munitions in its own facilities.

Iraq, therefore, must have production sites for the other eight types of chemical weapons, the report says.

An 18-member team of U.N. chemical and biological weapons inspectors arrived at a Baghdad hotel Monday from Manama, Bahrain, to begin their mission.

About 40 Iraqi demonstrators mobbed them. Three were jostled and pinned against a wall in the hotel lobby. The other 15 were blockaded in their bus for about 25 minutes. No one was injured.

The president of the Security Council, British Ambassador Sir David Hannay, on Tuesday protested the incident to Iraqi Ambassador Abdul Amir al-Anbari.

U.N. officials said the team, to remain in Iraq until Feb. 5, began work Tuesday without further problems.

Iraq has also declared it had a biological weapons program but claimed it was only a research project and not geared to full-scale production of weapons.

Boutros-Ghali's report expressed extreme skepticism.

"The Special Commission considers that such a plan is a logical part of the Iraqi program and will continue to press for its disclosure," it said.

U.N. inspectors have found more than 125,000 Iraqi chemical munitions so far, including more than 46,000 filled bombs, shells and warheads. Many of them were dangerously leaking.

Aid to Israel should stop, SAP says

Exhibit illustrates uprising, oppression of Palestinians

KATIE WALKER
Collegian

Terrorism, particularly in Israel and Palestine, may hit closer to home for American taxpayers than they realize.

This is a message several students tried to bring home to the University.

The Palestinian Student Association displayed an exhibit in the K-State Union Tuesday to increase awareness of the United States providing financial aid to Israel, the occupying power in Palestine.

"K-State students and Americans have a direct hand in giving money to Israel for settlements in occupied territories," Talat Rahman, PSA adviser, said.

"People should realize that their money is being used, and that aid should not be continued. It only aggravates the problem. People can't force others to live in peace, but Americans can refuse to send money."

Recent peace talks in Moscow and Madrid attempting to settle the Middle East disputes have been mostly unsuccessful because several parties, such as Syria and Lebanon, have chosen not to attend.

Palestinians also slowed the process Monday by bringing East Jerusalem delegates who had been barred from participation.

Man-Kit Wong, senior in electrical engineering, and Ryan Hampl, junior in engineering technology, saw the display and said they agreed giving money to Israel is fine, as long as that money is not used in the occupied territories or for military reasons.

Rahman said her solution to the peace problem would entail making two states — one for Israel and another for Palestine.

"Israeli existence isn't in question, so Palestinian existence should not be in question," she said.

Another PSA member offered a different solution.

"They (Palestinians) need justice. God is just. We should relieve the oppressed of their oppression and stop the oppressors (Israeli) from oppressing," said Hisham Hidmi, graduate student in physics.

Tuesday's exhibit featured editorial cartoons, photos of dead and wounded victims and maps of the area.

"It shows how Palestinians are dragged from their homes, tortured and jailed for owning a Palestinian flag," Rahman said. "Palestinian children hold stones, while the Israeli soldiers have guns."

The display was also meant to tell the history of the Intifada, the mass uprising of the Palestinians to end Israeli control and to achieve self-determination that achieved important successes beginning in 1987.

However, PSA members said Palestinian freedom still remains in question.

They also said that U.N. resolutions made in 1947 dealing with the Palestinians' rights to self-determination, without external interference, and of their national independence and sovereignty rights, have not been met.

SPORTS DIGEST

BASKETBALL: O-State gets by SMU

DALLAS — Undefeated Oklahoma State got an unpleasant surprise, but the third-ranked Cowboys showed they can survive an off-night.

Byron Houston scored 13 of his 17 points in the second half Tuesday night as the third-ranked Cowboys collected a hard-earned 64-53 victory over Southern Methodist.

By winning, the Cowboys became only the third Big Eight Conference team ever to sweep its non-conference games.

SMU sprang a 2-3 zone that slowed the Cowboys, who earned their 19th consecutive victory while the Mustangs dropped to 8-9 overall.

OSU completed its non-conference slate with a 16-0 mark. Only Missouri in 1973 and Kansas in 1990 had gone unbeaten in non-Big Eight play.

The Cowboys are off to the best start in school history and are shooting for the school victory streak of 25.

NFL: Levy tells Bills to shut up

BUFFALO, N.Y. (AP) — Marv Levy is fed up with his Buffalo Bills in more ways than one.

In the aftermath of the Bills' 37-24 loss to the Washington Redskins in Sunday's Super Bowl, Levy warned his players about their behavior prior to big games.

"I think some of them could use better judgment in their public statements," the Bills' coach said before his team left Minneapolis on Monday. "I think you're better being totally bland in your comments.

"I don't think they realize a comment they make is interpreted in greater depth than the depth of thought they gave before making the comment. They're better off just talking football."

Levy wasn't naming names, but his comments appeared to be meant for NFL MVP Thurman Thomas and defensive end Bruce Smith.

In the week leading up to the Super Bowl, Smith complained that some fans sent him racist letters and he was considering asking for a trade, while Thomas still insisted he wasn't getting enough recognition.

After the game, in which he missed the Bills' first two offensive plays because he couldn't find his helmet, Thomas criticized the coaching staff for not giving him the ball more often.

Levy also said that in 40 years of coaching, he never heard of a player missing playing time because of a lost helmet.

BIG EIGHT: Coleman cries foul on MU

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo. (AP) — Missouri forward Jamal Coleman said Tuesday that he was treated unfairly by an all-white disciplinary panel that suspended him from school for a misdemeanor theft conviction.

"A black person sitting and facing nine white people — I don't think that's too fair," Coleman, a 21-year-old senior, said during a federal court hearing challenging his December suspension by the university's Student Conduct Committee.

Coleman is challenging the severity of his punishment, since two women who joined him last year in a scheme to bilk the University Bookstore of more than $3,000 were not suspended from school.

Coleman acknowledged receiving $688 of the money from the January-to-April scam, which involved using phony merchandise-return receipts to get cash refunds from the university owned store.

U.S. District Judge Scott Wright is considering whether to keep in effect his December order temporarily setting aside Coleman's suspension, which was upheld by Chancellor Haskell Monroe, who has since resigned.

Coleman is averaging 8.1 points and 4.1 rebounds per game in 15 games.

BASEBALL: Royals sign Wilkerson

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — The Kansas City Royals on Tuesday signed free agent infielder Curtis Wilkerson to a Triple-A contract.

Wilkerson, an eight-year veteran with Texas, the Chicago Cubs and Pittsburgh, was invited to the Royals spring training camp.

Wilkerson can play shortstop or second base. The Royals say they are strong up the middle defensively with shortstop David Howard and second baseman Terry Shumpert, but both are offensive liabilities.

Wilkerson, who batted .188 last year in 85 games for Pittsburgh, has a career .245 average.

CATS BASKETBALL

Reeling Cats close out non-conference sked with Roos

PATRICK OBLEY
Collegian

A struggling Cats team will have one last chance to work the kinks out of its game against a non-conference foe before delving back into the rugged Big Eight race when Missouri-Kansas City comes to Bramlage Coliseum tonight.

In their three losses in Big Eight play, the Cats have not been able to play a full 40 minutes at both ends of the court, Dana Altman said Tuesday.

A major reason for the letdowns during Big Eight play is the lack of a leader, according to Altman.

In each of the losses to Oklahoma State, Oklahoma and Iowa State, only one player — Gaylon Nickerson against Oklahoma — scored more than 13 points. Also, only Marcus Zeigler has had more than six assists in the conference games.

In those games, the Cats have been limited to an average of 56.3 points and 10.7 assists. Against non-conference opposition, the Cats have averaged 83.4 points and 19.3 assists.

Defensively, the Cats have allowed 71.9 points a game in non-conference action but allowed 91.3 in Big Eight play.

Fortunately the next two games have the numbers on the Cats' side. Against UMKC the Cats hold a 5-0 series edge, and against Colorado, their next Big Eight opponent Saturday at Bramlage, K-State owns a 42-3 edge in Manhattan.

But none of that matters to Altman.

"I'm not so sure this is an easy game for us right now," Altman said alluding to UMKC's rugged schedule. "They have size, and they execute very well."

Altman conceded there may be the element of emotion on the side of the unheralded 11-6 Kangaroos, who might be looking to slay a giant. Though losing to Big Eight teams Oklahoma State and Nebraska, the Roos have been in each contest until late, unlike the Cats.

"There's so much attention focused on the conference schedule by us and the media," Altman said. "With that, and the fact that there might be added incentive for a team to get a Big Eight team, this could be a game for us to go out and prove something."

Kangaroo coach Lee Hunt said his team has nothing in particular to prove to anyone.

"We've got a lot of tough teams on our schedule — Baylor, Texas A&M, Oklahoma State, Nebraska — we're not in the mindset that we have to prove something to K-State just because it's K-State."

But Hunt did add the Roos have to prove to themselves that they belong in NCAA Division I. This year is the final year of the school's four-year transition from the NAIA's Division I.

"As an independent, we have to go out in every game and prove we can play on the Division I level," Hunt said. "It doesn't matter who we play. We have to prove that much at least."

The Roos are led by small forward Tony Dumas. Starting in all 17 games, Dumas has averaged 22.6 points a game. Also contributing is 6-10 David Robinson, who like his namesake on the San Antonio Spurs, leads the team in rebounds, wiping the glass 7.1 times a game. He has also blocked 29 shots, only 12 fewer than all the Cats combined.

Most of UMKC's scoring has come from its starters, as indicated by its bench's average of 13.7 points a game.

After UMKC, the Cats will host Colorado this weekend, then play before a national television audience at No. 5 Kansas Monday.

INSIDE STUFF

Holy Cats!

Dana Altman speaks candidly about his team's performance

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

Some say he looks thinner, though he insists he hasn't lost any weight. He sleeps at night, though he admits that it isn't for as long as he might like.

So it goes for Dana Altman. He's the very visible head coach at a University with a storied tradition of winning men's basketball teams.

And he's a coach struggling to find anything that will keep this team — now 9-6 overall and 0-3 in the Big Eight — from plummeting to depths rarely seen in these parts.

"In my 12 years of coaching, I've always had clubs that were right there (either winning consistently or on the verge)," Altman said in comparing his coaching past — in which a winning percentage of over .700 had been compiled — and his coaching present.

Altman's latest squad, after ripping off a 103-65 win over Texas-San Antonio in its '91-'92 opener, appeared, to the public, to be on the road to being "right there."

But in a 90-78 win over Missouri-Rolla, Altman saw signs — and disturbing ones at that — that this team might be in for some rather tough times.

Those signs, he admitted at his weekly press conference Tuesday at Bramlage Coliseum, may have even been present earlier than that Dec. 2 contest.

"We talked about it a lot in our preseason practices and after the first couple of games: a lack of consistency," he said. "And some of those things we're now trying to overcome."

Many of the team's bad habits, Altman said, are on the defensive end of the floor.

"Our habits defensively are not solid," he said. "Our positioning away from the ball and the way we've been seeing man and ball have not been very good."

Those things are compounded by a larger problem, Altman said. Remove Wylie Howard, John Rettiger and Marcus Zeigler — returnees who are familiar with the defensive system — and the woes are experienced and contributedto by every player on the squad, Altman admitted.

"Right now, we don't have anybody that can cover up a mistake for another player," he said.

But defense is not the only Cat woe, he said.

MIKE VENSO/File

Dana Altman said he hopes key players will learn to play more relaxed and for someone to step up and take the role as leader on the team.

"We need to improve everything about our basketball team," Altman said matter-of-factly.

A pair of additional concerns?

"Not having someone on the court that directly responds to a leadership role (is a problem)," he said.

And the second? It's mental.

"Our team is very conscious (of its problems)," Altman said. "We want to play well, and as a result, are pressing and are very tight."

And Altman admitted, though pointing a finger at no one player, that trying to free up those who might be team leaders is a tough coaching dilemma.

"Getting a player to free up when he knows his play is of importance to the team is tough," Altman said.

But Altman, his assistant coaches and his players have failed to run the white flag up the pole, the second-year coach insists.

"We keep working at it," he said. "You try to get the pieces to fall together as quickly as you can."

With tonight's contest against UMKC, the lone remaining non-conference game on a schedule that has 11 Big Eight tilts still looming, Altman and his club need at least four wins in the 12 games to equal last season's 13-win regular-season total.

That 1990-91 win total was the worst at the school since the 12-16 mark comprised by the 1982-83 team.

With Big Eight losses of 38, 41 and 26 points already in the hopper, and another 41-pointer to non-conference foe Lamar there as well, Altman admits he's been stunned by the developments thus far this season like he's never been in his coaching career.

Indeed, the K-State Sports Information office has taken to publishing a list of blowout losses suffered by Jack Gardner, Tex Winter, Jack Hartman and Lon Kruger in their first two seasons as K-State coaches as a part of its weekly release.

"I'm disappointed, and I know our players have never been through this," he said. "At least last year we were in ballgames."

INTRAMURALS

Basketball season tips off

Martini says over 300 teams will compete for the All-University title this year

BRIAN ANDERSON
Collegian

In 1921, the Kansas State Agricultural College started its first intramural competition when E.A. Knoth introduced basketball.

Any male student enrolled in the college was eligible to compete, except those who participated in varsity sports.

The games were on two courts inside Nichols Gymnasium, now Nichols Hall. According to an intramural history book, basketball was the favorite winter sport. Seventy years later, basketball is still one of the most popular sports in the intramural program.

Steve Martini, associate director of intramurals, said that are 335 teams registered for the season, up from 326 last year.

"We have 24 fraternities' teams, 24 residence halls' teams, 51 co-rec teams, 59 six-foot-and-under squads, 119 men's teams, and 49 women's teams," said Martini.

The teams are divided into leagues in their division. The co-rec teams play four games, while everyone else competes in five games. After six weeks of playing in their leagues, the league winners go against other league champions to determine the division champion.

The division champion advances to the All-University Tournament. In the All-University Tournament, division winners battle for the All-University title. Last year's winner was from the six-foot-and-under division.

The rules for intramural basketball games are the same as the high school rules. Martini said that they use the high school rules since most of the competitors last played organized basketball in high school.

One rule added this year is when a player is fouled on shooting a 3-pointer and makes the shot, the 3-pointer is counted and the player attempts a free throw. If the 3-point shot is missed, the shooter will go to the free throw line and attempt three charities.

To keep track of these rules, there are the 25 student officials for the season, down from the 91 officals from last year. There are three officials for each game.

There are 43 hours of basketball played each week on the indoor courts at the Rec Complex. Games are played from 5 p.m. to 12 a.m. Monday through Thursday; 4 p.m. to 6 p.m. on Friday; and noon to midnight on Sunday. No games are played on Saturday.

Martini noted that the Sigma Chi and the Haymaker 7 are the only known defending division champions playing this season.

BASEBALL ROUNDUP

Tigers, Fielder agree to $4.5 million

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK (AP) — Cecil Fielder agreed to the largest single-season contract in baseball history on Tuesday, while Mark McGwire took a rare paycut for a player in salary arbitration.

Fielder, who had 95 homers and 265 RBIs during the past two seasons, settled with the Detroit Tigers at $4.5 million. He had asked for an arbitration record $5.4 million while Detroit had offered $3.2 million.

According to Fielder, Tigers president Bo Schembechler pushed for a one-year deal in recent days.

"He was very adament about talking to my agents all of a sudden," Fielder said. "He felt that a deal definitely needed to be worked out. He started feeling, I think, a little bit of pressure from the people of Detriot."

The deal, which makes Fielder No. 10 on the salary list by average annual value, tops the previous high for a single-season contract, Nolan Ryan's $4.4 million 1992 salary with the Texas Rangers. Now, Fielder and the Tigers will attempt to negotiate a multiyear contract.

"Bo Schembechler was talking to myself and my agent and that was the main topic, trying to figure out how they were going to be able to work out a long-term contract," Fielder said. "And it's basically, a situation where the Detroit Tigers in the past have never really given out, per se, a lot of money to top players, so, you know — Kirk Gibson, Lance Parrish and Jack Morris — all those people have left."

Fielder, 28, is eligible for free agency after the 1993 season. In 1991, he hit .261 with 44 homers and 133 RBIs.

"We wanted to avoid any further to-do on either side," Tigers general manager Jerry Walker said. "That's the main thing we tried to get done."

Six other players in arbitration agreed to one-year contracts Tuesday, leaving 102 remaining. McGwire saw his salary decrease from $2,875,000 to $2.65 million, halfway between his request for $2.85 million and the Oakland Athletics' offer of $2.45 million.

McGwire hit .201 with 22 homers and 75 RBIs last season. A year ago, the only cut in arbitration was taken by Dodgers infielder Jeff Hamilton.

In other signings, reliever Mike Maddux and San Diego settled at $510,000, a $400,000 raise. Pittsburgh outfielder-first baseman Lloyd McClendon agreed at $465,000, a $190,000 raise.

SPORTS COLUMN

Forget about even trying it, you just cannot avoid sports

KRIS YOUNG

Try to get through a day without sports.

No, I don't mean without playing a sport. That's easy, I do it often.

Even getting through a day without watching a sporting event can be possible, although difficult. You probably couldn't watch any television because even the news spends at least a fourth of their coverage on sports.

And sitcoms like "Cheers" and "Who's the Boss?" center around ex-baseball players who find new occupations after injuries.

But try, if you will, to get through a morning of listening to the radio without hearing a summary of last-night's scores and highlights.

If you somehow sidestepped hearing the sports news, athletes and athletics are still tied up in music. Remember way back when the Chicago Bears made famous the "Superbowl Shuffle?"

In this year's playoffs, there was another combination between a football team and rap music. Maybe you caught a glimpse of M.C. Hammer (now just called "Hammer") on their sideline during their last playoff game against the Redskins. Hammer's newest hit, "2 Legit 2 Quit" became their theme song. Falcon Deion Sanders along with many other athletes are seen in the song's video.

MTV is out if you're looking for a getaway, since videos often give glimpses of athletes. Within the last few years, MTV has sponsored "Rock and Jock," a baseball game between athletes and rock or TV stars.

OK, let's say you turn off your television and radio, you don't exercise and stay away from the rec center and parks. Now you aren't playing, watching or listening to an athletic event.

Go to the movies? Not! Many of the latest releases are sports oriented, if even slightly.

"The Last Boy Scout" centers on an ex-football player who turns detective.

Even in "Father of the Bride", the daughter about to be married and her dad engage in one-on-one basketball.

There's also a long list of sporty movies in the past and sure to be some in the future.

"Major League," "Bull Durham," "Field of Dreams" and "The Natural" all center on a baseball theme.

"Babe," a soon-to-be released flick about Babe Ruth promises a future for athletics in the theater.

So don't go to the movies, go to the mall.

Well, only if you're interested in being bombarded by paraphernalia from every professional and collegiate sports team in the nation. Even department stores carry hats, coats, scarves and jogging suits sporting athletic team logos.

It's evident on campus how many items are marketed. Try going to a class and not seeing NFL, NBA or Major League baseball attire. Seeming to be most popular are the thick coats bearing the White Sox, Chiefs and Raiders' emblems.

Wearing the merchandise, for some, starts soon after birth. There are baseball suits for infants with little caps in nearly every baby department.

Now I didn't start that early. The first professional sports attire I owned belonged in my second-grade wardrobe. It didn't really start out of love for the team, but out of love for aggravating my sister.

My oldest sister, who was in fifth grade at the time, was a die-hard Dallas Cowboys fan. That year, I, along with my two other sisters interested in the same mission I was, decided to each pick a team Dallas played and "root for 'em."

Needless to say, Bridgitte thought we were pretty big brats.

As a gag gift that Christmas, my mom bought us all a football jersey from our chosen team.

My choice for a Dallas rival paid off when the Steelers played the Cowboys in the Super Bowl that year.

The Super Bowl during my second-grade-year was probably the only full game I had sat through until then, while I paraded in my jersey.

Luckily, it had gotten lots of wear in the four weeks since Christmas, because when Dallas was beat, all our jerseys went back in our closets and stayed. Keeping them on hangers was the best way for us to avoid being "wailed-on" by Bridgitte. I think the Super Bowl outcome just topped off her lack of patience for our little scheme.

Word to the wise: Don't let anybody bully you into not wearing your team's clothing, especially now when jerseys can cost up to $70.

So maybe you can see that some of us are influenced pretty early on by athletics, but back to the challenge.

Leave the mall and stay off campus. Go eat out.

Do you remember when Dairy Queen used to have those Major League baseball hats for sundaes? And McDonalds used to handout NFL trading cards with each meal.

You even have to be careful about going to the grocery store where shelves are lined with Michael Jordan on Wheaties boxes.

It'd be a challenge to isolate yourself from the sports world. Indirectly, its everywhere. Actually, I don't think I'd want to, and if the Steelers were in the Super Bowl this year, I'd probably go buy another jersey, and one for Bridgitte too.

Computerized maps to benefit Kansas

Knowledge of soil types vital in land management

BARBARA HILGER
Collegian

A new map being created in Dickens Hall won't help those who are lost, but it will tell them a lot about the ground on which they are standing.

The map is a soil map of Kansas, and the project of computerizing it is a collaborative effort between the agronomy and geography departments.

H.L. Seyler, associate professor of geography, said the soil map will be used to address many problems, such as environmental impact, effective use of resources and management of resources.

Some of the uses for the soil layer information will be in the construction industry for building roads and pipelines, he said.

Seyler, a lead investigators in the project, also said the Department of Health and Environment could use it in terms of management and controlling waste, as well as the county appraiser in valuing land.

This is the first map of its kind in computerized form, Seyler said.

By putting it on computer, it will be much easier to update, and it will be at a fine scale of 1-to-24,000, which is equivalent to 1 inch-to-1/3 mile, he said.

The project involves many stages. First, the soil types are collected by the Soil Conservation Service.

Bruce Hoffman, SCS soil scientist, said aerial photographs, which cover an area of 6 1/2 miles by 8 1/2 miles, are taken then and transferred to topographic quadrangles.

Ann Hinterleitner and Marvin Bush, Geographic Information Systems Initiative lab technicians, said the quads are then scanned onto mylar sheets and converted to a vector file, which shows true lines and points.

Then using computer-aided drafting software, the maps then are edited, and soil labels are added.

The final stage is approval by Hoffman.

"Accuracy is important in all stages," Hinterleitner said.

Helmet law may affect road construction

PAM FRAHM
Collegian

Creating a law requiring the use of motorcycle helmets in Kansas could not only save lives. It could save $1.5 million.

According to the Kansas Department of Transportation, if Kansas has not implemented a law requiring universal helmet use by October 1993, 1.5 percent, or $1.5 million of the highway money the state will receive in 1995 will be shifted to highway safety education programs, rather than highway construction.

In 1996 and 1997, the percent will double, and $3 million of highway funding will be shifted to safety education.

The requirement stems from a transportation bill passed by Congress in 1991, which finances roads, bridges and mass transit.

The bill included a mandate requiring Kansas and 25 other states to implement laws requiring motorcycle riders of all ages to wear helmets.

All motorcycle riders under the age of 18 are already required to wear helmets in Kansas.

GM, Ford, Chrysler report worst losses ever

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DETROIT — The nation's Big Three automakers will report an estimated $6.8 billion in 1991 losses, by far the biggest blotch of red ink ever seen by the American auto industry, analysts say.

Auto industry analysts contacted during the last week by the Associated Press also said there is little chance any of the Big Three will make money until after June.

Earnings statements from General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler Corp. are due in early to mid-February and will reflect the darkest financial days since 1980, when the Big Three lost $4.5 billion.

Through the first nine months of 1991, the Big Three lost $4.9 billion. GM lost $2.2 billion, Ford $1.8 billion and Chrysler $892 million.

The analysts' assessments were based on forecasts that the entire economy will begin a slow, gradual improvement in the middle of this year. They were made before President Bush's State of the Union message Tuesday night.

"If our economic forecast is right, everybody (among the Big Three) should be modestly in the black for the full year, starting in the second half," analyst Joseph Phillippi, of Shearson Lehman Brothers in New York, said about the 1992 outlook.

The analysts forecast GM would report a $3.8-billion loss for 1991, Ford would lose $2.2 billion and Chrysler would go $840.4 million in the hole.

Those numbers compared with 1990 profits of $102 million for GM, $860 million for Ford and $68 million for Chrysler.

Bush said.

The historic House chamber was standing-room-only, packed with lawmakers and members of the Bush Cabinet.

In an unusual opening, Bush began with a joke about the high expectations for his speech: "I wanted to be sure it would be a big hit — but I couldn't convince Barbara to deliver it for me."

Recalling the allied victory over Iraq in the Persian Gulf War, Bush told Congress "we must stand together" to solve the problems at home.

"We can bring the same courage and sense of common purpose to the economy that we brought to Desert Storm," Bush said. "And we can defeat hard times together."

But on a political note, Bush challenged Congress to approve his proposals by March 20 or face a fight from the White House. "From the day after that, if it must be: The battle is joined," the president said. "And you know, when principle is at stake, I relish a good fair fight."

The notable elements of Bush's proposal include changes in the income tax and other incentives intended to stimulate the economy.

Income-tax withholding tables will be adjusted at once by the Internal Revenue Service to give many Americans more take-home pay.

Even though that would reduce the size of next year's refunds, Bush said the move would put $25 billion into the economy in the next six months. Increases in take-home pay would average from about $175 for single individuals to more than $600 for two-income families, the administration claimed.

The personal exemption for dependent children, now $2,300 per child, would be raised by $500 per child to $2,800. However, the increase would not take effect until Oct. 1.

First-time homebuyers would receive a tax credit of up to $5,000 for homes bought this year, with half of the credit applying to 1992 taxes and the other half to 1993 taxes.

Up to $10,000 could be withdrawn from Individual Retirement Accounts without penalty for first-time home purchases.

All families could deduct the interest they pay on student loans.

The capital gains tax, the tax on profits from the sale of stock, real estate and other assets, would be cut from its current top rate of 28 percent to a maximum rate of 15.4 percent for assets held at least three years.

Businesses could take an extra 15-percent depreciation allowance to encourage them to invest in more equipment and machinery.

Tax credits and vouchers to help low and middle-income families buy health insurance, up to a maximum of $3,750 per family. Bush is expected to more fully spell out his health insurance program next month.

All domestic programs excluding benefits programs like Social Security would be frozen at current year levels.

Bush struck a no-nonsense appearance for his speech — an address that campaign advisers said was crucial for his re-election.

Bush wore a stern look, pursed his lips and pointed his finger to make a point. His speech was interrupted 76 times by applause and eight standing ovations.

When Democrats finally joined GOP applause after Bush called for a $4.4-billion extension of unemployment benefits, the president scolded, "Well, at last."

Bush stressed the urgency of moving quickly.

"The people cannot wait. They need help now. ... We are going to lift this nation out of hard times inch by inch and day by day, and those who would stop us had best step aside. Because I look at hard times and I make this vow: This will not stand."

Cautioning against expectations for a quick fix, Bush said, "None of this will happen with a snap of the fingers — but it will happen."

Announcing changes in America's military structure, Bush said he will shut down the production line for the B-2 bomber after 20 planes are built, cancel the small ICBM program, halt production of new warheads for sea-based ballistic missiles and stop new production of the MX missile.

In addition, he announced a freeze on purchases of advanced cruise missiles.

"These are actions we are taking on our own — because they are the right thing to do," the president said.

A White House statement released with Bush's speech said the United States will halt production of W-88 warheads for Trident missiles.

Bush's proposal for deeper cuts in nuclear arms would, for the first time, simultaneously shrink all three legs of the nation's "triad" of strategic nuclear weapons: air-launched missiles and ballistic missiles on submarines and in underground silos.

It would be the first time the United States has cut sea-based strategic nuclear arms.

By asking Yeltsin to agree to eliminate all land-based ballistic missiles with multiple warheads, Bush took aim at the most potent part of Yeltsin's arsenal: 154 SS-18 silo-based missiles and 92 SS-24 mobile missiles in Russia, Kazakhstan and Ukraine.

Congressional Democrats are sure to press for further reductions but Bush said he would fight them.

Bush proposes tax cuts, domestic spending freeze for budget

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — President Bush announced a plan to fatten worker paychecks by cuts in tax withholding Tuesday night as he sketched details of a $1.5 trillion budget.

He offered no quick middle class tax cut, but proposed help for those struggling to buy health insurance and new homes.

In a State of the Union Address that dwelt largely on remedies for the recession, Bush also said he would ask Congress to freeze domestic spending at this year's level. He urged lawmakers to eliminate 246 federal programs he described as wasteful, and said the non-defense federal workforce would not be allowed to grow.

The formal unveiling of the president's fiscal 1993 spending plan was set for Wednesday. The new fiscal year begins on Oct. 1.

The outline Bush presented in his nationally televised address provoked the beginning of an election-year tax battle with the Democratic majorities of Congress.

Many Democrats favor a tax cut for the middle class to be financed by higher taxes on the wealthy. They also oppose Bush's renewed call for a cut in the capital gains tax, the levy paid on investment profits.

And no sooner had Bush finished speaking that House Speaker Thomas Foley, D-Wash., said his party would reject "the kind of capital gains tax cut that will lead largely to accelerated profit-taking, not accelerated investment."

Bush bid the lawmakers to pass an economic package of short-term measures by March 20, including a cut in the capital gains tax rate paid on profits on property sales, the tax breaks for first-time homebuyers and tax cuts for the real estate industry and for business investments.

"From the day after that, if it must be, the battle is joined," he warned.

Bush said he would propose a temporary, $5,000 tax credit for first-time home buyers, and permit those purchasing residences to use up to $10,000 from an Individual Retirement Account without penalty.

And he said he would provide tax credits of up to $3,750 for low-income families to help them pay for health insurance.

But after months of statements by top administration officials that they were seriously considering a broad-based middle-class tax cut to help spark an end to the recession, Bush included no such proposal in his package of short-term relief measures.

Instead, Bush proposed a widely expected $500 increase in the personal income-tax exemption for children but asked that it not take effect until Oct. 1 — well after many economists say the economy should be on the upswing.

Current tax law provides for a $2,300 exemption per person.

The White House said Bush's plan to cut tax withholding — which does not require approval by Congress — would pump $25 billion into paychecks this year that wage-earners otherwise would not get until 1993, for an average of $300 per family.

The change was described as permanent, and officials said more than 85 percent of taxpayers who currently receive refunds at year's end would continue to do so.

Much of what Bush proposed had been reported previously. But some surprises emerged, in addition to the changes in tax withholding.

SCHOLARSHIPS

K-State candidates advance to Truman finals

KEITH LEFF
Collegian

The four K-State nominees for the Truman Scholarship competition have all advanced to the final interview.

"We are the top public university in the country to produce Truman scholars," Cheryl May, director of news services, said.

She said K-State also competes with private schools for the scholarship.

The four nominees are Jackie McClaskey, Dorothy Birdwell, Scott Truhlar and Laura Vetter.

McClaskey, senior in agricultural economics and student body president, has been active on the Student Senate executive committee and is the president of Blue Key National Honor Society.

"I'm very excited. I didn't expect to get this far," McClaskey said.

She said she is also excited because all four of K-State nominees advanced to the final interview.

McClaskey said she is preparing for the interview by educating herself about the topics to be discussed. She said she is going to focus on the effects that agriculture has had on the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade negotiations.

McClaskey also said she plans to discuss higher education and funding for higher education.

Birdwell, senior in elementary education, is a member of Pinnacle Honor Society for non-traditional students. She received the Samuel S. Gross Scholarship through the KSU Foundation and a member of the Education Council.

Birdwell said each step of the application process is very rewarding.

"The competition is very tough by the time you get to the finals. I've learned more from the process than I have in some classes," she said.

Laura Vetter, junior in philosophy, anthropology and pre-law, has been involved in various honors programs and is a Diversity Awareness Campaign Committee member.

"I would like to get a master's in anthropology and go on to law school," Vetter said.

Truhlar, junior in pre-med, pre-law and physical science, has been involved with Mortar Board Senior Honorary and is finance chairman for Senate.

Wells

"The Army has three priorities in the next decade: Reshape the Army, train the remaining forces to keep ready at all times, and restore and maintain the environment at all installations," said Col. David Runnells, garrison commander.

This commitment to the environment means fixing the contaminations at Fort Riley and identifying others, Runnells said.

The Funston Landfill, northwest of the main post, was in operation from 1955 to 1981 and was the post's primary landfill during that time. It closed in 1981 because it had reached capacity.

Chemicals that contained high levels of contaminants were later detected in the monitoring wells during routine sampling.

"Solvents in cleaning equipment and engine parts were added to the work oil that was disposed of at the landfill," Janet Wade, Installation Restoration Program manager, said.

"Tri-chloroethene and dichloroethene were found, as well as vinyl chloride, which can be a degradation of other solvents as well as being a solvent itself.

"The monitoring wells that were inserted in 1984 were installed with PVC pipe with glued joints. The vinyl chloride could be a component of the glues," she said. "New monitoring wells will be installed next month, and we'll abandon the others to determine whether vinyl chloride is a factor."

Wade said other chemicals such as barium, mercury from broken instruments and residual materials from spent ammo, like lead and other metals, were found.

The pesticide storage and mixing facility, east of the main post, was also found to have contaminants in the soil and sediment in the drainage ways, due to spills and runoff from the equipment washing area behind the building.

Fort Riley also has outlined a plan in which it will identify all the contaminated areas, make a preliminary assessment and investigation of the former Fort Riley dry-cleaning facility, and establish a groundwater maintenance system for the Custer Hill Landfill.

With this plan, Fort Riley will be able to determine the nature and extent of the contamination, and identify the source and pathways of contamination, said Maj. Bill McCormick of Fort Riley Public Relations.

"We believe the restoration process at Fort Riley is a community effort. It is a required community project," he said. "We feel strongly that it must be an open and public process."

"We used to dump oil all over the lands, and we didn't know that was bad. We used to throw trash in the rivers and didn't know that was bad.

"The way we lived in the past, we can't live in the future. We have to recycle. We have to find more economical ways to recycle, and we can't continue to throw stuff in a hole. Now that we know, we're going to fix it," Runnells said.

Cheat

gets to us. It's settled between the instructor and student."

According to the University's Academic Dishonesty Policy, the penalties for cheating are determined by the professor and range from receiving an F on the test or paper in question to failing the course all together.

The professor also has the option of filing a memo in the provost's office. A second offense reported to the provost's office results in automatic suspension or dismissal from the University.

Since the presence solid evidence is usually based on the opinion of the professor, there are time-consuming steps a student may take if innocent.

The student and professor will first approach the department head.

If nothing is resolved, they go to the dean. If the issue remains unsolved, the student may take his complaint to the head of the Undergraduate Grievance Committee.

The student must then petition for a hearing where both the student and professor present evidence. The committee's decision is usually final, although Dollar said a few cases have actually gone to civil court.

Many students confront the temptation to cheat and must decide whether the risk is worth the grade. Those who cheat have their own justifications.

Why does Megan cheat?

"Better grades," she said. "You do what you have to do to get a better grade.

"Cheating doesn't bother me. Who cares, really? Everybody does it. I've never been accused, never been caught. I guess I'm just an ace, that's all," she said.

Not all students agree with Megan.

Mike Clausner, sophomore in architectural engineering, said he learned in elementary school that it doesn't pay to cheat. He said he often changed his answer to match someone else's, only to discover his original was correct.

"If you cheat, you're depriving yourself of an education," Clausner said. "I'm here to learn. If I'm going to pass, I'll do it on my own."

K-STATE 2001

Land Grant

fines the need, and we define the program," McQueen said. "Then we see how funds match the needs before adding a project to the capital budget."

Of the projects on the drawing board, McQueen said he foresees the reconstruction of Farrell Library in about the year 2000 and the opening of the Marianna Kistler Beach Art Museum as among the strongest factors in drawing students.

He said the library addition will give a strong boost to K-State research capabilities, and the art museum may add a more cultural dimension to K-State's public image.

"Because of the land-grant mission, we need to be well versed in educational background," McQueen said.

McQueen said the condition of an aging K-State infrastructure concerns, and maintenance projects may be among future investments.

"The newest boiler on campus is older than its expected life, and we may need to expand transformer capacity," McQueen said.

"I can see a definite need for such projects as Durland Phase III, but if you can't get a boiler to fire, the other isn't going to matter."

An important part of the overall capital planning process is to maintain flexibility, Cool said. The work on Throckmorton will finalize a project that has been in the works for 20 years.

Limited financial resources make it difficult to see immediate results when planning projects, McQueen said.

An addition to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and possible additions to the Chemistry/Biochemistry Building and Durland Hall contribute to an already extensive list of campus needs.

"We have enough on our priority list that we probably won't get them all done in the next 10 years," Cool said.

Campus

going to be extensive. All of campus will be networked, and technological services like computer rooms will assume an important role.

As for the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, the money will be raised by floating short-term bonds, Rawson said.

He also said he doesn't foresee any possibility of bonds for financing the art museum, the $25 million for the Throckmorton expansion or the $30 million for Farrell Library. These funds will come from private, student and federal grants.

Chuck Werring, director of housing and dining services, said the existing residence halls will adequately serve the predicted student population. They may be altered somewhat to cater to the needs of the expected growth in non-traditional, graduate and minorities, he said.

"There are a lot of pies in the sky. But what can be grabbed is another matter," Werring said.

Having won the grand prize for the National Association of University and College Food Services for the best food service in the nation in 1991 is not going to make the dining services complacent, Werring said.

As the student demographic trends change, he said, the focus of the dining service is going to be receptive to these changes.

For example, instead of the traditional 20-meal plan, they are considering 15- and nine-meal plans and a separate oriental-food line, Werring said.

Charles Beckom, K-State police chief, said the campus is going to reflect the nation in terms of the policing policy.

The police will be more aware of victims' rights, assistance, counseling, cultural differences and diversities, he said.

Beckom said he expects to increase training from 40 hours to 80 hours per year to aid officers in managing the growing amount of information they must process to operate efficiently.

In an age characterized by rapidly changing technological times, Beckom said, it may be highly difficult to predict the type of equipment that may be needed in 2001.

He said he expects an increase of eight to 10 cameras in the parking lots.

The campus police will also switch to computers to write reports and analyze data. Beckom said identi-kits will be used to identify criminals and help with computerized fingerprint analysis.

Beckom said he doesn't believe the increase in buildings will make the campus any less safe. He said he expects a need for 30 to 33 officers, as compared to 21 now, which would mean the students will probably have to pay more in order to meet the financial needs.

Debra McClain Williams, Classified Senate president, said she doesn't foresee an increase in the number of classified employees. There are about 2,100 now.

Business

The class taught Glen Hoover, owner of Hoover Jewelers in Clay Center, the process involved in starting a business.

After serving 22 years in the Army, Hoover said, he wanted to know what it would take to run a business, and the business development center provided the information he needed to get where he is today.

"For a jewelry store to be making it in a farming community, we must be doing something right," Hoover said.

For more information or to register call the business development center at 532-5529.

THE PHANTOM TOLLBOOTH
Butch Patrick, voices of Mel Blanc, Hans Conreid
MGM/UA; Directed by David Monahan, Chuck Jones, Abe Levitow
Color; Rated G; 90 minutes; 1970

Butch Patrick stars as a bored youngster who thinks most things are a waste of time, until he drives through a turnpike tollbooth in a toy car. Adapted from the Norman Juster children's book, this wonderful live-action/animated musical film features the vocal talents of Warner Brothers cartoon great Mel Blanc, and the cartoon magic of some of the world's finest animators.

Stephan indicted on perjury charges

Attorney General, Robert Storey accused of lying during depositions

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Kansas Attorney General Bob Stephan was indicted by a federal grand jury Wednesday on two counts of perjury in a breach of contract case involving a former clerk in his office.

In a brief statement released in Topeka, Stephan said he was innocent and referred all questions to his attorney.

Stephan was not in the Kansas City, Kan., courtroom as a federal grand jury filed in to charge him with two counts of perjury and one count of conspiracy to commit perjury.

Robert Storey, a former Topeka state legislator, was also indicted on one count of perjury and one count of conspiracy to commit perjury.

U.S. District Judge G. Thomas Van Bebber did not set bond, accepting a recommendation from prosecutors that Stephan's promise to appear was sufficient.

Stephan and Storey are charged with conspiring to lie while under oath during depositions in 1986 and 1987 and in court testimony in 1988.

Terms of a settlement in a sexual harassment case with Marcia Tomson Stingley were supposed to be confidential, but they were revealed at a Stephan news conference in 1985 when Stephan was struggling to organize a campaign for governor, which he later abandoned.

Stephan, 59, is charged with falsely testifying he did not know the settlement agreement required him to keep the details confidential nor that one of the terms included the payment of $24,000 to Stingley.

The perjury count against Storey, 57, accuses him of lying under oath in federal court Nov. 4, 1988. The charge accuses him of falsely testifying he was not aware of a confidentiality clause in the settlement agreement between Stephan and Stingley.

After the news conference in 1985, Stingley filed a $5.2-million suit against Stephan, who first won election as attorney general in 1978 and has been in the office nearly three times as long as anyone before him.

Bob Stephan, Attorney General

Stephan, a former Sedgwick County District Court judge, would not be automatically excluded from the office of attorney general if he is convicted of the felony charge, but he could face proceedings that would strip him of his law license and make him ineligible for the office.

Stingley, a former clerk in Stephan's office, filed a sexual harassment lawsuit against Stephan in December 1982 after she was fired. She alleged Stephan made suggestive advances on numerous occasions.

The lawsuit was settled out of court in March 1985, but terms of the settlement were not made public by agreement of both parties.

In October 1985, the settlement was disclosed at a news conference Stephan and Storey, a political supporter and former state senator from Topeka, spoke at.

At the time, Stephan was considering seeking the Republican nomination for governor in 1986 and the secret settlement was hurting his ability to organize a campaign.

The settlement called for Stephan to pay Stingley $24,000, help her sell her Topeka home and give her a recommendation for getting a job in California.

WHERE WE WILL LIVE

STEPHANIE FUQUA
Collegian

Funding college education will be top priority

The year 2001 won't bring hoverboards or "Mr. Fusion" to Manhattan, but progress will come in various ways.

And the growth of Riley County will without doubt affect K-State students.

One of the more beneficial improvements will be the expansion of the Manhattan Municipal Airport.

Mary Catherine Tennant, airport manager, said she hopes construction on a new terminal and a parking lot southwest of the current terminal will begin in spring 1993.

The current terminal was built in 1958, and Tennant said the new terminal will be a needed improvement.

"It will have two floors, and the first floor will have a waiting area, car rental, baggage and check-in. The second floor will be for administration and meeting rooms," Tennant said.

A new tower will be added to the top of the terminal.

Along with the new terminal comes the addition of another commuter service, which will enable K-State students to take flights to major metropolitan airports.

"We'll probably have another commuter service to Denver," Tennant said. "Currently, we have seven flights to Kansas City a day.

"The demand for commuter service will increase slightly with a second carrier, and we'll probably go up to the 40,000 enplanements range."

The improved airport will service an enlarged Manhattan and Riley County population.

The Manhattan Comprehensive Land Use Plan predicts that the population of Manhattan and Riley County will increase 19.5 percent within the next decade.

The plan includes an anticipation that the current population of Manhattan (37,712) will increase to 47,000, and that Riley County should reach a population of 75,000 in the next 20 years.

This population expansion should mean increased road improvements, residential expansions and new opportunities for K-State and its students.

Funding college education will be top priority

The most important issue for K-State students a decade from now will be how to fund their college careers.

Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, said if history can predict the future, tuition in the year 2001 will be 80-100 percent higher than it is now.

"How do you continue basic funding of higher education with continually shrinking federal resources? In the last five years, programs the state relied on for federal funding are now funded only by the state," Krause said.

"How do you maintain the University in the face of dwindling resources?"

Enrollment will remain stable, with a period of some decline, Krause said.

However, Krause said there probably will be an increase in the mid-1990s when there is an upsurge of high-school graduates,

FEDERAL BUDGET

K-State faces budget squeeze

Bush's proposals could eliminate agriculture programs

STAFF AND WIRE REPORTS

From farmers to university officials, many Kansans could feel a budget squeeze from proposals unveiled Wednesday by President Bush to streamline federal spending.

However, K-State officials said they were not particularly concerned that Congress would accept Bush's recommendation to cut funding for the Throckmorton Plant Science Center or other agricultural grants.

Bush's proposed 1993 budget called for cutting or eliminating more than 300 programs, including ones sending money to Kansas.

For example, Bush objected to Congress earmarking money this year for water projects, agricultural research grants and construction of buildings at universities nationwide, including Throckmorton Hall at K-State.

The Bush administration's budget documents said the federal research and building grants should have been awarded competitively, rather than decided by lawmakers.

Bush said his 1993 budget asked for no money to continue financing dozens of projects earmarked by Congress in the current fiscal year. Among them were the following:

— Throckmorton Plant Science Center at K-State. Congress provided $1.57 million in the current 1992 budget year to continue work on the building.

A spokesman for Rep. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., said an additional $4 million is needed to finish financing the federal government's one-half share of the $27-million project.

— Alfalfa research grant at K-State. Congress provided $125,000 in the current budget year.

— Canola research grant at K-State. Congress provided $100,000 in the current budget year.

— Great Plains Agriculture Policy Research Center. Congress provided $100,000 in the current budget year to allow K-State and Oklahoma State University to develop a program for analyzing the effects of farm policies.

— International meat and livestock program at K-State. Congress provided $94,000 this year.

— Wheat Genetics Resource Center at K-State. Congress provided $159,000 this year.

— Ethanol study by K-State and Pittsburg State University. Congress

Six months ago, the Soviet Union suddenly experienced a rapid change in politics and country unity.

With the division of the Soviet Union into the Commonwealth of Independent States and four other independent countries, Denis Sokolov and Alexander Pervov read news articles, listened to radio and watched television to keep in touch with their homeland.

"Probably not much has changed since we left," said Sokolov, foreign exchange student in engineering. "But that's my opinion."

Pervov, foreign exchange student in electrical and computer engineering, said he was anxious about what was going on at home.

Sokolov said a communist Mikhail Gorbachev was in power to bring democracy slowly into the country.

Three forces involved during this critical time were the army, democrats and communists. Gorbachev, when elected, was the mediator between the democrats and the communists, Sokolov said.

With the democrats becoming more powerful, because of past free elections, they were forcing Gorbachev to make changes faster.

Meanwhile, the communists organized a coup to oust Gorbachev. After the coup failed, Gorbachev resigned because the democrats did not need him either, Sokolov said.

One of the causes that brought the army into the coup was a change in structure by removing them from Eastern European countries. While stationed, they were preserving the socialist structure in Eastern Europe.

Sokolov said some lower-level officers did not execute the orders of the coup leaders and instead defended Russian Parliament, which was defending democracy.

"It was stupid to plan one year and make so many mistakes," Pervov said.

Sokolov said he believes the situation at present will not work unless they develop a constitution.

"They agree on some important things, but too many questions are being asked," Sokolov said.

For example, Sokolov said the republics all agree on nuclear weapons, but if they decided to be involved in a war, all must push the button at the same time.

Other concerns are the Black Sea Fleet, a Soviet military base in the Black Sea. At present, Russian President Boris Yeltsin has possession, but the Ukraine probably would like possession also, he said.

Sokolov said he does not see Yeltsin giving it up too quickly.

Economic reform and a currency system is also questioned between countries.

Pervov and Sokolov said letters from family and phone calls keep them in touch with current events.

Pervov said he called home once a month during first semester, but that ended when five minutes cost $2.

Pervov and Sokolov said calling home can be difficult. The international operator will often get a busy signal when trying to connect with Russia, they said.

Bar managers, citizens prepare protests for suggested ordinance

ANDY WOODWARD
Collegian

The future of late-night outdoor music in Aggieville rests in the hands of the students who go to the bars, the people who own the bars and the citizens who say they can not sleep living near the bars.

The different factions in the debate over late-night outdoor music in Aggieville are preparing their methods of protest for the next reading of the noise ordinance by the Manhattan City Commission.

One part of the suggested ordinance would prohibit music from playing in outdoor beer gardens.

"Why are they doing this?" said Becca Johnson, junior in apparel and textile marketing. "Last Chance is the best when it's warm outside and the music is on. I don't like this rule. People know this is a college town. Why live close to Aggieville?"

Some bar owners also said their rights are being encroached upon.

"I've only been here one year. Slowly, one at a time, they pass one thing here and one thing there. They're trying to shut the bars down," said Kevin Henao, manager of the Spot Tavern. "Even though we would like to play outdoor music, we can't dwell on it. You can't spend all your time whining about what isn't working; you need to concentrate on making the patrons happy."

Henao said the proposed ordinance will pass, but encourages those who feel dissatisfaction to go and voice their opinions at the next city commission meeting at City Hall, Feb. 4.

"Go down there. Know what you want. Sit down and take it, or stand up and say what you think," he said.

Some others said they feel the case against City Hall is a hopeless one.

"I'm afraid the city council would not have a whole lot of reasons for listening to students," said Craig Raborn, senior in geology.

"The city council is well aware students don't listen to politics much. If 2,000 students who voted went in and said 'This is how it should be done,' then the city council would indeed listen.

"A number of people who pushed for this in the first place lived here for 20 years and are bothered by the music. If the city council wants to do a good job, which is representing the people who elected them, they must do what the voting residents say," Raborn said.

One bar which would be affected by the proposed ordinance is Kite's Bar & Grill. A.J. Ahlsted, one of the bar's owners, said he is less worried about the noise provisions in the ordinance than he is about the zoning provisions regarding outdoor drinking's future in general.

"I'm pretty concerned. My attorney is looking into the zoning problem. That would be a problem," he said. "The noise ordinance — it's pretty bogus. You don't try and fight something like that. My attorney is deeply involved."

One proposed zoning plank of the ordinance would be for all exits of the bars to be manned at all times, preventing customers from leaving with beer. Another idea is for all beer gardens to be accessible only through the main building.

Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon would be heavily affected by the noise ordinance, said manager Rusty Wilson.

He said he will try to drum up as much resistance to the ordinance as he can.

"I think we are going to take some kind of action — let the city council know the students are the backbone of this town," he said. "Aggieville is a major calling card for K-State. We can't ignore that."

Wilson also said he feels many proponents of the ordinance really do not realize where the noise originates.

"The noise is coming from everywhere. The cars, the yelling, the people in Hardee's parking lot. The noise is coming at 1 and 1:30 in the morning when most places are closing," he said. "I'd like for them (city council) to come down at midnight and see what's going on. We'd like to work with this — get some signatures. I'm discussing this with a lot of different organizations on campus."

Raborn said he thinks a petition would have little effect.

"A petition like that wouldn't carry any weight. The council would know many of the signatures were non-voters," he said. "While it's true most students live here nine to 12 months of the year, most students don't perceive Manhattan as their residence."

The majority of the Federal Emergency Management Agency funds given to Riley County for 1992 was allocated to the American Red Cross.

About $31,000 in allocations were announced last week to fund local agencies fighting hunger and poverty in Manhattan.

A total of seven agencies submitted proposals to be viewed by the FEMA board and out of those, only one did not receive funds. FEMA funds are controlled by the federal government to provide food and shelter for the needy.

The American Red Cross received $19,000; the Ogden Friendship House, $2,309; the Flinthills Breadbasket, $2,000; St. George Methodist Church, $900; Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc., $5,220; and the Crisis Center, $1,500.

The FEMA board, consisting of representatives mandated by the government, concentrated on the issue of hunger with the goal of meeting emergency food needs in the community.

"The money available was allocated according to the needs of the community and the 300-percent increase for food needs at the local church pantries," said David Wright, interim director of the United Way and chairman of the FEMA board.

Wright said in 1991, over $35,000 of church funds were spent on emergency food needs in the community.

Wright said the board looked at each proposal and each group that applied, as well as the current food distribution system. Protein items such as meat, cheese, eggs and milk were the items the board found most needed.

The American Red Cross received the greatest allocation of $19,000 for Students petition ban on music in Aggieville

Students are taking actions to prevent a ban on loud outdoor music in Aggieville.

"We're going to present a petition to oppose this and make the students' presence known at the City Commission's meeting," said Robert Rawlings, junior in economics and Political Reactions to Issues of the Modern Order president.

PRIMO is a campus organization that works to bring political and social issues to campus.

The Manhattan City Commission will meet at 7 p.m. Tuesday in City Hall, 1101 Poyntz Ave., and the noise ordinance will be formally discussed.

"All we can do is a concerted effort. Unless students try to stop it, the ban will probably pass," Paul Donovan, junior in physics and modern languages, said.

Rawlings said one problem that has come up in the past is students need to be registered to vote in Manhattan to have an effect on the commission's decisions.

"They need to change their voter registration, and they lack the information about how to do it," he said.

PRIMO will have an information table set up from 10 a.m. to 3:30 p.m. Jan. 30 and Feb. 3 outside the K-State Union Stateroom. They will provide a petition opposing the ban and information about how to change voting registration forms.

Stephan should resign — ASAP

Kansas Attorney General Bob Stephan has always been quick to ensure local officials are above reproach.

Numerous sheriffs and other local officers have found — a day or two after questions were raised in the media or in court about their conduct — an assistant attorney general has filed a petition in district court that calls for their removal from office.

Stephan, however, has taken a different view about his own problems stemming from a sexual harassment lawsuit filed by a former clerk in his office.

The attorney general has proclaimed his own innocence and continued in office, even though public confidence in him has declined.

A federal grand jury on Wednesday indicted Stephan on two counts of perjury and one count of conspiracy to commit perjury.

The jury said Stephan lied under oath in depositions, and in one instance in court about the settlement of a sexual harassment suit.

Because of the indictment, it is time for Stephan to take decisive action to restore confidence in state government.

He should resign.

Today.

And if he will not recognize this is the only service remaining for him to render to the people of Kansas, impeachment proceedings should begin against Stephan.

Today.

Americans' rights recede with dial-a-porn decision

At first glance, it appears the Supreme Court made a wise decision.

Without hearing arguments, they let stand a federal law designed to shield children from dial-a-porn telephone services.

Now, telephone companies will be required to block access to sexually explicit phone lines, unless customers ask in advance and in writing to receive them. The hope is that children will be prevented from dialing dial-a-porn services.

The law will probably work. But the cost outweighs the benefits — by far.

America has always been a take-care-of-yourself kind of country.

From the earliest days of Daniel Boone killing bears in the wilderness, the American people have taken responsibility for themselves and their children. There was a kind of pride in watching other people get drunk in a saloon while you and your family walked by cold sober.

Now, that way of thinking has disappeared.

We scream at the government to take care of us in every aspect of our lives. And in that funny, government way, it never stops once it starts. Slowly, but surely, our individual rights get stripped away because somebody can't take care of themselves or their family.

This won't be the end, either. Parents who are not capable of keeping their 5-year-old son or daughter from dialing a dial-a-porn number by themselves are going to have a lot more problems in the future.

And through laws like this, they've already admitted they can't solve them themselves.

Dear Mr. President ...

Dear Mr. President,

I hope you are feeling better after that tough bout with the flu a couple weeks ago. At least once a year, I suffer a similar attack.

Fortunately, video coverage of me "ralphing" on all my friends and neighbors is not beamed by satellite around the world, as did occur with your unfortunate episode.

Very embarrassing.

At least you had sense enough to slide under the table before losing your lunch. Or was that the hand of divine providence you so frequently invoke when you have to make the big decisions? I suppose in situations like that, some sort of religious belief does have its advantages.

By the way, that was a nice touch — dousing the Japanese prime minister's pant leg on the way down, I mean. I wish you could have seen the look on his face. It surprised the heck out of him. Kind of repays them for that sneak attack on Pearl Harbor, you might say.

If you don't mind my asking, who cleans up after something like that at those fancy, black-tie dinners? And was any of my tax money used to pay the carpet and dry-cleaning bill?

Just something I'd like to be able to tell the grandkids. You know how it is.

Pardon me for lingering on this subject, but those Japanese must really be tough cookies. In this country, about the quickest way to clear a room is to upchuck in mixed company, and, yet, those Japanese guys (all except the prime minister) didn't even blink.

Uncaring and ruthless is all I can say.

That explains how Japanese car salesmen can take our cheap American dollars for those high-quality

BRAD SEABOURN

Japanese cars and televisions and stereos and video recorders and cameras and ... well, you know all the things they make ... and still be able to go to sleep at night. Ruthless.

And uncaring.

You would think they might feel just a little gratitude for our having leveled two entire cities for them during the Big War, which gave us the opportunity to rebuild everything for them from scratch.

Brand new houses.

Brand new factories.

If only we could be so lucky.

Again, Mr. President, I am sorry for dwelling on such a sensitive issue, but this is something that is important to your average tax-paying American.

Speaking of tax-paying, the way you got out of paying more than $25,000 in state taxes last year is just about the neatest trick I have seen. Why, you ended up paying only $3,596 in state taxes, simply because Texas has neither a personal income tax nor a capital gains tax. And all because you claim a hotel room in Houston as your residence.

Slick. Very slick.

I can see why you didn't want to pay state taxes, based upon the location of your current domicile. In the District of Columbia, at the top rate of 9.5 percent, a man with your income — which, by the way, was $200,000 in salary and $235,732 in investment income last year — would have paid about $30,000 in state taxes.

Of course, by law, all you big guns in Washington don't have to pay state taxes if you maintain a permanent residence outside of Washington. In your case, that would be your family estate in Kennebunkport, Maine, right?

Yet, I can also see why you wouldn't want to pay taxes in Maine either. At a top rate of 8.5 percent, a taxpayer with your income would have had to pay about $25,000 in taxes. That leaves Texas as the only logical choice.

You did the right thing, Mr. President.

What really amazes me, though, is when you add your federal income, Social Security and local property taxes for last year, they amount to just 29.5 percent of your adjusted gross income.

Did you know the average American pays 37.7 percent? Wow, you are really below average, Mr. President!

Sir, you must have one heck of an itemized deduction sheet — not to mention a very good tax preparer.

It's obvious now that when you said in your presidential campaign "no taxes," you meant it.

Keep up the good work, Mr. President. America loves you. The Japanese love you. Texas loves you.

Well, sir, I guess that is about all I have to say.

Oops! I almost forgot one last thing.

Should you decide to write back, don't pay any attention to the Manhattan, Kan., address on the outside of this envelope. Just send your correspondence to P.O. Box 666, South Padre Island, Texas.

I'll be there sometime before April 15 to pick up the mail ... and send in my tax return.

Your pal,

Brad Seabourn

▶COLUMNIST SHOULD ACCEPT DECISION

Editor,

This is in response to the "Go Ahead, Surprise Us" column written by Eve Wilson.

Why is it when someone makes a decision regarding a certain race, it is always put down in some way, whether it is bad or good?

The person that made the decision to put all black greek clubs together in the yearbook did not do it to hurt anyone or put down the black greeks. I am sure they made that decision because they probably wanted the black greeks to stand out and be noticed by everyone at the University, not just fit in with all the other greek clubs.

Eve, next time you have a problem about the way things are done, you should consider speaking to the person who made the decision, and try to understand their reasoning. I think you might be surprised yourself.

Talking about the big "A"

I've been doing a lot of muttering lately.

To myself, to my cats, even to a few unsuspecting inanimate objects.

I can't remember the last time I was in such a muttering state of mind.

Perhaps it was when George Bush the Wuss had that fluttery heart thing, and Dan Quayle the Jackass's Tail was but a hair from that joke we call the presidency. I dunno.

But, anyway, I'm muttering again, and it's getting out of hand.

When I started this whole columnist adventure, I implemented a few self-preservation guidelines. You know, for my sanity and all.

STEFFANY CARREL

One of these guidelines was a list of what not to write about — EVER.

Most the things on the list were issues I didn't know too much about, issues I didn't understand or issues I didn't care what the hell people thought about.

But a few entries on that list were issues I did know a great deal about and felt extremely opinionated about.

And, well, throw my child out into the street, wouldn't you know that abortion happens to be one of those entries.

And it's time to write about it, folks.

Abortion. The big "A."

Choice and freedom or murder and massacre.

However you see it, I don't personally care.

We're all individuals, and we've all been raised with different morals, values and opinions.

Honestly, there's just no way in hell we will all agree on what's right and wrong and how everyone in America should be living their lives.

It's simple, isn't it?

W-e'r-e d-i-f-f-e-r-e-n-t. W-e c-a-n't a-g-r-e-e. H-e-l-l-o-? A-n-y-b-o-d-y h-o-m-e?

Why can't people get it?

Well, I'm going to go ahead and assume you're all with me on this one in terms of understanding my point. This is a leap of faith perhaps, but necessary in order to ensure movement here.

Step one — we've established that we can't agree.

Now, with that simplicity under our belts, we can move on.

We're all equal in this country, yes?

I mean, supposedly that's what America's all about, right — equality? Step two.

OK, so we're all equal, none of us granted with any more insight about morality than any of the rest of us. Of course, I'm just assuming here that no one has God sitting in their right breast pocket telling him all the answers.

So if we're all coming from the same state of equality, then why should any person's opinion outweigh any other person's?

I'll tell you — it shouldn't.

I don't know any better than you, and you don't know any better than me.

Big point there.

OK, so now that we've figured all that stuff out, you're sitting there thinking, "What does that leave us with, Steff? That means neither prolifers nor pro-choicers are right, and that there can't be any sort of decision made about abortion and what to do about it."

But, if you think a little more, you'll see what I'm driving at.

Let's imagine for a moment that abortion is illegal.

Right now, right here, abortion is against the law.

Kind of like prohibition in the 1920s, when alcohol was illegalized.

Kind of like the drug war in the 1980s and today, when drugs are illegal substances.

In fact, those are perfect parallels.

Did people stop drinking because alcohol was illegal?

Have people stopped doing cocaine or heroin because they are now illegal narcotics?

Do you honestly think abortions will stop just because they are against the law?

If you answered "yes," you are in a severe state of denial, and I strongly advise you to wake up from your neverland.

They won't stop.

And the bodies of mutilated teen-age girls will start to multiply in the back alleys of America.

This entire country was founded on equality, freedom and choice.

We've fulfilled the equality part by acknowledging that our opinions are equal.

And in reference to what we should do about the abortion issue, we should look to the rest of what America is based on — freedom and choice.

Right or wrong, the choice to have an abortion should never be taken away.

When you take that away on the basis of a moral opinion, with the mentality that "what I think is better and above what you think," it's only a matter of time before other choices disappear as well.

I can't change how any of you look at abortion.

But I can try to make you understand how important it is to have the choice.

ELECTION '92

Manhattan High School student plays host to Kerrey campaign party

STEPHANIE FUQUA
Collegian

The baby, dressed in red, white and blue and a Bob Kerrey sticker, fussed throughout the video.

The rest of the supporters for Bob Kerrey paid close attention, however, to the promotional video at a "Countdown to New Hampshire" party Wednesday night.

Aaron Otto, a 16-year-old Manhattan High School junior, played host to about 20 people at the Colonial Gardens Clubhouse to support and raise money for Sen. Bob Kerrey's race for the Democratic presidential nomination. Otto is very involved in Kerrey's campaign, even though he is too young to vote for Kerrey.

"Kerrey's got good possibilities," Otto said. "He's got good grass-roots support up in Nebraska."

Otto's family ties to Kerrey extend back to his grandfather, who campaigned for Kerrey when Kerrey was running for governor of Nebraska in 1982.

"I first remember a fundraiser back in '82," Otto said. "Then I was up there last summer, and there were all these rumors floating around that he wouldn't run. I knew he would."

Along with the video, Otto provided those who attended the fundraiser many position papers outlining Kerrey's beliefs.

Kerrey's platform emphasizes the economy and other domestic issues. Also, one of his prime focuses is on his health care bill, the "Kerrey Bill," otherwise known as the Health USA Act of 1991.

This proposal would control healthcare costs with strict cost-containment provisions, pay for long-term care, and extend access to acute-care services.

According to information disseminated at the fundraiser, if elected, Kerrey also promises to streamline the government by cutting the number of cabinet positions to seven. He would consolidate the Departments of Labor, Housing and Human Services, Housing and Urban Development, and Education.

The departments of Agriculture, Energy and Interior would become the Department of Natural Resources, and the departments of Commerce and Education would become the Department of Economic Policy.

In other issues, Kerrey has said he would fully fund the Head Start program and would support federal assistance for all those who want to go to college, but are unable to afford it.

Otto does not know if a primary will actually be held in Kansas, but if there is, he said Kerrey will come to Kansas.

"He's on the ballot for the primary here. Come heck or high water, he'll be here for it, even if he's not in the running anymore," Otto said. "And if he comes to the state, you better believe I'll be there."

When the Democratic nominee is selected, Otto said if Clinton wins, he will be polite.

"If Clinton wins it all, I say 'Good for Clinton,' but I won't wear a button or anything," Otto said.

Other non-voting high school students also attended the fundraiser.

"I am here due to the fact I believe he is one of our stronger Democratic candidates," Jada Drach, MHS junior, said. "We need a change from the George Bush tactics on the economy and domestic issues."

Jared May, MHS sophomore, shared similar views.

"I think George Bush isn't a good president. We need more liberal policies from the White House," May said. "Bush could be doing a better job on domestic issues."

Group protests NC-17 movie

"Henry and June," first film to receive rating, scheduled to play in Union

TODD KNAPPENBERGER
Collegian

Members and faculty of Campus Crusade for Christ are protesting the showing of an NC-17 movie in the K-State Union.

"Henry and June," the first movie ever rated NC-17 by the Motion Picture Association, will be presented by the Union Programming Council Feb. 3-4 in Union Forum Hall.

Barbara Winkler, a 1988 graduate in secondary education and English and a staff member for Campus Crusade for Christ, is against the film being shown in the Union.

Winkler said she is against student fees being used to show pornographic movies in the Union.

Richard Andrade, junior in journalism and mass communications and Kaleidoscope Committee chairman, said student fees are not used to support UPC. The movies are funded from revenue received from movies shown the previous semester, he said.

Winkler said she was looking through the paper to see what movies were being shown at the theater, and saw "Henry and June" in the listing.

"I called the UPC office, and they weren't aware that NC-17 and X were the same thing," said Winkler.

Brian Bray, assistant manager of Seth Child Cinemas, said NC-17 and X are more or less the same thing.

In September of 1990, the Motion Picture Association of America changed its rating of X to NC-17 to decrease the public stigma, Bray said. "Henry and June" was the first movie to receive the rating.

For a movie to be rated X under the old system, or to be rated NC-17 under the new system, it has to have violence, strong language or nudity or any combination of the above, Bray said.

X movies are not pornographic, Bray said.

"XXX movies are pornographic," he said.

Bray said he had problems with protesters in the past concerning NC-17 movies.

Selecting films

Films must meet six of these 10 criteria to be selected by the Union Program Council Kaleidoscope Films Committee.

- Noted director
- Noted cast
- Historical merit
- Educational/cultural merit
- Artistic value
- Literary value
- Social value
- Award-winning
- Reviewed well
- Student support

Andrade said the Kaleidoscope Committee, which selects the movies to be shown by UPC, has criteria all movies it shows must meet. There are 10 areas — such as noted director, noted cast or educational/cultural merit — that the UPC committee looks at to evaluate movies. If a movie fails to meet six of the 10 criteria, the movie won't be shown, Andrade said.

The Kaleidoscope Committee is made entirely of K-State students.

Save the Earth, go to Cats games

If you aren't excited about attending basketball games, perhaps a new incentive would help change your mind. Try the concept of spectators going to games for the atmosphere and the earth.

Who hasn't been inundated with an outpouring of statistics and information that prove that poor, undefended trees are being brutally killed for zealous consumption? Obviously, there is a need for conservation, and what better way than having a facility full of faithful fans recycle their trash.

If McDonald's can take a staunch stance on the environment, other institutions are sure to follow. One family conserving can hardly protect the feeble forest, but crowds of 11,000 or more could create quite an effort. If K-State athletics can't have a turnaround season, perhaps the trash stands a chance at getting attention.

Bramlage Manager Charles Thomas and Assistant Manager Jim Muller said they were receptive to innovative ideas for recycling. The issue of purchasing recyclable cups has been discussed, but totally recyclable products have not been feasible, Thomas said.

K-State souvenir plastic cups,18,000 cups a season, seemed to be carried out of Bramlage, rather than pitched in trash receptacles. It's not a coincidence to find the same souvenir Bramlage cup in every student's cupboard.

A secretary at Bramlage told a story of how one grade-school boy brought his mile-high stack of cups to the concession window because his mother told him they couldn't possibly take any more home. To his disappointment, the concession workers told him they couldn't reuse the cups. In the meantime, another youngster volunteered to take the surplus for his Boy Scout troop.

While the plastic cups seemed to be recycled without any troubles, the small paper cup waste is adding up. The small paper cups sold at Bramlage in one season more than double the entire population of Manhattan. More than one ton of trash is collected each season, according to Thomas.

While office products and paper from the offices at Bramlage are recycled, a full-scale recycling development has not been initiated.

Perhaps the Union's "Willie Mugs" could be refilled at the concession stand, thus eliminating the need for producing more cups. The money saved from one of many new options for recycling at Bramlage could be applied to the athletic debt.

A new wave might just be beginning in environmentally-conscious stadiums across the country. Jim Dunn, manager of Lloyd Noble Center in Norman, Okla., said facilities would quickly follow the innovations of other athletic centers.

Most facilities are addressing recycling issues as long as the process is cost-effective, Dunn said. The January-March 1992 issue of Facility Manager, a trade magazine in cooperation with the International Association of Auditorium Managers Inc., addresses the trend of facilities joining the crusade to participate in social and environmental issues.

The issues transcend the practices of conservation in the home, but the idea could have substantial results in sporting and other facilities. The Noble Center, the University of Oklahoma sports and events complex, discontinued using thin plastic cups, but still sells between 150,000 and 200,000 waxed paper cups, which cannot be easily recycled, each season.

While recent issues and concerns are surfacing about the effectiveness of recycling, there can't be much debate that one ton of trash isn't easily tossed aside.

CATS BASKETBALL

Team play boosts Cats past Roos

PATRICK OBLEY
Collegian

The pre-game shows hinted the Bud Light Daredevils were going to be the highlight of Wednesday's K-State game with Missouri-Kansas City.

Pre-game comments of Kangaroo players and coaches also hinted K-State wasn't up to snuff with other teams UMKC had played.

"They didn't respect us, but I bet they do now," Trasel Rone responded after the Cats sent the Roos packing after a 72-53 Wildcat win in Bramlage Coliseum.

Coming into the game, a main concern of Cats coach Dana Altman was his team's inability to play a full 40-minute ball game. In the 85-59 Iowa State defeat, K-State looked good for 20 minutes before falling into the same rut of poor shooting and loose defense.

The Cats played 40 minutes Wednesday.

After good defense and solid ball handling skills helped them forge a 29-27 halftime lead, Cats center Wylie Howard scored 6 consecutive points to open up an 8-point lead.

When Howard finished scoring, Rone picked up the slack, canning three consecutive treys. That's when he got goofy.

Seemingly inspired by Daredevils skits, Rone went up for a circus dunk — but missed. That's when Vincent Jackson picked up the slack.

Jackson grabbed Rone's miss in mid-flight and slammed it home for a 51-40 K-State lead with 8:57 showing. After that, the Cats never looked back, allowing just two Kangaroo buckets before two desperation treys at the end made the final margin.

Howard had a career-high 22 points while Rone and Ski Jones chimed in with 12 each. K-State's bench outscored UMKC's bench 29-12.

Another amazing stat was K-State's season low eight turnovers, the first one not coming until the 8-minute mark of the first half. The game also marked the first time K-State has held its opponent to fewer points in the second half than it scored in the first.

The team leader in rebounds was 6-foot-4 Jackson.

In theory, team play leads to 40 minutes of production.

"It's great when people step in off the bench and contribute," Jones said. "We played smart on offense, and we were pretty successful in getting the ball down low to Wylie. And when Wylie starts scoring and everybody's playing like they did, we're going to have a good chance of winning."

"A lot of people contributed tonight, that's good to see," Altman said. "It was sure good to see them go out and loosen up and play well."

"It was a big game for us," Jackson said. "We wanted to come out and play 40 minutes and we did."

Rone was more to the point.

"It's about time, huh," Rone said.

Roos coach Lee Hunt said K-State's athleticism is what won the game.

"You have to give K-State a lot of credit," Hunt said. "Their quickness was a big difference. They outrebounded us in the second half and that was a big turn in the game.

"We lost composure under K-State's pressure in the second half," Hunt said. "No. 22 (Howard) got those three quick buckets at the beginning of the half, and they denied the ball to our big guys inside, which took us out of the game."

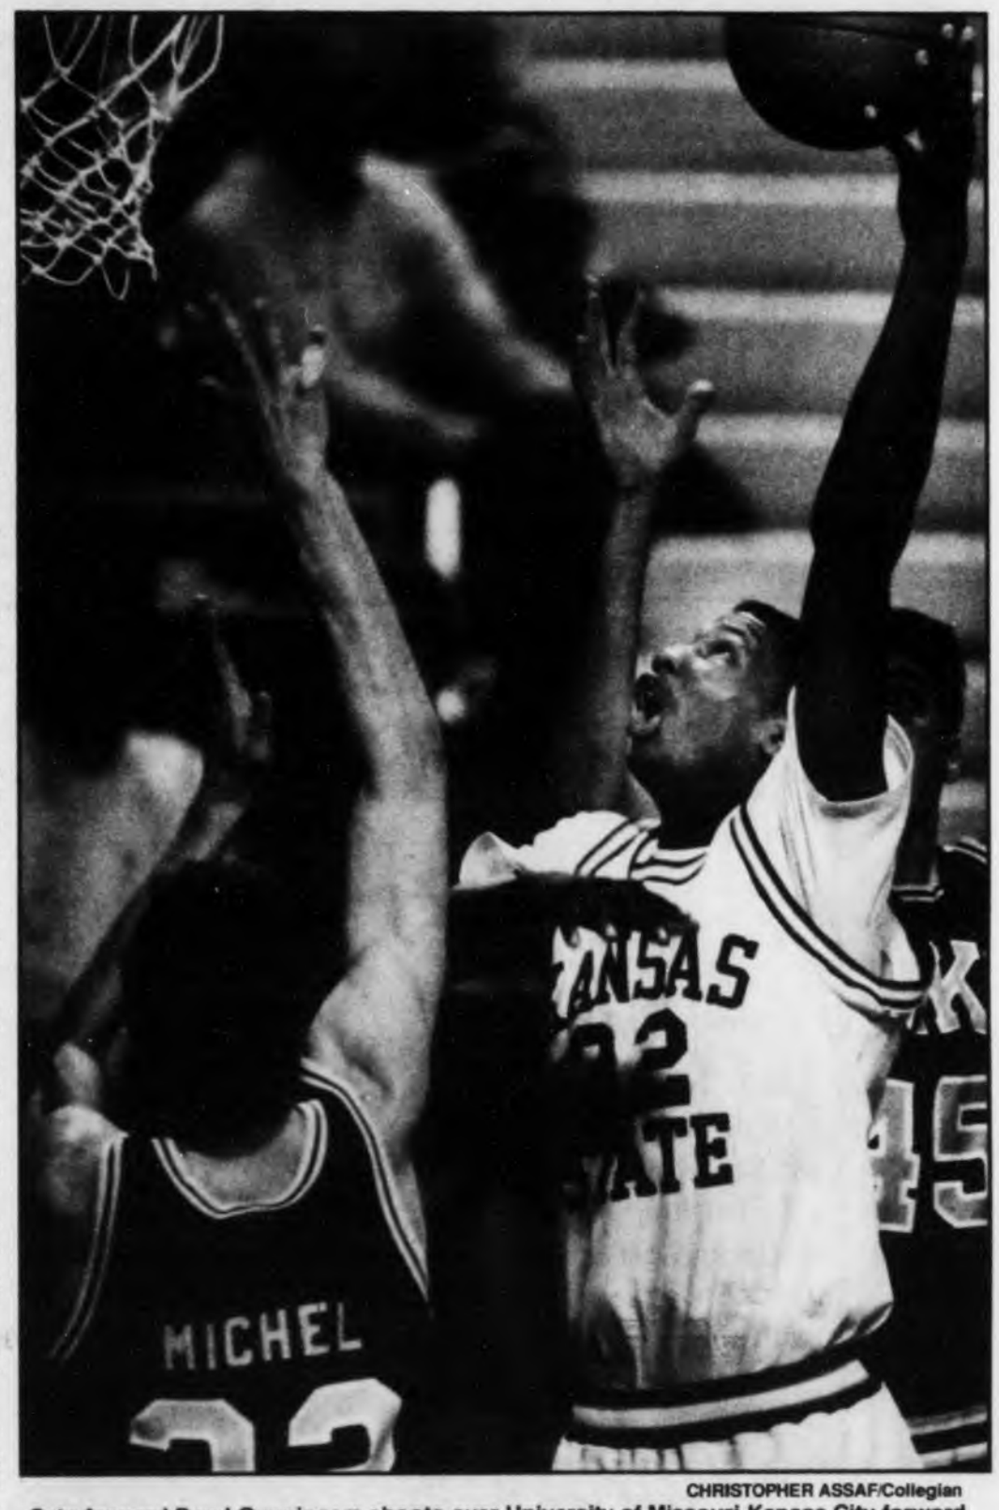
Altman cited Howard's dominance inside and Gaylon Nickerson's defense on high-scoring Tony Dumas as vital keys to the win.

"We wanted to get the ball down in to Wylie Howard. And we did, and he responded," Altman said.

Though Dumas finished with 21 points, 13 came at the free throw line, not the field.

"I thought Gaylon did a great job on Dumas. Gaylon just about came up with a couple of steals, and I think that had Dumas a little sped up," Altman said. "Gaylon got him to take a couple forced shots which I think affected him a little."

But nonetheless, such great play against non-conference foes doesn't matter in Big Eight league play. Colorado comes to town Saturday.



"We did a lot of things right, but we've got to do that every time we go out there," Howard said. "We've put 40 minutes together, but I think every game we should be able to do that. We've got to be the ones to go out and deliver the blows."

After three league drubbings, no one is denying the Wildcats still have a battle ahead.

"The Big Eight is at its all-time high right now," Hunt said. "Every team in the league is playing good ball and that includes K-State. Nonetheless, they've got a long road ahead of them."

"This game was nice, but we're concerned with the Big Eight and Colorado right now," Altman said.

"Colorado is a big game for us," Rone said. "We all know the Big Eight is the Big Eight, and it doesn't matter what we did tonight. We need to win in the league right now."

INSIDE STUFF

Howard would rather let his play do the talking

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

Just what does it take to be a leader?

Wylie Howard wants to know, and he's asking quite a few people how he might become one.

"I've never had to do it," the senior center said of taking an on-court leadership role. "I'm not real comfortable with it, so I've asked various people about what I have to do to lead."

Howard's career-best, 22-point effort in Wednesday night's 72-53 win over UMKC in Bramlage Coliseum led K-State.

OK, then, maybe if you score enough, you can lead.

It's just the talking stuff that makes Howard a bit antsy. Leading by example is much easier than leading vocally for the admittedly quiet Howard.

"As far as being vocal, I talk out there, but I just don't feel real comfortable all the time doing it," he said. "You have to tune into what the coach is saying and not be afraid to say something yourself, and then maybe hear something back from a teammate about what you're doing wrong.

"That's tough."

With Coach Dana Altman aware that Howard feels more comfortable in leading through his play rather than what he has to say, the halftime strategy against the visiting Kangaroos was fairly simple.

It was to get Howard untracked inside in an attempt to break open a tight game. K-State led just 29-27 at intermission.

Altman's plan worked, and Howard led an 8-1 run over the first 2:17 of the second half that gave the Cats a more comfortable advantage and helped take away much of the pressure felt at halftime.

"Wylie did a nice job of posting up early in the second half," Altman said. "He got us started."

The aforementioned 8-1 run featured Howard shots off the glass, in the lane, underneath and off the jam. Yep, he scored all eight points in the flurry and had 14 of his 22 in the final 20 minutes.

The opening run was a clinic, and one Howard credited Altman for having organized.

"In the locker room at halftime, coach said 'we're going to go to you from the start,'" Howard recounted. "And that's how it went."

The effort was just the latest in a fairly solid January for Howard, who has had outings of 21, 17 and now 22 points in a trio of non-conference games this month.

Howard's success, he said, has come from Altman's constant prodding.

"I've been trying real hard — to lead and to do more," he said. "But coach always tells me, 'you can do even more.' I'm just trying to do what he wants and what we need."

One thing Altman has asked Howard and the other Wildcat big men to do more of is get involved with the team's fastbreak offense.

"I'm running the floor more," said Howard, who was visibly winded following his offensive flurry early in the second half. "Coach wants me to get out on the wing and run, and I'm feeling better doing that."

Also helping Howard feel good on this night were his teammates.

"Tonight, a big plus was team unity," Howard said. "It's easy to lead and to play well when everyone is supporting you."

It's the kind of support Howard hopes to give those same teammates on a regular basis from here on out, he said.

"I just have to take all of this in and figure out what I can do to help us win," Howard said. "If leading is what it takes, I'll lead."

Miller scores 21 in 80-64 loss

Mizzou's rebounding key to outcome

KRIS YOUNG
Collegian

Missouri's Lady Tigers ended last year's Big Eight regular season in eighth place after K-State won its first game in Columbia, Mo., since 1981, 66-62.

But the first meeting of the two teams this year ended a little differently.

Behind solid rebounding, particularly on its offensive board, Missouri whipped the Lady Cats 80-64 Wednesday night in Columbia's Hearnes Center.

"They had too many second and third times to score, and you can't do that to a team when you're on their home court," said Lady Cat coach Susan Yow.

Lady Tiger forward Lynnette Linneman, who averaged just under six rebounds a game last year, dominated the boards with 18.

Yow commented on forward Vantrece Williams and her game-high 22 points.

"She just overpowered us on the inside," she said.

K-State's top scorer was Mary Jo Miller, who led four Lady Cats in double figures with 21 points. Guard Kelly Moylan and forward Lynn Holzman each scored 11, and forward Leah Honeycutt added 10.

For Missouri head coach Joann Rutherford, the game not only added a win to their record, but symbolized a turning point for her ball club.

"K-State's a nice ball club," Rutherford said. "It was a big win for us."

Yow said she believes Mizzou will be one of the top teams Big Eight.

"There are so many teams that are going to be in the thick of it in the Big Eight, and Missouri is definitely one of those teams," she said.

With the loss, K-State dropped to 5-13 overall and 2-3 in league. Next up for the Lady Cats is a home contest Sunday afternoon against arch-rival Kansas.

SPORTS DIGEST

Rose Jr. to play again

CINCINNATI (AP) — Pete Rose's son still hopes to play in the big leagues. His latest effort will be in the Cleveland Indians' organization.

The Indians obtained Pete Rose II in a minor-league draft from the Chicago White Sox in December. He batted .217 for Chicago's Class A team in Sarasota, Fla., last season.

Rose said the move surprised him.

"I was looking forward to going back to the White Sox, and I was even working with their minor-league strength coach," Rose said.

Rose, who began his career with the Baltimore Orioles in 1989, wasn't concerned about having to change teams again.

"That's the way it goes. I'm loving it because I'm wanted," he said.

Rose, 22, may have some surprises waiting for him with the Indians' organization.

"When he gets to spring training, we're going to stick a catcher's glove on him," said Dan O'Dowd, the Indians' player development director. Rose, primarily a third baseman, is on the Indians' Class AAA roster in Colorado Springs. But he is likely to wind up with Cleveland's Class AA team in Akron-Canton, O'Dowd said.

NBA Rado to debut Feb. 9

NEW YORK (AP) — NBA Radio will make its debut by broadcasting its All-Star game on Feb. 9. The network has lined up 61 stations and also will broadcast 10 regular-season games on Sundays through the end of the season.

The NBA is the first pro league to produce its own "in house" national radio package. Joe McConnell will do play-by-play and former player Bob Lanier will be the color analyst.

Kite's uses contracts to decrease MIPs

Aggieville bars take precautions to prevent problems with minors drinking

KRISTEN TURNER
Collegian

Kite's Bar & Grille is trying to curtail the incidence of underage drinking by requiring all minors who enter the bar to sign a contract.

Anyone under the age of 21 must sign the contract when they walk in the door of the bar.

Once the contract is signed, the responsibility is shifted from the bar to the individual in the event of a minor in possession charge.

Scott Haase, Kite's manager, said the contracts, which have been in effect since mid-September, have not completely stopped the problem, but have significantly decreased the occurrence of MIPs.

Because of the costly fines, many bars do not allow minors to enter.

Auntie Mae's Parlor is one such bar and has never allowed minors.

"It's not the clientele we want, and it's just not worth it," said Tim Giles, Auntie Mae's bartender.

Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon also has a no-minor policy.

"It costs too much when underage drinkers are caught, and we have an older crowd, anyway," said Russ Fuchs, bartender at Last Chance.

Kite's presently is the only bar in the area using contracts for minors.

"We did not want to turn away minors completely, but we did want to have more control," said A.J. Ahlstedt, co-owner of Kite's.

Alhstedt said he thinks the contracts are looked upon favorably by the Riley County Police Department.

"The contracts show them we are doing our job, and we are serious about stopping underage drinkers," Ahlstedt said.

Some minors, however, don't like the contracts.

"I haven't been there a lot because of the contracts," said Ann Lankford, 19-year-old sophomore in chemical engineering.

"If they were having problems, I guess I can understand, but I don't think they help," Lankford said.

Liz Dowd, 19-year-old sophomore in business administration, said she also doesn't like the contracts.

"I don't enjoy going into a bar, being branded and treated like a child," she said. "I understand the problems with MIPs, but I think it's going overboard."

Some bargoers who are 21 and over have mixed opinions about the contracts.

"I think it's OK. There really is nothing else to do in Manhattan, and I feel sorry for them when they can't get in at all," said Julie Canova, 21-year-old senior in speech pathology.

Debbie Turnbull, 21-year-old senior in accounting, said she was against Kite's contract policy.

"I think they should be let in, and I think the contracts are stupid," Turnbull said. "I understand they have to monitor the underage drinking because of the large fines, but I think there is a better way."

Telefund will operate from new location

Center's volunteers will start recruiting in early February

PAM HANSON
Collegian

The 1992 K-State Telefund will begin Feb. 2 in its new location at the Hollis Telefund Center at the Foundation Center on Anderson Avenue.

This year's telefund also has a new director and 20 additional phones, for a total of 80 phones each night. Previously, the telefund was in the K-State Union.

Jan Herink, secretary to Telefund Director Russ McMahon, said the new location will be a plus for both the Foundation, the fund-raising arm for the University, and coordinators of the telefund.

"It will delete problems because of the spaciousness," Herink said.

"Now we won't have to transport paperwork between the Foundation and the Union."

The Hollis Telefund Center was named for alumnus James Hollis. In 1970, a $289,000 estate gift from Hollis was donated to the Foundation. This money was used in two ways.

First, it was used to purchase a building at 1408 Denison Ave, which came to be known as Hollis House. Hollis House included the Foundation headquarters until it moved to its new location at 2323 Anderson Ave. in 1991.

The remaining portion of the donation was set up in a fund to support the maintenance and operation of the Hollis House.

When the Foundation moved to its new location, the third floor was named the Hollis Telefund Center.

The new center isn't the only thing new to the telefund this year.

McMahon became the Foundation's annual giving director and telefund coordinator. This is the first time he has directed a telephone fund-raising program of this size.

"No one except my predecessor has done a program this size," McMahon said. "It's not done like this anywhere else in the country."

The telefund program is well structured and valuable, he said.

"My job is to polish an already successful program and to help increase participation, which, in turn, will increase funds for student scholarships and other special programs within the individual colleges."

McMahon said the number of volunteers for the telefund is becoming well known at other colleges and universities.

Each college is responsible for recruiting its volunteers for the telefund, McMahon said. He said faculty and students in each college, side by side, participate and call alumni.

Faculty help and participation has become invaluable over the years, McMahon said. More than 1,200 volunteers meet annually to ask alumni for donations.

FEMA

its $20,000 proposal in correlation with the church pantries who supply the needy with food. Of this, $1,000 is for utility assistance and $18,000 will be used in a voucher system that was created when Riley County received FEMA funds in 1990.

The system allows clients, who are screened at the Red Cross before going to the church pantries, to be given a voucher good for a certain amount of protein items of their choice.

"I think it will help to reduce some overall needs in the community," said Beryl Adams, director of the American Red Cross and secretary of the FEMA board. "Clients in the past have said they feel good in being able to accept protein items their family would chose."

Adams said $1,000 was requested to replace money not received from the Mayor's Holiday tree this year.

Although the Flinthills Breadbasket submitted a similar proposal for $20,000, they received only $2,000.

"Both the Red Cross and the Breadbasket had similar proposals. Food was the mission, and we were in somewhat of a dilemma as to what to do," Wright said.

He said because the voucher system was already in place and ensures a variety of readily available food items, the board decided to use the voucher system. Wright explained that a voucher system gives the clients social dignity.

Although the Breadbasket's proposal was for leveraging food — purchasing more for food for less money to feed the maximum amount of people — Wright said it was not specific in how the program was to take place.

"I assume the committee was honorable and made a value judgment," said Jim Morrison, food procurement officer of the Breadbasket.

Morrison said he was happy the money went for the food needs in the community, but he said he feels the Breadbasket has a history of being able to leverage food and money and could have done so in this case.

"Apparently the Red Cross and the screening committee think they can do it better," Morrison said.

He said the question is which agency is most appropriate to handle the food in the community, and there could be a conflict in the definition of long-term hunger and emergency needs.

"I was slightly surprised by the allocation, but in theory, the money is going to the people in need. I think the Breadbasket has a reputation of accountability of food acquisition and distribution equal to or better than any agency of food solicitation handling," Morrison said.

He said it is a procedural issue, not a substance issue, and it is not disagreeable that the issue is being addressed.

Morrison questioned who makes the decision on the board because members on the FEMA board were among members of those submitting proposals.

"I do think this causes a conflict, but it's not one the community has a choice on, because the government mandates who is to be on the board," he said.

Adams did not vote on the allocation.

"The protein voucher system doesn't directly affect the Red Cross office, but it benefits the hungry who are dealt with through our office, so I abstained from voting," Adams said.

Wright said the problem of conflict of interest was considered, and he created rules so those who had submitted proposals could not be involved with discussions of their group and could not vote.

"We took what was available and what was the most efficient way to do it," Wright said. Wright said no decision was made in malice.

Miller raised the other $12,000 in Wichita, both from business acquaintances and supporters of Stephan.

After the settlement was disclosed, Stingley filed a second lawsuit alleging breach of contract and accusing Stephan and Storey of holding her up in a false public light.

She sought $5.2 million in damages from Stephan and Storey, a Topeka attorney who served in the state Senate for eight years in 1969-77.

It was during the trial of that lawsuit in October and November 1988 that Stephan's testimony and that of Miller and Topeka lawyer Margie Phelps conflicted. Phelps was Stingley's lawyer and negotiated the original settlement on her behalf.

Stephan testified he knew nothing about terms of the settlement, while Miller and Phelps testified Stephan negotiated the settlement and was present at meetings when it was negotiated.

Storey also testified Stephan knew nothing of terms of the settlement.

Storey was later dropped from the breach of contract portion of the lawsuit and was found innocent on the false light claim.

It is that testimony to a federal court jury and before Judge Dale Saffels that was presented to the grand jury.

Stingley won a $200,000 judgment as a result of the second trial but has never collected.

Stephan declared bankruptcy. The petition was granted by a federal judge, but his ruling has been appealed.

times as long as anyone before him.

Stephan, a former Sedgwick County District Court judge, would not be automatically excluded from the office of attorney general if he is convicted of the felony charge, but he could face proceedings that would strip him of his law license and make him ineligible for the office.

Stingley, a former clerk in Stephan's office, filed a sexual harassment lawsuit against Stephan in December 1982 after she was fired. She alleged Stephan made suggestive advances on numerous occasions.

The lawsuit was settled out of court in March 1985, but terms of the settlement were not made public by agreement of both parties.

In October 1985, the settlement was disclosed at a news conference Stephan and Storey, a political supporter and former state senator from Topeka, spoke at.

At the time, Stephan was considering seeking the Republican nomination for governor in 1986 and the secret settlement was hurting his ability to organize a campaign.

The settlement called for Stephan to pay Stingley $24,000, help her sell her Topeka home and give her a recommendation for getting a job in California.

Storey raised $12,000 in Topeka and former Attorney General Vern Miller raised the other $12,000 in Wichita, both from business acquaintances and supporters of Stephan.

Budget

provided $50,000 this year.

— Recreational improvements at Wilson Lake. An Army Corps of Engineers budget document said no money was requested for 1993 because the project was "low priority."

Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., obtained $900,000 for the project this year. A Dole spokesman said Bush's budget request wouldn't affect the project, because no additional money is needed for the Wilson Lake work in 1993.

Kansas lawmakers said the earmarked projects, particularly the plant science building at K-State, were not dead simply because Bush failed to request 1993 money for them.

K-State Provost James Coffman said it would come as a total surprise if Congress cuts the Throckmorton addition program. He said the federal government has agreed to match state funds for the project, and construction bids have already been made.

"I don't think they'll back out of that commitment. I can't imagine they would do that," Coffman said.

Walter Woods, dean of the College of Agriculture, also showed little concern that the programs would be dropped.

"Historically, the president has never recommended these special types of grants, so I'm not surprised at his recommendation to cut them," Woods said.

Congressional support should be strong, he said, because it's not just a Kansas issue. A number of states have construction projects similar to Throckmorton and research grants, Woods said.

Manhattan

Plans are being made to widen and improve state Highway K-177 from I-70 to Manhattan as a four-lane highway.

U.S. Highway 24 from Manhattan to Wamego will also be four lanes, and Seth Childs Road will be widened.

Industrial growth in the vicinity of the airport will be emphasized, as will commercial development on Seth Childs Road and Fort Riley Boulevard.

According to the city's plan, "quality living" in and around downtown and Aggieville will be developed. This means increased living space, such as loft apartments, which should be cheap enough for student living.

Also according to the plan, one economic goal of Manhattan is the development of a large office and industrial research park located close to K-State, which will capitalize on the research strength of the University.

This will mean more jobs for Manhattan residents and continue Manhattan's reliance on K-State for economic opportunities.

"It's obvious that K-State is a major component of the Manhattan economy in terms of jobs, housing and selling of goods, just by the fact that this is a small town, and the University plays a large part of the economy," said James Ragan, head of the Department of Economics.

"If something adverse happens to the University, it would affect Manhattan. Likewise, if the University grows, it helps Manhattan."

Randy Martin, president of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, agreed.

"We have a three-part economy with the University, Fort Riley and various businesses. Four thousand people are employed at the University. Those people alone make a difference," Martin said.

"We have a very symbiotic relationship," he said about Manhattan and Fort Riley. "One relates to the other."

However, Martin said he does not think Manhattan will become increasingly dependent on K-State.

"The one thing I see happening in the next few years is that Manhattan is a good town, and its relationship to the rest of the world will change," he said. "It'll play a larger role in the economy of Kansas, and it'll have more political clout.

"It's sort of a 'sleeping giant' in terms of quality of life. It's an undiscovered secret, and people will discover that."

Martin also said there will be jobs for those students who want them.

"They may not be the most desirable jobs, but for everyone who wants a job, there will be one somewhere," he said.

An expanded Aggieville, which is now a seven-block area, may be one of the places students will find jobs.

"Right now, it goes out from Burger King down to Cinemagic and the Spot, including the Bluemont area. I think that there will be some expansion," said Cheryl Sieben, executive director of the Aggieville Business Association.

Even though Sieben said athletic game days are good for business, Aggieville merchants will not be concentrating only on serving the students.

"We'll still be well-rounded, catering to the community, the University and Fort Riley," she said. "We'll continue to back up the athletes. A lot of merchants have backed up the team, whether they win or lose."

Alvan Johnson, Riley County Police Department director, said he hopes Manhattan will be safer, even though Riley County will be larger.

"I think that it will be safer. I hope so," he said.

Johnson said with that contingent upon the economy, the police force may have an additional 10 to 15 percent increase in size.

which should push enrollment to more than 21,000.

"Our main goal is to keep KSU a strong, major land-grant university with a strong commitment to teaching and research," Krause said. "We want to remain in the top-100 in research."

Krause also said the variety of students will hopefully show a greater representation of students of color, and there will be a continuing trend of older students.

"A goal for the institution is to be a greater reflection of national demographics instead of campus demographics, in terms of students of color," Krause said.

Krause works closely with the City of Manhattan in terms of planning and hopes for community economic growth in terms of K-State and research.

"There is an economic development plan that will capitalize on the research strength of the University," Krause said.

"There are plans for a research business park, which will attract industries associated with industrial research."

This could increase the Manhattan economy's dependence on K-State, depending on how it is measured, Krause said.

"Historically, university towns tend to grow with the university," he said.

"If the university is stable, the town is stable. If the university grows, the town grows, etc. This is especially true with rural communities with a university."

Unfortunately, Krause said he doesn't think that there will be any public transportation or shuttle system in the future.

"I don't think there will be a large growth of the population that would change the situation that is now," he said. "Public transportation is a costly operation.

K-STATE 2001

KANSAS

HOW WE WILL FINANCE THE FUTURE

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian

Money will still be tight in the year 2001.

As the state of Kansas tightens its general fund, K-State's budget will continue to suffer.

A look at the state financing of K-State suggests that students will continue to pay higher costs and receive the same amount of education, if not less.

"I think we'll see in the future a continued trend of students paying more of the costs, and they won't get more out of their education," John Struve, University budget director, said.

Struve said the costs of providing higher education are increasing, but the general-fund financing is not; therefore, the students must make up the difference with increased tuition.

"What will happen remains to be seen," Struve said. "I think we are being funded as well as the state can afford."

Struve said there is not enough money in the state's budget for everything, and K-State alone could use all of the funds.

"I feel there is a fair amount of funds for higher education in the state's budget. We must remember that we are competing with many other needs in Kansas," he said.

On the other hand, Struve said there is not an attractive alternative.

"If tuition costs were to be lowered, there would be a bigger problem, and students would be getting less of an education. So at least with an increase, there is an equilibrium," he said.

Many people familiar with higher-education financing said institutions of higher education struggle because the economy continues to suffer.

"I think the economy will most likely maintain itself, and the world as a whole may get a little better," Sen. Gus Bogina, R-Shawnee, said.

"I also think what's happening now is indicative of the future."

Bogina said Kansas's financial future will be tight. He said education in the future will be restrained in new money.

"What we're getting for our money must be more drastically monitored," Bogina said.

"It is necessary for all education to generate additional revenue enhancements internally, and we must live within our budget."

Bogina said part of this task can be accomplished by the Kansas Board of Regents completing missions fully.

Students pay 25-30 percent of their educational costs. Bogina said he thinks this is valid, and it should remain constant.

"What we must do is internally look at our operation.

"It is true that we can't be all things to all students, but what we must do is find the most good for the most students and act accordingly," he said.

Bogina said in the overall picture, this would also include internally reorganizing Kansas universities.

Struve said it is difficult to just look for state money.

"We need internal reallocation of funds, maybe by looking at the KSU Foundation," he said.

"It is difficult to deal with on a large-scale basis, and we must remember that the state has the same pressures as us."

Bogina suggested merging technical schools to generate economics and consolidate, which saves money.

CITY

Commissioners silent on noise ordinance

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Collegian

The controversial noise ordinance regarding Aggieville outdoor beer gardens will not be discussed at the Manhattan City Commission's Tuesday night meeting.

The ordinance will go to the City Planning Board first, then it will be read at a commission meeting in February.

Student Body President Jackie McClaskey said she was told discussion about the noise ordinance would be postponed for a maximum of 60 days.

"It will be considered with a zoning ordinance, and since the zoning ordinance is still in the planning process, they both will be brought up later," she said.

Marvin Peck, junior in business administration and bartender at Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon in Aggieville, said he also heard the hearing was postponed due to the zoning ordinance.

"I think they're trying to rezone Aggieville. For one ordinance to happen, so does the other one," he said.

"I guess they have to rezone it to be residential. It would be hard to say, 'No music after 11' if Aggieville is not zoned residential."

COLLEGE OF ENGINEERING

Cogley to resign after semester

Upset students say administrators unwilling to disclose information

RICHARD ANDRADE
Collegian

Due to friction within the College of Engineering, Allen Cogley, head of the mechanical engineering department, will step down from his post at the end of the spring semester.

"The process has started to have a new department head," Kenneth Gowdy, associate dean of the College of Engineering said.

Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering, said although the agreement has not been officially finalized, it is only a matter of tying up loose ends.

Sources inside and outside the college indicated the reason for the change was a long-brewing tension between Cogley and Rathbone.

Gowdy declined to comment on the nature of the resignation, saying only that Rathbone would like to have new leadership for the department.

"I felt the timing was appropriate, so we're going forward with the change," Rathbone said.

He did not elaborate on what provoked the change, and said he did not feel personnel questions should be discussed publicly.

Many students in the department are upset with the unwillingness of the administration to keep them informed of happenings.

"A lot of the students are mad at the fact that stuff like this happens, and students don't have a say in it," said Chris Bates, senior in mechanical engineering.

She said that she thought the political nature of the situation intimidated anyone who would ask or comment about it.

"The students are not aware of what's going on," Kirby Chapman, assistant professor in mechanical engineering said. "I'm not sure that it's necessary. It's a faculty matter."

Rathbone said because of the timing of the change, there was no urgency to publicly announce the change to students.

Rathbone met with all mechanical engineering faculty in December, both individually and collectively, in meetings that led to Cogley's resignation.

Rathbone would not comment on the meetings.

A search committee has been established with the objective of finding a new department head by the beginning of the fall semester.

The search will be nationwide, but it is also open to applicants within the department.

Byron Jones, professor of mechanical engineering, will lead the search committee.

"Dr. Cogley will have the opportunity to remain here as a professor," Gowdy said.

ENTERTAINMENT

'Alice in Wonderland' to light up McCain

THOMAS LISTER
Collegian

Lewis Carroll's classic novel and the Soviet occupation of Czechoslovakia will be depicted in the Black Light Theatre of Prague's production of "Alice in Wonderland" at 3 p.m. Sunday in McCain Auditorium.

The production's message shows life under the Soviet Communist party, Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium said.

In August 1968, Soviet forces invaded Czechoslovakia and re-established control after a period of socialism. Communism collapsed in Czechoslovakia in 1989.

"The Czechs were masters of double meanings to get plays beyond the censors," Martin said. "They were one of the most astute groups in terms of double meaning. The book is only a jumping-off point."

However, the production should attract both children and adults, he said.

"Children will enjoy the physical show," he said. "Adults can appreciate the intellectual meaning."

During the show, actors and props are illuminated under ultraviolet light against a black backdrop. With the help of technicians and actors, objects appear to levitate or disappear onstage.

"'Alice' lends itself superbly to the black light production," Martin said. "They are the original and the best in the world at what they do."

In addition, McCain's Children will sponsor a Mad Hatter's Tea Party for children at 1:30 p.m., Allan Bailey, stage manager at McCain Auditorium said.

There will be games and treats for the children, Committee Chairwoman Sally Anderson said.

"They'll love it," she said. "We have 142 reservations so far."

Martin said the performance should last two hours.

NEWS DIGEST

▶ STEPHAN VOWS TO GO ON

TOPEKA (AP) — Attorney General Bob Stephan vowed to continue in office on the day after a federal grand jury indicted him on charges of perjury and conspiracy to commit perjury.

The four-term attorney general reported for work as usual Thursday morning. He granted interviews to reporters on topics other than his legal problems.

A spokeswoman for Stephan said he was following the advice of his lawyer not to comment on the indictments.

▶ BUS HIJACKER KILLED

COLTON, Calif. (AP) — A 33-year-old man was killed Thursday by police after hijacking a Greyhound bus with eight people on board .

Reynaldo Andrade Gonzalez drove the bus on a 320-mile dash across the desert.

None of the hostages were injured.

▶ DISMISSAL UPHELD

RUSSELL (AP) — An appeals panel upheld the dismissal of a teacher whose disappearance was linked to her reported belief in UFOs.

A three-member committee unanimously upheld the firing of Marcia Brock as a teacher at Russell High School. She was dismissed by the Russell School Board.

Brock left Russell on Sept. 9 and went to Israel with her two daughters. Press reports linked her disappearance to her beliefs.

▶ TYSON'S TRIAL BEGINS

INDIANAPOLIS (AP) — Mike Tyson's teen-age accuser told a jury Thursday the former heavyweight boxing champion pinned her on a bed with his forearm, stripped her, raped her and laughed while she cried in pain and begged him to stop.

▶ DAHMER CALLED 'SICK'

MILWAUKEE (AP) — Jeffrey Dahmer's attorney described him as compulsively driven to have sex.

"This was not an evil man. This was a sick man," said Gerald Boyle during opening statements at Dahmer's sanity trial.

Prosecutor Micheal McCann said Dahmer was sane went he ate his victims' bodies and committed sexual acts with their severed heads.

▶ SHUTTLE LANDS SAFELY

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. (AP) — Discovery landed in California sunshine Thursday after an international shuttle crew of seven studied the impact of cosmic radiation and weightlessness on a menagerie including worms, slime mold and insects.

The next shuttle mission is scheduled for late March.

COMMENTS

"We just want to see him. We want to get his autograph if they will let us. That would be cool to have Jeffrey Dahmer's autograph because he is a killer."

— Amy Di Francesco, 16, of Beloit, Wis., waiting to get a seat at the sanity trial of serial killer Jeffrey Dahmer in Milwaukee. She intended to report back to her high school class on her courtroom experience.

"I love Mike Tyson ... I believe in him ... I've got a son his age ... I know how it is ... Boys will be boys."

— Margaret Edwards, spectator at the rape trial of former heavyweight champion Mike Tyson.

"We no longer view the United States as a foe."

— Russian Foreign Minister Andrei Kozyrev on Boris Yeltsin's unveiling a plan for nuclear weapons cutbacks.

— Democratic presidential candidate Bill Clinton, when pressed on the CBS program "60 Minutes" on whether he had been unfaithful to his wife.

"In regard to the charges made by the U.S. attorney in Missouri, I am innocent."

— Kansas Attorney General Bob Stephan, after being indicted in a federal grand jury on charges of perjury.

CORRECTION

On Page 2 of Wednesday's Collegian, USA Today All-American Academic Team winner Jean Sonnenfield's name was spelled incorrectly. And there were 1,200 applicants for the award, not 12,000. The Collegian regrets the errors and thanks Sonnenfield for her cooperation.

Two nearly identical stories about Attorney General Bob Stephan ran on the front page of Thursday's paper. The same story was saved under different names on the computer system. The Collegian regrets the error.

STUDENT SENATE

Commendation to hotdog man fails to pass consideration

ANDY WOODWARD
Collegian

The hotdog man came within a wiener's length of being immortalized by the Student Senate Thursday night.

After a half hour of discussion, Senate decided not to commend Matt Schindler, sophomore in English education, for distributing free hotdogs on campus Monday afternoon.

The original proposal, authored in part by Neil Neaderhiser, senior in engineering technology, was designed to both commend Schindler for his generosity in distributing free hotdogs and to criticize the facilities department for clamping down on his cookout.

Joel Gruenke, graduate student in statistics, objected to the proposal on philosophical grounds.

Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life, objected to the use of the phrase "good nutritional value" as applied to wieners and said he wished it to be removed.

The proposal did not pass consideration.

One proposal being discussed in Senate committee concerning season basketball ticket sales is the reinstatement of the campout with each participating group paying a $25 refundable damage deposit before the campout begins.

Faculty Senate representative Phil Anderson, instructor of speech, objected to the campout.

He said he fears the resurgence of debauchery, possible lawsuits and what Anderson calls the waste of students' time and the University's money.

"Ninety-five percent of the students I've talked to want a campout," Student Body President Jackie McClaskey said.

"I feel the campout would boost ticket sales."

BOARD OF REGENTS

McDowell focus of KBI allegations

CRYSTAL SAWALICH
Collegian

A Kansas regent is being investigated regarding the misuse of funds and equipment at Independence Community College.

Regent Jo Ann McDowell is president of the community college.

The allegations of improprieties are misuse of funds and misuse of equipment to name of few, said Jim Malson, director of the Kansas Bureau of Investigations.

Malson said these allegations are a "criminal violation," and he had no other comments about the allegations.

Malson had no other comments about the allegations.

Student Body President Jackie McClaskey said she was not prepared to comment other than to say McDowell's position on the Kansas Board of Regents will not be affected immediately.

"We're not real sure what's true and what's not," McClaskey said.

Gov. Joan Finney appoints those who sit on the board.

"The governor will visit with her directly," Martha Walker, Finney's press secretary said.

A free educational forum
Denying an eating disorder can be a fatal mistake.
Eating disorders, such as anorexia and bulimia, can affect children, teenagers, and adults. If you or someone you know, male or female...
■ is preoccupied with weight and body size
■ eats large amounts of food followed by self-induced vomiting
■ uses laxatives or diuretics to control weight
■ prefers to eat alone or eats secretly
■ exercises compulsively
■ denies that he or she has a problem
■ expresses feelings of being fat although they may even be underweight
■ avoids meals (though they may prepare them)
...it may signal an eating disorder. Most victims can't stop their self-destructive behavior without professional help. Left untreated, either disorder can become chronic and result in severe health damage, even death.
The Menninger Clinic will present a free public Eating Disorders Education Forum featuring:
■ A presentation on eating disorders by the Menninger professional staff
■ A question and answer period coordinated by Menninger mental health professionals
■ The 28-minute film Fear of Fat
■ An opportunity, if you choose, to meet privately with a Menninger mental health professional trained in eating disorders. (This brief screening is designed to be informational and will provide free professional guidance, but is not a substitute for a detailed, psychological evaluation.)

EDITORIALS

Media's sexual obsession ludicrous

Americans spend too much time thinking about sex.

That's not really all that bold of a statement. It's not a statement that's all that new, either. But it's true.

In just the past year, the editorial board has spent untold hours talking about sexual issues that are in the news. It's not what we want to do, but social demons like William Kennedy Smith, Clarence Thomas and Anita Hill, and now, Bill Clinton and old what's-her-name keep popping up, and we find ourselves forced to comment on it.

What's the point? Americans behave badly. Most of our forefathers left their home countries not for a better life, but for a place where they could do what they wanted when they wanted without some oppressive government telling them what to do or an all-empowering church poking holy noses in unholy business.

If as much TV time were spent on the "issues" as sex and improprieties, we would be the smartest of world citizens. Just think how polls would have reflected Clarence Thomas if Dan Rather or CNN or Maury Povich took the journalism profession as a profession, not as a money-maker or a place to gain ratings, and showed us just what it was he did as a judge. Everybody knows he might have harassed Anita Hill, but who the hell knows what he did as a judge?

George Bush gave us Willie Horton and the pledge of allegiance, and then he gave us a war and a deficit our great-great-great-great-great-great-great-great-great-great-great-great-great grandchildren will never see paid off.

The decline of America can be blamed on the media. More specifically, on television. There is no responsibility in a field that runs beer commercials with half-naked women and men right before a segment of "48 Hours" that deals with the problems of prostitution.

Programmers say that's what Americans want. More T&A. Bloody cop and robber shows. Tabloid TV. Infotainment. Infomercials.

Some will argue that television only reflects that which is society. Partly true. But many of the same folks will also argue that Americans are the stupidest people in the world. What choice do we have but to be ignorant when we get newspapers with pretty colors and space-eating graphics that say nothing except, "Here's a little something to keep your day more pleasant?" How informed can we be when we get television that shows us the nakedness and not the naked truth?

What Americans want is less hype, more hope. Give us some responsible reporting and responsible media forms, and we'll give you responsible behavior. That's the media's responsibility.

Campus community needs rape-prevention program

There's a lot of talk about rape everywhere you go, but not a lot is being done about rape at K-State.

Buzzwords like "social stigma" popularized by the media make it look like nothing can be done.

Law enforcement officials do just about everything they can about those rapes that are reported, but sometimes that doesn't add up to much.

Many women with a lot of courage but little confidence in the American judicial system may find themselves even more powerless after being raped.

Student Body President Jackie McClaskey is reviewing options for rape-prevention training for a freshman orientation class she plans to present to the University administration.

In its current embryonic form, McClaskey's proposal will be passed in front of every freshman entering K-State. This eventually will grandfather in every student at K-State.

While we wait for this, there are a number of things that can be done — right now.

First of all, we could all behave.

This idealistic claim is like wishing for a pony, yes, but it's a start.

Secondly, fraternities, sororities and dormitories can sponsor programs to show men and women how to prevent rape. These programs can be sponsored and be offered at a minimal cost. It will take dedicated and giving groups of individuals to get this done to stop rape at the source.

We hope there will be many suggestions for a rape-prevention program at K-State.

Give them to us. We'll print them. If you don't feel comfortable sending them to the Collegian, tell your adviser, your house or floor president, your University president.

Heck, call McClaskey. She'd be glad to hear from you, simply because she is trying to get something done about rape.

The sooner we act the better.

EDITORIAL CARTOON

Of Deer and Men

It was easy. Too easy. The squirrel didn't know, though. One little bread crumb after another was a free meal to him.

The crumbs led from the tree, across the sidewalk and to the park bench. As the little guy stuffed the last morsel in his mouth, he noticed the figure seated on the bench — ratty jeans and a baseball cap, reading a newspaper. Or so the squirrel thought.

With one motion, Jack threw the newspaper down and leveled the .410 at the walnut-sized head. A shot rang out, and the head shattered like a ripe melon.

Jack screamed in the open air:

"GOT YOU, YOU LITTLE BASTARD!"

Mark saw Jack only moments later on campus, weaving between sorority girls with two dead squirrels swinging from his hand. What was left of the two heads bounced together and sprayed blood, like a sick children's toy.

Jack was proud. He couldn't understand why the girls were avoiding him.

"Look at him," Jack said, "I blew the little bastard's head clean off."

"Jack," Mark said, "you can't go around killing the squirrels on campus. They're tame."

Jack already had plans, though. "I'll skin 'em and put the hides on my stereo speakers," he said, "Cool, huh?"

That night the two drove back home to the wheat tundra of south central Kansas. Jack slept as Mark sat behind the wheel. The Manhattan radio stations faded after a half hour, and nothing was left but static.

Now and then Mark could see the white tail of a deer, flashing in the darkness along the side of the interstate.

As a child, he had thought deer lay idle, waiting for a car to approach. When they saw lights approaching, they took a kamikaze leap into your grill. Revenge for the interstate. Other deer would linger only for a moment and see if your radiator was destroyed. Then they made their way back into the fields to praise the martyr.

Reality was all too sobering, though. The truth, Mark later learned, was that deer wandered from time to time to the interstate. They're a little puzzled when the field turns to asphalt, but it's worse when they see the headlights. It blinds them. They're paralyzed in their tracks until they're hit.

They made it home fine that night, though. Mark dropped Jack off at his parents' and went home. In the morning, he drove over to an old boss' house to see what was up. They decided to go for a drive.

Max, the old boss, seemed to have shrunk. He hunched over the wheel of the old truck as he drove the sand roads to the highway. When the two got to the asphalt, he only drove 30 mph. Eighteen-wheelers passed them with the fury of a storm.

As a kid, Mark had worked for old Max picking up hay. Max had known every road in the country and which property belonged to whom. Now, though, he got lost.

"Goddamnit," Max said, "Where the hell are we?"

TOM LISTER

He spit to the Folger's coffee can on the floorboard of the pickup and missed. The more he spit, the closer the mess came to Mark's feet. Mark edged closer to the door.

The town was going to hell, Max told him. Everyone was moving away, but those damn people from California kept moving in. They never worked, though — they just lived off the money they made from burning down their houses each year.

"Things aren't the same anymore," Max said.

They got back to the farm, which was littered with skeletons of barns and old trucks. Mark noticed Max still had the calendar from 1976 on his fridge.

As he left, he thanked Max for the ride and wondered how much longer the old man had to live.

Mark and Jack headed back to Manhattan Sunday afternoon. Mark's dad didn't have much to say. He was watching ultraviolence on the VCR when Mark left.

Jack slept again on the way back. Mark thought about the long drive ahead and messed with the radio.

The sun was going down, and the sky had taken on an orange-reddish hue. As Mark slowed down for a stop sign, he thought he saw something on the horizon. At first he couldn't make it out, but then it became clear: a crazy old man chasing down a crippled deer with a tire iron.

A Very Stately Affair

Being underwhelmed by the Super Bowl hype that seemingly persisted from about the middle of, oh, August, I decided to skip the big game last Sunday. Everyone tells me I didn't miss much.

Another Super Sunday slouch? Surely a blowout, no doubt.

Anyway, in the pursuit of something much more amusing, I called over that small circle of simians whom I vaguely refer to as 'friends' last Tuesday to watch something a little more exciting than The Game: The State of the Union address.

And hence it began.

Grunting and snarling and quaffing cereal malt liquor in vociferous amounts, my chums and I huddled around the big tube of life, waiting to pounce. Eager for the sageness of our country's leader to burst forth, George came through and cracked a few jokes, for all he was worth.

"Communism died this year," he spoke, as I downed another beer, being one wanting to indulge in all the good cheer. Congress rose to its flattened feet in applause because "... We've won the Cold War," but did anyone there ponder, or even stop to wonder, what it was really all for?

I think not, and 'tis no matter, for "America is finally free," Bush said, no doubt to get fatter. "Our policies are vindicated ... the world trusts us with power..." Yes, the U.S. of A. is still the nation of the hour.

JARED GREGOIRE

Pooh on those who say the American century is done. For our defense still kicks ass, our leaders have crass, and we really are creaming those Japanese who call themselves 'The Children of the Rising Sun.'

"The B-2 Bomber is dead," he continued, and we all breathed a genuine sigh of relief. Out came the chips and dip in our celebrations, and we marveled at his defense cut revelations and demonstrations, and gawked and drooled in disbelief. "Wowsers," pontificated my buddy Phil, as Bush slashed away warheads and Peacekeeper Missiles and other things still.

Then arose the subject we and he all feared: that dang economy and how everyone's getting smeared. Saying that cutting the deficit and an increase in consumer spending is "the right thing to do," it made us happy, even glad, that like a dad, old George sounded like Wilford Brimley in the oatmeal commercial ad.

We conceded the idea was fair in the short run, and even he admitted the job was far from done, that it had only just begun. Onward he went, asking "for congressional action right away," that partisan politics and notions make for wicked potions, and these motions make us all rats drowning in a sinking ship's cargo bay.

"Moratoriums on new legislation hampering growth ... incentives for first-time home buyers ... cutting capital gains tax ..." these changes spewed forth in a hurry and flurry, and my posse and me burped in agreement, especially little Murray. "It's all pretty necessary to get the ball rolling," said Mur, and we all nodded, while on the box Congress reared and cheered and applauded.

Then came the lists of his long-term economic plan, the political temple with its seven pillars created by The Man. World markets and education and investments and such, nailing crime and the deficit and oh, it was almost too much. "Give me the line-item veto!" he yelled like a man on fire, wanting to stop Congress from wallowing in its own mire. And that made me and my boys wince at the thing, for the president is the president, and certainly not a king.

Then he said, "We are still the hope of the world," and then the speech ended, both for the pleased and offended, and he strode shaking hands to the door. Though no verbal Abe Lincoln, he gave us the lean, if not the mean. But was what he said what he was really thinkin'? Well, that certainly remains to be seen.

LETTER

▶$10 BILLION LOAN TO ISRAEL NOT WORTH AMERICAN INVESTMENT

Editor,

U.S. law, specifically the U.S. Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 [sections 502B and 116(a)], sets important guidelines for the use of U.S. funds abroad.

The act stipulates that no U.S. aid shall be provided "to the government of any country which engages in a consistent pattern of gross violation of internationally recognized human rights, including torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, prolonged detention without charges, or other flagrant denial of the right of life, liberty and the security of person."

Despite the fact that Israel has been guilty of committing all the above mentioned abuses of human rights, particularly against the Palestinians in the occupied West Bank and Gaza, the U.S. foreign aid bill allocated $5.6 billion to Israel in 1991.

In per capita terms, every Israeli man, woman and child received a gift of $1,270 last year, when our country is suffering from an economic recession and significant number of our people are suffering from unemployment, hunger and lack of shelter and medical care.

This year, the government of Israel is asking not only for its annual $5.6-million aid package, but also for an additional $10 billion in loans.

The $10-billion loan scheme would put a grave new burden on American taxpayers. If Israel defaults, the United States will have to cover the debt plus all the administrative costs and interests.

Over the years, this could end up costing U.S. taxpayers as much as $117 billion. Given the disastrous condition of the Israeli economy, the chance of default is very high. Incidentally, the $10 billion is 400 times the legal limit of $25 million set by the U.S. government on loan guarantees to foreign countries.

Furthermore, the loan guarantees would accelerate the illegal Israeli policy of building settlements in the Occupied Territories, which Secretary of State James Baker calls the "biggest obstacle to peace" in the Middle East instead of building peace.

U.S. aid to Israel that funds the military occupation by Israel of Arab lands is not only inhuman and immoral, but it is also against the law of our country.

I urge all American citizens to write to their congressmen and senators, asking them to put America's interest first and to uphold the ideals of freedom and justice in the Middle East. This can be done by voting against the $10-billion Israeli loan guarantee scheme.

Sunflower State bragging rights on line Sunday at Bramlage

No. 20 Kansas hopes to snap string of bad luck in Manhattan

MARGO KELLER
Collegian

The intrastate rivalry continues Sunday at 1 p.m. in Bramlage Coliseum when the K-State Lady Cats play host to the University of Kansas Jayhawks.

A 4-point spread over Oklahoma State propelled Kansas to a 15-3 record Wednesday evening while K-State was handed a loss at Missouri.

Although the Lady Cats claim a 5-13 overall record, they are 2-3 in conference play and are fifth in Big Eight play. They have posted a .500 mark for games played during 1992, while Kansas has a league-leading 4-1 mark.

In addition, the Lady Hawks are ranked 20th in the nation by the Associated Press and USA Today polls. They lead the nation in scoring defense holding opponents to 53.3 points per game.

KU women's basketball coach Marian Washington said she was impressed with K-State's team determination and the outstanding effort given by senior Mary Jo Miller.

As for her own team, three starters have been plagued with season-ending injuries. Last week, senior forward Tanya Bonham and junior center Marthea McCloud suffered serious knee injuries. Junior center Lisa Tate also was sidelined by injuries.

"We have a few more wins, but we have been struggling also. We have had our own special challenges," Washington said.

Probable Jayhawk starters are freshman Angela Aycock, 6'2" forward, Terrilyn Johnson, 5'11" senior forward, senior Danielle Shareef, 5'10" center. Starting guards could be Kay Kay Hart, 5'7" senior and JoJo Witherspoon, 5'7" junior. Top players include Aycock averaging 9.6 points per game while Johnson has a 9.2 rebound average.

"We will not have a chance against them unless we do a better job on the boards. They had 66 boards against us last year and that cannot happen again," Yow said.

Motivation shouldn't be a problem for the Lady Cats.

"You don't need any preparation for the KU game as far as mentally because you come in ready," junior forward Leah Honeycutt said.

Tentative starters for K-State are Lynn Holzman, 5'11" sophomore forward; Leah Honeycutt, 5'10" junior forward; center Jennifer Grebing, 6'2" senior; Mary Jo Miller, 5'5" senior guard and Gretchen Bertrand, 5'9" sophomore guard.

"I hope that the game goes as it's being billed," Yow said. "I hope it's a great game and I hope that it goes down to the wire.

"I think it's going to be a really tough task for us in that Kansas is so much more athletic. For that reason, the equalizer in that is your defense. We will really have to come out and be really intense and have a tremendous amount of concentration. We will have to have fortitude at the defensive end to give us an opportunity to win the ballgame," Yow said.

INSIDE STUFF

Rivalry has always been a friendly one say coaches, players

MARGO KELLER
Collegian

The 22-year rivalry between the University of Kansas Jayhawks and the K-State Lady Cats has produced some exciting Big Eight Conference games.

The two Sunflower State women's basketball teams have played against each other in 58 games, with K-State holding a 37-21 edge. While K-State has chalked four of the last six wins, five of those wins were determined by 10 points or less.

"It's Kansas. We wouldn't care if they had a losing record. It wouldn't matter to us," head coach Susan Yow said.

At the onset of this season's meeting at Bramlage Coliseum, Kansas leads not only the conference, but is ranked 20th in the nation. Despite the unrelated records, the opportunity to play one another fuels the fire.

"It's a natural high for us because it's an in-state rivalry," Leah Honeycutt, junior forward, said. "I think every year, who was where in the Big Eight as far as KU, K-State standings, we always had a good game against each other. They were always close."

For the players the game is more than just another conference game.

"One thing for sure, the freshman are going to find out all about the rivalry," Mary Jo Miller, senior guard, said. "When I came in as a freshman, I didn't think anything of it. But once you get in that game you can feel it in the air."

Sophomore forward Lynn Holzman, got her first impressions of Big Eight basketball from watching a K-State-KU game.

"On my recruiting trip, I came to the KU game and there were 6,000 people in the stands. It was unbelievable. The way the team played in that game was one of the main reasons I came here," Holzman said.

The pairing is also a good attendance booster, according to Washington.

"It would be rare not be have some of our largest attendance games against K-State," Washington said. "It is one game where people are going to respond and they want to see that match up."

"It's Kansas. It's an intrastate rivalry. You're playing for all the people who support Kansas State University against all the people who support Kansas University . This is something that I've really enjoyed since I've been at Kansas State and in the Big Eight," Yow said. "I don't think it's a game that either coaching staff has to worry about motivation."

When the Lady Cats and Jayhawks squared off Jan. 30, last year, the contest went into overtime resulting in a 74-73 K-State win at Allen Fieldhouse. The second game at Bramlage provided a 73-64 win for the Lady Cats.

"The games last year were tough to lose, but I thought they were great games," Washington said. "The rivalry between the teams bears a positive overtone. Both are wanting to win. Most games as of late have been very good. That's what it's all about."

IT'S TIME TO PLAY BALL

Altman's crew faces must win situation against Buffs

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

Gotta have it.

It's Pepsi's new slogan, unveiled in countless commercials during the Super Bowl last Sunday.

It also happens to be the refrain of a little ditty being sung these days by nearly everyone involved with the K-State men's basketball program.

Saturday afternoon's game with Colorado in Bramlage Coliseum may be the biggest the Cats have played this season — or so say K-State players.

Cats coach Dana Altman

"We've got to win," said senior center Wylie Howard, who scored a career-high 22 points in Wednesday's win over UMKC in the final Cat non-conference game of the season. "We've got to turn things around, and this is where we have to start — at home."

K-State, 0-3 in the Big Eight and 10-6 overall, has been blown out in each of its conference defeats. The setbacks came by 38-, 41- and 26-point margins.

But whether the losses were by two points or 42, a loss is a loss is a loss, the players say. A win Saturday could be just the thing that gets the ball rolling in another direction.

"Colorado is a big game for us," said junior backup Trasel Rone. "We need to win in the league right now."

Yes, a sense of urgency is in the air.

Even Coach Dana Altman, who is normally very guarded in his emotions, gave an indication Wednesday night as to the importance of the game against the Buffs, scheduled for a 1 p.m. tip.

"This was a good win," he said following the game against the Kangaroos, "but right now we need to be thinking about Colorado."

With arch-rival Kansas on the schedule next, in another Big Monday appearance on ESPN, it would be easy for the Cats — players and coaches admit — to look by the Buffs and toward redemption in the eyes of a national viewing audience likely left laughing after the 38-point Oklahoma State debacle.

But Altman and his players, as late as Thursday, spoke as if the Kansas game was still weeks away.

Howard was the loudest — or the quietest, depending on your point of view.

"Kansas? We can't be worried about them," Howard laughed after the win over UMKC. "Colorado has to be the only team we're worrying about."

When Altman, Howard and crew look at Colorado, it's like looking in the mirror.

MARGARET CLARKIN/Collegian

UMKC's Ernesto Michel shoots over Deryl Cunningham during the second half of K-State's 72-53 home victory last Wednesday night. The Cats improved to 10-6 heading into Saturday's Colorado game.

"They're struggling just like we are," Altman said of the Buffs, who are 0-3 and 9-7.

Coach Joe Harrington and his team have an impressive, 11-point win over Georgia and a narrow, one-point home court defeat against nationally-ranked Kansas as their season highlights thus far.

History would appear to be on the side of the Cats in this one. The Buffs haven't won in Manhattan since 1964, a string of 27-straight home court wins by K-State. The Cats won a one-point thriller here last year.

The Buffs are led by freshman guard Donnie Boyce, who is leading CU in scoring and is eighth in the league at 15.5 points a contest.

Boyce, Harrington said, has been a pleasant surprise.

"I really didn't know what to expect," said Harrington, who like Altman is in his second season. "He played inside in high school. What I've been surprised most about is his continued improvement and ability to handle the ball and play in tough games.

"Against the good teams with the bigger crowds and the TV audiences, he has come through. He's really been a bright star for us."

Capriotti seeks new talent at Lincoln meet

McGrew, Teaberry among several left behind to nurse injuries

BRIAN ANDERSON
Collegian

Last year, the K-State track team competed without several of its top athletes at the Nebraska Triangular and both men and women teams finished second.

This year, the team will leave several members behind as it goes to Lincoln, Neb., for a triangular with the Nebraska Cornhuskers and Arkansas Razorbacks.

"We are leaving some injured people here so they will be ready down the road for the Big Eight Championship," said Coach John Capriotti.

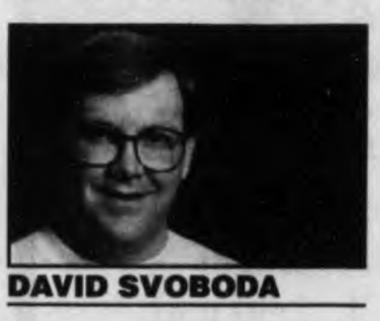
Capriotti mentioned that Connie Teaberry, Dante McGrew and Gwen Wentland are just a few of the athletes that will not participate at the Bob Devaney Sports Center in Lincoln.

McGrew, who won the triple jump in the Missouri Triangular, will be out because of an ankle injury; Wentland will be out due to leg problems, despite placing second in the high jump and fourth in the long jump last week; and Teaberry, last year's Big Eight indoor champion in the high jump, will sit out due to a knee injury.

Another reason Capriotti won't take a full team is that he would like to see how other people do in competition and is looking for improvements from others.

"I'm not worried about how many points we score as a team. I'm not sure if there will be a points awarded and I don't care if they do. I hope to see some good performances from our team, maybe some outstanding performances," Capriotti said. Capriotti sees both Nebraska and Arkansas as having one of the top track programs around the nation.

"Both teams have good depth and the quality of athletes are good," Capriotti said.



Nebraska's women's team beat out K-State women's team to win the Big Eight Indoor Championship last year, while their men's squad finished second in the championship.

After two meets, Capriotti has a few bright spots on his squad. He is happy his women sprinters, such as Debra Malone, who took first place in the 600-yard dash at Missouri last week; and Markeya Jones, who placed first in the 200 meters last week as well.

Also, he was pleased with his women jumpers like Dee Dee Tribue, who took first in triple jump and third in long jump in the Hearnes Fieldhouse at Columbia.

Baseball Cats will put on a show this year

DAVID SVOBODA

Two weeks from Saturday, life begins again.

Collegiate baseball is about to kick into high gear in these parts, and Coach Mike Clark's Wildcats remain one of the best-kept sports secrets at K-State.

When the Cats open their season with a three-game weekend series against Arkansas on Feb. 15 in Fayetteville, Ark., they'll do so as one of the few consistent athletic squads calling Manhattan home.

Since Clark arrived at K-State, his Wildcats have had five straight winning seasons. With all of the ups and downs experienced by the more visible sports in recent years, what Clark has done here is nothing short of remarkable.

Before Clark's arrival, K-State had not posted consecutive winning records on the diamond since 1981 and 1982. But since the winningest coach in school history first set foot on campus, the team has yet to end a season on the down side of the .500 mark.

Want to be impressed even further?

K-State's five-straight winning years under Clark mark the first time that feat has been accomplished since the 1937 to 1941 teams did it.

A possible first-team All-American is the shortstop. You've heard of the kid, haven't you?

His name is Craig Wilson, and you likely saw him on television this past summer, leading Team USA in hitting during the squad's bronze-medal finish at the Pan Am Games.

In tearing up the ball in Japan, Canada, Cuba and several American points in between, Wilson had a .349 batting average in the 30 games in which he played against solid international competition.

Wilson had a tough personal choice to make following his Pan Am experience: whether or not to return to K-State, with a contract offer from the San Francisco Giants on the table.

The Franklin Park, Ill., native — as is well documented by now — decided to remain in purple and white for his senior season.

Wilson was one of three players around whom Clark began building three years ago.

The other two are now under contract with professional franchises: third baseman/catcher Brad Rippelmeyer with Atlanta and first baseman/pitcher Chris Hmielewski with Montreal.

And though Rippelmeyer, Hmielewski, All-Big Eight pitcher Kent Hipp and current minor leaguers Scott Stroth and Van Torian have all been lost since the end of the 1991 season, there is reason to believe that Clark and Co. might just put a sixth-straight winner on the field in 1992.

If you believe in the old baseball adage that a team is only as strong as it is up the middle, K-State may be in good shape. With Wilson, you've got a cornerstone. With catcher Jeff Ryan, you've got the Cat version of the Rock of Gibraltar.

Ryan is the latest version — Dan Skala was the model before Ryan — of a Wildcat catcher who brings grit, determination and drive to the diamond every game.

Joining the talented Wilson and Ryan up the middle will be Scott McFall at second base and likely Jamey Stellino in centerfield.

McFall has put together the kind of success story most kids only dream about. From walk-on from a small town to starter at a Division I school. Solid might be the best way to describe his play.

Leftfielder Brian Culp has the ability to push Wilson for the title of best player on the squad. Just ask anyone who watched him tear up Alaska last summer.

Pitching admittedly is the team's biggest question mark, though there are several young guns ready to step in and at least a trio of veterans who have been heard from in years past who likely will be again.

This team is a nice blend of experience and youth, and that combination always leads to excitement.

With a home schedule that includes a pair of games against national power Wichita State, a return date against the Razorbacks and Big Eight series' against Oklahoma, Missouri and Iowa State, Frank Myers Field may be the place to be this spring.

Acrobats stop at Bramlage

JENNIFER BEALS
Collegian

At 7:30 tonight a new team will take the floor at Bramlage Coliseum for the first time.

Bramlage Coliseum is synonymous with high-intensity athletic teams. But this team won't be clad in shorts and dribbling a basketball, but they do wear their own special attire.

The Chinese Golden Dragon Acrobats are including a stop in Manhattan as part of their latest tour.

The acrobats are no strangers to the United States, or for that matter, the rest of the world.

"This is the sixth year the Chinese Golden Dragon Acrobats have toured the United States, but they have also traveled to West Germany, Israel and France," said Jan Sparks, general manager of the Chinese Golden Dragon Acrobats.

"The costumes of the acrobats are all beautifully handmade items from China and Taiwan," Sparks said.

UFM

Events generate funds for expansion

JOHN SHARTZER
Collegian

UFM did not die.

The program was nearly discontinued two years ago when the Student Senate Finance Committee recommended the body not allocate any money to the non-profit instructional organization.

Since then, UFM has managed to stay alive and to expand its program as well.

Traditionally funded through the student activity fee, the financial problems of the past have inspired the members of the program to focus on fund-raising events for added income.

"The University contributes about 35 percent, while student participation covers about 51 percent of our expenses," Linda Teener, UFM executive director, said.

The remainder of UFM's expenses are received through grants and fundraisers, Teener said.

"Linda is doing a great job with UFM and we are glad to have been a part the program," said Scott Truhlar, finance committee chairman and junior in pre-med.

Last spring, Senate allotted UFM $13,000 — the requested amount.

"The Senate's support of UFM varies with each appointed committee. Therefore, our continued support of the program next year cannot be answered until a committee can address the issue," Truhlar said.

Although a finance committee has not been appointed yet for this semester, Truhlar said he expects a committee to be in full-swing by the second week of February.

Truhlar said UFM is not a big concern on the committee's review list, as of now.

Nevertheless, Teener said she is excited about the program's future, especially its expansions.

The UFM also picked up some community swimming classes the University dropped from its curriculum this year.

"We've added about 90 classes to our program," she said

"We can offer less of one thing and do it better," he said.

Kenneth Klabunde, professor of chemistry and president of the Faculty Senate, said the likelihood of reallocating funds and the merging of programs and departments at K-State is fairly high for the future.

"We are currently going through the process so the University can present its role and aspirations statement to the board of regents," Klabunde said.

He said anticipated mergers and cost-cutting measures are the purpose of this exercise.

"I think it's important for the faculty to have a considerable influence of the document to be presented," he said. "A fair input is important."

While money coming in has not increased, Klabunde said, enrollment figures have, and the University continues to face a dilemma.

"As a faculty, we are overburdened, and the money is scarce," he said. "We have more students than we can teach."

Struve agreed that money is scarce.

"Adequately funding a university will be a constant challenge," he said.

Some people have suggested a restrictive admissions policy could be a way to solve some of these problems.

"For salvation and economic matters, qualified admissions is imperative," Bogina said.

Bogina said that with qualified admissions, the school systems will be forced to work harder to meet a certain criteria.

"There is an increase of freshmen not becoming seniors in the universities, which is costing a lot of money," he said.

"During their stay, the universities must accommodate them, and then they leave. The services provided for them could be spent in other areas."

Klabunde said he believes most of K-State's faculty and the regents support the qualified admissions rule, but he said it should be carefully considered.

"In the long run, it could be helpful. But there must be guaranteed funding, because right now we have an increased enrollment of 5,000 students and received no money for the increase," he said.

"It would be a double blow to receive a decrease in funding for a lowered enrollment."

Rabies cases increase in '92

TODD FEEBACK/Collegian

Pets should be vaccinated by vet, especially cats

LISA TINNIN
Collegian

Rabies is rearing its ugly head in the Riley County area.

In January 1992, there were 22 confirmed rabies cases reported in Kansas compared to three in January 1991. Of the 22 cases, three are from Riley County.

"The northeast section of Kansas is the problem area," said Dr. Deborah Briggs, assistant professor at K-State's veterinary diagnostic lab.

Briggs said rabies runs in 5-to-7-year cycles.

"Because of the warmer weather, animals are out instead of hibernating. When the skunk population goes up, rabies cases go up," she said.

To help curb rabies and protect pets, the Konza Veterinary Clinic held a vaccination clinic Saturday in Zeandale. A steady flow of pet owners brought in their dogs and cats from 10 a.m. to noon for the vaccination.

Deb Mangelsdorf, veterinarian at the Konza Vet Clinic, administered the shots. Each animal was given a shot in the hind leg. Some took it better than others, depending on the animal's threshold of pain.

The Zeandale clinic gave 53 vaccinations Saturday, much more than the 20-30 that were expected. The shots cost $10 for a one-year vaccination and $12.50 for a three-year.

The clinic was to urge pet owners to get their pets vaccinated against rabies.

"Its basis is on a public health concern because rabies is such a risk. It's a health threat," Mangelsdorf said. "All pets should be examined by a vet."

Wayne and Twyla Roesener, Zeandale residents, brought in their three dogs for vaccination shots. The scare of rabies and the fact that a rabid skunk had been found a few weeks ago was enough motivation to bring in the dogs.

"We don't want some child to get bit by a rabid dog," Twyla Roesener said.

Briggs said three humans died from rabies last year.

"Humans feel pain and itch at the site of the bite which will continue and progresses into paralysis," she said. "The victim falls into a coma and eventually dies."

Briggs said there is an excellent vaccination in the United States, however, and with early treatment, humans who have contracted rabies will live.

Briggs said the virus takes a long time to reach the brain from the site

ACADEMICS

RTV students receive few benefits from regents center

AMY COX
Collegian

Dole Hall's Studio B is a state-of-the-art studio minus the equipment.

"As far as I know, Studio B is just sitting over there empty," said Carol Oukrop, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications.

The high-tech studio in Dole Hall could provide hands-on experience for advanced radio and television students, if they could furnish it. When Dole Hall was financed by a federal grant of $5.9 million more than two years ago, the RTV department counted on being able to finance the equipment for Studio B for teaching purposes.

The building cost about $4 million. About $2 million was spent on video equipment for the Broadcasting Education and Communications Center in Dole Hall, said Mel Chastain, director of the Broadcasting Education and Communications Center in Dole Hall.

Dole Hall's primary purpose is to be a communications center for the Kansas Board of Regents.

"We are here primarily to serve Regents customers first, but we try to make equipment available to K-State students free of charge when it doesn't conflict with the regents," Chastain said.

In fact, Video 1 and 2 students have use of the fully equipped Studio A when it isn't in use. But, as the Communications Center's schedule fills up, that may not last.

The RTV department is given use of the studio, a control room and faculty offices through a "good faith arrangement," Chastain said.

The future of the arrangement, however, can't be predicted, he said.

"We hope they get the kind of grants they need to be able to furnish the studio," Chastain said, "Our relationship with them has been a good one. It's to our advantage to keep Video 1 and 2 students here. It gives us an excellent pool of interns."

Oukrop said the Communications Center has been very cooperative, but as Studio A gets busier and busier, she sees a potential problem with scheduling video classes there.

And that doesn't leave RTV students many options.

Geoff Pierce, junior in radio and television, said he worries about getting experience on the kind of equipment he needs.

"They are not on-line full time, that's why they have time for us now," he said, "When we don't have Dole Hall, we are left with an editing suite in McCain where faculty members have to come in at night to supervise because we can't use it during the day."

"I can't get the experience I need on the video side. We tried to film a TV show pilot with the cameras in McCain, and one of the three cameras didn't even work."

Some of the journalism and mass communications faculty are just as frustrated as the students.

"They have everything we need over there if we could just use it, or afford it," said Tom Grimes, Ross Beach professor of communications.

"I understand their (Dole Hall) need to charge user fees. That is expensive equipment that quickly becomes obsolete. The cost of maintaining and replacing it is high. But I teach Advanced Electronic News Reporting, and I have to change the emphasis to radio because all I have access to is camcorders on the video side. For radio we have KSDB-92."

Chastain agreed the non-profit building charges user fees were to maintain the equipment and pay salaries and wages.

The are three user-fee rates. The Regents rate is for any Regents institution and has the lowest rate. The non-Regents rate is for any public agency and is slightly higher. The general public rate is deliberately set to be equal to commercially available rates.

He said the general public rate is determined by averaging the commercial rates in a three-state area, including Kansas.

Grimes said K-State is the only great university whose journalism and mass communications college doesn't have the equipment to deliver a credible news product.

"KU, University of Texas, University of Missouri, University of Nebraska, University of Oklahoma — they all do," he said.

"I need to graduate students who can graduate on Monday and step into a TV job on Tuesday and produce a product. My dream is to have a TV news facility here to train people for news TV so they can do that."

The only way to realize that dream is through a grant, Oukrop said, but that's not the way it should be.

KANSAS POLITICS

Legislators split on Stephan

Local lawmakers disagree on question of attorney general's pre-trial resignation

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Collegian

Local legislators agree Kansas Attorney General Bob Stephan should be considered innocent until proven guilty, but they differ along party lines on whether he should resign.

Stephan was recently indicted by a federal grand jury for two counts of perjury and one count of conspiracy to commit perjury in a breach of contract case involving a former clerk in his office.

Stephan is accused of lying under oath during depositions in 1986 and 1987 and in court testimony in 1988. His testimony was in connection with a sexual harassment charge against him.

Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said Kansans would be treading on dangerous ground if they forced the resignation of a public servant based on a criminal case that has not been decided.

"He says he's innocent. Unless he knows himself to be guilty, he has an obligation to stay in office until the case is resolved," Glasscock said.

"We should allow the court to run its course, and if he's found guilty, he's a goner."

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, however, said Stephan should resign either way.

"If he is found guilty, he'll be out of a job. But if he is found innocent, that just means no fine and no jail sentence. It doesn't mean he gets to maintain the office of attorney general," she said.

"As attorney general, he's been great. But that being said, as the top-ranking lawyer in the state, he needs to get out of there," she said. "It's embarrassing to the profession."

FEDERAL BUDGET

Officals confident on funding

Allocations save Throckmorton, agriculture programs

TAD MUSSELWHITE
CHRISTINE VENDEL
Collegian

K-State officials are not worried about President Bush's proposed budget cuts that could eliminate some agriculture programs and the construction of an addition to Throckmorton Hall.

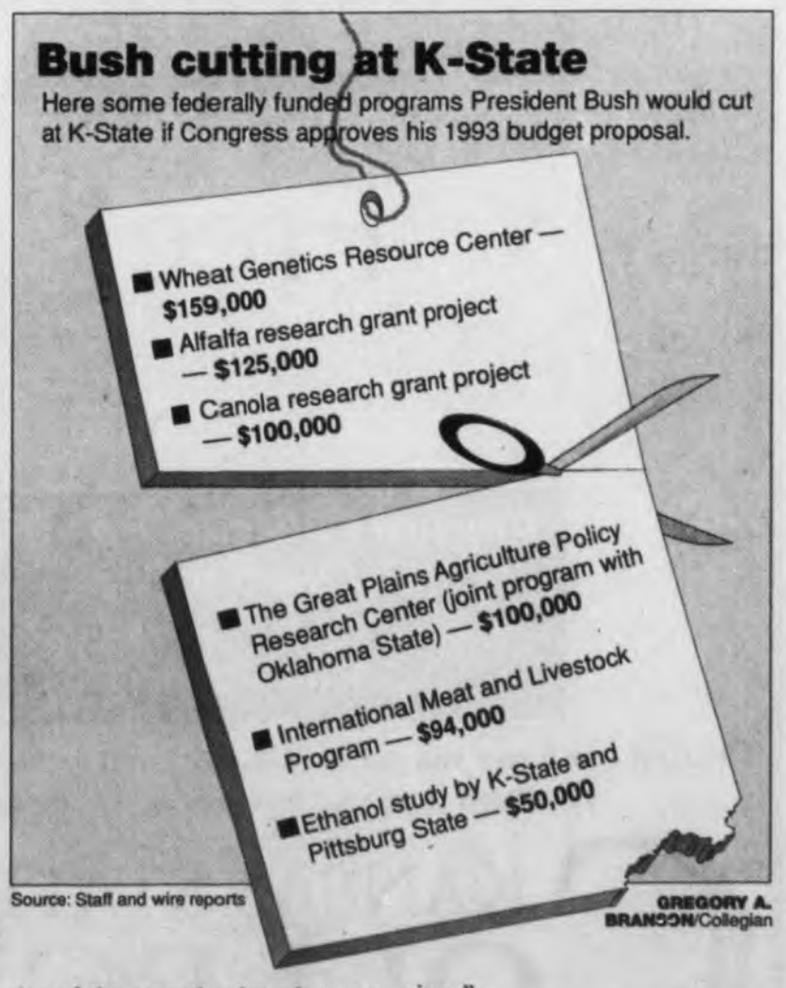
Sue Peterson, assistant to President Jon Wefald for government relations, said even though Bush proposed the cuts, Congress will have to thoroughly examine his proposal.

"Congress has already approved the money to go to the universities and would have to revote on the issue," she said.

"At this point, we are concerned and watching the developments, but we are not too worried about not getting the money."

Congress has already allocated funds this year for water projects, agriculture research grants and construction of buildings at universities nationwide, which includes the funding for the Throckmorton addition.

In order for the president's cuts to become a reality, Congress would have to agree with Bush, which Peterson said is exceedingly unlikely.



Walter Woods, dean of the College of Agriculture, said he agreed.

"You have to understand as you look at his recommendation that this has been an on-going recommendation of the executive branch to not fund programs like this," he said.

"But Congress has looked at it each time and made different decisions."

Woods said there is another reason K-State should not be too concerned

▶PARKS DIES OF LUNG DISEASE

LA JOLLA, Calif. (AP) — Bert Parks, former emcee of the Miss America Pagent, died in a hospital bed from inoperable lung disease Sunday. He was 77.

Parks was famous for singing "There She Is" at the pagents and for having the lead role in the stage version of "The Music Man."

▶TYSON TRIAL TO CONTINUE

INDIANAPOLIS (AP) — Prosecutors are expected to wrap-up their case against Mike Tyson today. Tyson is accused of raping an 18-year-old Miss Black America contestant.

▶LEEWAY GIVEN TO ISRAELI ARMY WHEN OPENING FIRE

JERUSALEM (AP) — Following an increase in shooting attacks in the occupied territories, the Israeli army annouced Sunday that soldiers were being given more leeway to open fire.

Former standing orders required soldiers to shoot a warning shot first, then followed by a shot at the legs. Then soldiers could shoot at the body. The army declined to elaborate exactly what the new orders allowed.

Residents watching pennies in recession

Manhattan residents are using their brains instead of their scissors to combat the national recession, one local grocer says.

Coupon use at the Westloop Dillons is less than usual, Store Manager Pete Peterson said.

"More people are watching their pennies and buying house-brand products instead of name brands," he said.

He also said even when Dillons stores offer double coupons, generic brands may still be less expensive than the name brands.

People are now looking at the price of products, Peterson said.

John Wurtenberger, senior in electrical engineering, said he looks for name brands on sale when he shops.

He said he also uses coupons, although he is not sure how much money he actually saves.

"Why not save 20 cents for tearing a page? In the long run, maybe I can buy an extra beer," Wurtenberger said.

Jennifer Katz, senior in psychology, said she only clips coupons on items she knows she will buy. She said that if she clips them for products she might buy, she buys things she does not need and will not use.

Although people seem to be shopping smarter, Jarvin Emerson, professor of economics, said employment in the area is up, while employment in the rest of the country is down, and personal income has grown faster than the national average.

"Kansas has not dropped into what could be classified as a recession," he said.

Aside from the recession, another reason for lower coupon usage may be expiration dates.

Manufacturers now give consumers less time to use their coupons, and they may expire before people can use them, Peterson said.

Some Manhattan residents also said they value their time more than they value the money they save from coupon use.

Roger Burns, Manhattan resident, said he does not have the time to clip coupons, although he comes from a family that uses them religiously.

Bakers concoct sweet treats during AIB seminar

CHRISTOPHER ASSAF/Collegian

SARA JAAX
Collegian

International bakers and dessert lovers concocted sweet treats last week in Manhattan at the American Institute of Baking Gourmet Cookie Production seminar.

Brian Strouts, AIB biscuit products manager and K-State bakery science graduate, said the week-long seminar involved a lot of sugar, eggs, butter and chocolate.

Seminar participants from countries as far away as Sri Lanka learned delicate points of gourmet cookie baking, such as correct uses of chemical leavening agents, oils, sweeteners and cocoa.

Strouts said the 17 participants developed and baked their own versions of more than 20 varieties of cookies, such as chocolate chip, oatmeal raisin and sandwich cookies, in the AIB bake shops.

"Baking is really both a science and an art," he said. "We cover science in the mornings, like functions of ingredients, and cover art by baking in the afternoons."

The AIB directs the gourmet seminar to private baking company owners or upscale divisions of large cookie companies, Strouts said.

Most participants attend as employees of baking companies, but AIB seminars are also open to the public.

Anne-Marie Yip Choy of Westmoorings, Trinidad, said she attended the seminar because of her own interest in baking.

"I didn't know how cookies baked before," she said while mixing chocolate chips into cookie dough.

"My baking was trial and error. But now I know about shortenings and how the ingredients work."

Other participants also said there is much to know about baking.

"You learn a lot, a lot of things about baking," said Stephanie Combs, who works in research for Bama Pie company of Tulsa, Okla.

"Before, I was just mixing according to recipes. Now I understand what goes on in baking."

The AIB, a non-profit organization, provides more than 80 food production seminars each year, Strouts said.

Last week, the institute conducted a basic food plant sanitation course for about 100 participants and also lead a seminar in Seattle about baking techniques and quality control.

Strouts said the AIB biscuit research staff presents seminars about six weeks a year and spends the remaining time experimenting with baking techniques and ingredients for companies that are developing new products.

In Manhattan, research seminars may involve baking techniques for breads, cookies or crackers.

Modern-day obstructions prevent use of observatory

RICHARD ANDRADE
Collegian

It's probably safe to say the K-State observatory has seen better days — and nights.

A victim of modernization and circumstance, the observatory, located on top of Cardwell Hall, is now used only sparingly.

Mick O'Shea, associate professor of physics and adviser of the K-State Astronomy Club, said the most important factor that inhibits full use of the observatory is the addition of lights south of Cardwell.

"The light situation renders the observatory unusable for research," O'Shea said.

He said even though K-State has never had a formal astronomy research program, the observatory was once used for private research by University professors.

"According to logs, it had been quite extensively used up until the early Eighties," Barry Adams, director of undergraduate laboratories said.

"It is an excellent telescope. Located outside the area, it would be capable of doing some fairly good research."

The power of a telescope is primarily measured by the diameter of its mirror. The Cardwell telescope measures 18.5 inches in diameter and is moderately powerful, O'Shea said.

Currently, the observatory is used by the astronomy club and for occasional public shows.

"We do things for Parents' Weekend, All-University Open House, and about once a month, it's open for the public," Adams said.

O'Shea said that for public presentations, the telescope is often focused on primary objects, such as Saturn's rings or Jupiter's moons, because they are the easiest to see.

Cardwell Hall was completed in 1963 at a cost of about $3 million. It housed one of the nation's top physics laboratories and a planetarium. The observatory was added a few years later.

"We use the planetarium more often than the observatory," said Geoff Habiger, junior in geology and Astronomy Club president.

He said the club used the telescope only twice last semester, and he said he doesn't expect usage to increase.

"It's not the best place to stick a telescope," Habiger said.

Disability legislation describes responsibilities

Committee formed to review compliance with law

MATTHEW CUNNINGHAM
Collegian

A presidential committee has been set up to look at K-State's compliance with federal disability legislation.

The committee will meet at 7 p.m. Tuesday in Union 212.

Ronald Downey, director of educational research and co-chairman of the Presidential Institutional Self-Study Committee, said the meeting is to help the committee conduct the study properly.

"The meeting is open to ask individuals with disabilities or individuals who have concerns at K-State to come give input," Downey said.

Gretchen Holden, director of services for students with physical limitations and committee member, said the committee was set up to look at what K-State is doing to comply with the Americans with Disabilities Act.

Holden said the act is an expansion of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, which required all agencies receiving federal funding to give people with disabilities equal access.

"The act brings private enterprise under the same requirements," said Dorothy Thompson, associate University attorney.

Downey said there are two parts to the act that will affect K-State.

He said the first is ensuring equal employment opportunities by evaluating jobs and seeing where accommodations can be made.

The second part is to make sure facilities are adequate for students with disabilities, he said.

Since K-State receives federal funding, the University has been required to accommodate the disabled since 1973. Holden said the University has been doing this in a systematic fashion since.

Act will influence all aspects of society, details duties of private, public sector

ROB DE CORTIE
Collegian

The consequences of the Americans With Disabilities Act, which took effect Jan. 26, will not be limited to the estimated 43 million Americans with disabilities. It will influence all aspects of society, from theaters and restaurants to doctors' offices and universities.

The new federal law describes in detail the responsibilities of the private and public sector toward the handicapped.

Gretchen Holden, who works at the Services for Students with Physical Limitations at K-State, said the act may have a greater impact on society than any other single piece of legislation in the past.

"I think that is quite possibly true," Holden said. "The act is a true civil rights bill for physically limited individuals."

The purpose of the new act is "to provide a clear and comprehensive national mandate for the elimination of discrimination against individuals with disabilities."

Under terms of the Americans with Disabilities Act, the regulation concerning disabled people is divided into four sections: employment, public services and transportation, public accommodations, and telecommunications. The first phase of the act deals primarily with the accessibility of public accommodation.

Businesses that benefit the handicapped in any of the described sections can get tax credits and deductions. Businesses that are unwilling to make changes will face lawsuits or fines.

"This law has big teeth," Holden said. "The first fine for noncompliance is $50,000, and the second is $100,000. I don't need to stress that is the only reason the University is getting seriously mobilized, because I think there is a sincere desire to comply with the spirit of this law, as well as with the letter of the law. But there is no doubt about it: those kind of teeth do get people looking pretty seriously at the legislation."

Terry Waldo's Gotham City Band

Friday, February 14, 8 p.m.

Make Valentine's Day special with a concert of hot jazz, songs, and dances from the Roaring Twenties. Witty and widely-recorded Terry Waldo leads a masterful tribute to Jelly Roll Morton, the legendary New Orleans pianist, hustler, pool shark, and self-proclaimed inventor of jazz. Gotham City played an unprecedented two months in Michael's Pub in New York, winning raves from Time and Variety. Guest artists include singer Ruth Brisbane and "eccentric" dance specialist Betsy Baytos, who'll teach you the Charleston and conduct a dance contest.

"A perfect combination of authenticity and affection that makes this gig truly celebratory of Morton and the spirit of New Orleans jazz. (Newark Star-Ledger)

CAUCUS INSTEAD OF PRIMARY?
Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, is trying to end presidential primaries in Kansas this year and instead have a caucus. You can call Oleen at her office in Topeka, (913) 296-7360 to voice your concerns.

EDITORIALS

Kansas primary ensures democracy

Kansas's presidential primary is in jeopardy, and so is democracy.

There is an effort in the state Legislature to kill the primary because it costs too much money — $1.5 million to be exact — and the fact that Kansas's results do not have much effect nationally.

The arguments against a primary seem logical and strong, but the reasons to have one, however, are stronger.

Yes, elections are expensive and messy, but it is the price we have to pay.

Democracy and the power of the people are the heart of America. As House Majority Leader Tom Sawyer put it, "If we lived in a dictatorship, we wouldn't have to worry about elections."

If saving money were the government's only motivation, why not get rid of trial by jury? Now that would save some money.

And the fact that Kansas may not change the outcome of who sits in the White House come next term is no reason to tell everyone in the state they have no voice.

If that were the case, why not let only California and New York vote? Hey, that would save even more money.

Part of the reason Kansas's primary results do not carry that much weight is because it is scheduled so late in the season. This could be mitigated by scheduling future primaries earlier.

Kansas's primary may not be perfect and may be painful, but it should not be repealed. It gives the people the opportunity to vote and increases participation in the political process.

Citizens have the freedom to vote. And unless they use it, it may be limited, or even worse, eliminated.

Campus of the future depends on actions of today

Last week, the Collegian ran a series of stories titled "K-State 2001."

And, guess what? There's no light at the end of the tunnel.

The K-State of 2001 will look a lot like the K-State of 1992.

The money shortage of the future will be a lot like the money shortage of today.

Professors who are overworked and underpaid now shouldn't start looking to pick up an expensive hobby to fill their free time — teaching will still be a tough and thankless profession.

We'll get less education, but we'll have to pay more for it, one budget director said. It doesn't take a genius to figure that statement out.

Restricted admissions is the answer, one state senator said. Oh, yeah, that's it. While promising to stay true to our land-grant mission, we'll turn away the very people we've pledged to educate.

So, one of the things made clear is that in 2001, not everyone who wants to go to college will. And those who will be lucky enough to go will have to spend an arm and a leg, instead of just the one limb we pay now.

A lot of things will have to happen in the next nine years to keep this boat from sinking.

Our federal and state governments will have to put their money where their mouth is when they call themselves things like "the governor for the little people," and the "education president."

Bright, hard-working educators will have to continue to stick it out, waiting for things to get better.

Realizing that education is the key to our future, students and citizens will have to be more and more relentless in demanding what they and their children deserve — a good education for a reasonable price.

It's hard to place the blame here. But clearly our governor, Legislature and administration are the big players in the game for K-State.

They have a lot of plans and a lot of dreams. And there's a lot of people counting on them to make our future a better place.

Let's just hope they don't drop the ball today.

Courteous drivers abound in the country

While you're driving, you feel older. This is true in cities — weaving through downtown traffic, perhaps during rush hour, your place in society seems secure. When you started driving, early in high school, you'd drive for hours all over the city. You'd drive to the city limits, down the alley behind the supermarket, down to the river with a beer smuggled from your folks' fridge.

If there was a road, you knew it. You became aware of the world outside your neighborhood — the bars your uncles talked about, the shopping center you once knew only through commercials, the poor section, the ritzy section, the house that gorgeous cheerleader lived in, the mayor's house, the mayor's church. A rush of knowledge came the month you got your license. You felt older, wiser. You were an expert.

It's different on back roads. One fencepost is only mildly different from the next one, while in the city, a three-mile drive may require endless left turns across traffic.

The same distance in the country won't twist and convolute; just a straight drive, the path of least resistance. Rural roads are on a predictable grid, just as is the routine of rural driving. Slow down going up hills you can't see over, since there won't be enough room for two trucks at the top.

Also, keep your foot near the brake in case a deer or the Bergson's dog jumps out of the ditch. Know the roads that are washed out during big summer thunderstorms. When there's more grass on the road than gravel, you may have wandered onto a pasture. Watch for free-ranging cattle.

ED SKOOG

Most important, though, is to return the salute.

One index finger is adequate, slightly but perceptibly raised from the rest of the hand, which ought to rest on top of the steering wheel.

The other hand should be kept free to do other things: hold the coffee thermos, hold the beer, change the radio station, pick your nose, pull yer baby close and so forth.

Scenario: A car and a truck meet on a numbered road in the afternoon. From 200 feet away, the pickup driver can tell he won't know the driver of the car.

At 100 feet, his brain sends a signal down his neck, through his left arm and into the nerves of his hand.

At 50 feet, his index finger lifts. The lady in the blue Subaru responds in kind. They establish brief eye contact, and drive on feeling proper and good.

Scenario: Same place, same vehicles. At 200 feet, the pickup driver recognizes the driver of the car. He has loved her since third grade and tried to hang himself a year ago when she married this guy he works with.

At 100 feet, the Subaru driver recognizes the man she wanted to marry, but who she never could seem to impress.

At 50 feet, their left index fingers lift, and they establish brief eye contact. They and their unrequited love both grow old and die.

Scenario: At twilight out by the Star-Land Steak House, two Dodge Coronets are about to pass each other. The cars are driven by two sisters, former bridge partners. The east-bound sister played a bad card a week ago, a 70-cent error.

As they pass, the east-bounder salutes her sister. The west-bound sister says later that the sunset glare affected her eyesight, and she couldn't see anything past her own nose. For the rest of their lives, they will be civil to each other, but they'll never play bridge together again.

This last scenario describes what in urban manners was once called the cut direct.

If you're at a fancy party, and you want to let a suitor know you're displeased with the brash color of his cummerbund, you may refuse to acknowledge his presence. If he talks to you at the punchbowl, you have every right to fill your cup and leave him babbling to the air.

But don't try this on the road. Tuxedoed debutantes have neither the charging nor the ramming power of a Chevy S-10.

If your driving experience is limited to avenues and cul-de-sacs, you may not be aware of how thin the shoulders of most gravel roads are.

A salute is a toast without a drink. If you don't return a toast, it's an insult, and you might get socked.

This is true on back roads. A rebuff can result in serious injury far from hospital assistance, outside the 911-dialing range.

In high school, when you got stuck on the lawn of the governor's mansion, there were people around who were glad to help you out and make sure you were all right.

But if your Buick skids into a ditch because you gave a hog farmer the cut direct, no one may be around for hours, even days. You could rot on some of these roads. This is not a game.

Gives you something to think about, anyway.

▶EDITORIAL MISSES THE FACTS

Editor,

After reading the editorial ("Roe v. Wade") in the Jan. 24 Collegian, I had to ask if the writer had forgotten to use his brain, or just never possessed one.

Concerning the slave issue, the "legislative compromises" allowed for the institution of slavery to remain intact. The Dred Scott case affirmed the popularity of the idea (in the South, at least) that slaves were property and could be bought, sold and willed to heirs after the death of their owner.

The Dred Scott case was only a part of the events leading to the Civil War, but it does serve as a reminder of two things that apply equally well today.

First, the decisions of the Supreme Court are certainly not above reproach.

Second, whether or not a person believes the court was correct in any decision depends upon his or her individual ideólogy. The slave owners of the South thought the Dred Scott decision upheld their own rights to own property.

In the same way, those who believe a woman's right to "control" her body overrides the rights of the life within her to live believe Roe v. Wade was a legitimate decision.

To those who believe killing the unborn is wrong, Roe v. Wade is a gross injustice, just as those who sought equal rights for slaves believed the Dred Scott case was wrong.

Contrary to your understanding of the Bill of Rights, it does not guarantee that a person may define and live by his own view of "morality."

In fact, most of our laws were written to protect the public from those with a warped idea of morality.

If a man believes it is OK to have sex with his daughter, does he have a constitutional "right" to do so? What about child molesters? Only abortionists believe that children are not entitled to protection under the Constitution.

As for your accusations against a "vocal minority," perhaps you should engage your brain before using your typewriter.

In a February 1991 poll by the Gallup organization, Americans disapproved of abortion by margins of 66-88 percent for the reasons it is performed more than 95 percent of the time. Only in cases of rape, incest and danger to the mother's life is there a clear majority in favor of abortion.

Most of the questions asked by abortion advocates are simply worded too broadly to provide an accurate picture of how people feel.

In a Los Angeles Times poll cited in Time magazine July 9, 1990, it was found that 61 percent of those interviewed said abortion is morally wrong, and 57 percent believe it is murder, yet 51 percent think the woman should decide. (Ha, some majority!)

The issue is a hard one to solve and made even harder by your irresponsible misrepresenting of the facts to advance your own ideology. The next time you tackle this issue, try some rational thought beforehand.

▶UNIVERSITY A BIT OVERANXIOUS IN SHUTTING DOWN HOT DOG MAN

Editor,

What is this world coming to? Have we completely lost control of our senses? I've had enough and have to speak my mind about the heinous act that took place Jan. 27 as depicted on the front page of the Collegian.

I am, of course, referring to the practice of preventing the free distribution of hot dogs on campus.

As most of you know, Matt Schindler, sophomore in English education, out of the goodness of his heart, attempted to spread good will toward his fellow man by dispensing free wieners to students and passersby near the K-State Union Plaza.

But the University administration, in all its wisdom, as represented by Diane Novak, decided to put the kibosh on this diabolical deed.

No sir, we can't have people running around being nice to each other. This just won't do! Before you know it, the whole University is being nice to each other. Then that spreads until the whole world is practicing random acts of kindness toward each other. There goes the defense industry and our economy out the window.

Perhaps the University is worried that all this free food will send the Union Stateroom into an economic tailspin. On the other hand, maybe the University and its conservative officials feel threatened by the thought of young men so freely offering wieners to all those interested. What a Freudian dilemma this must be.

And what is the "official" University explanation for preventing the distribution of these porcine delights? We must not allow the cooking and handling of food on campus without a permit. (I suppose this woman raids lemonade stands during intersession.)

Well, I for one do not accept this fascist dogma. (I wouldn't even accept it as liberal catma for that matter). We have to unite against this tyrannical repression. Let the Samaritans of campus rise up against the narrow-minded officials who stand on their hind legs, fighting the restraints of leash and collar, lashing out and stifling acts of good will.

Editor,

Since anarchy is running rampant on campus, I am so thankful there is someone out there cracking down on all of K-State's wienie vendors! I will be able to sleep a little more peacefully tonight.

Warm weather welcomed; cold to return

CHRISTOPHER T. ASSAF/Collegian

Getting some sun

During the warm weather Friday, Paul Lavery, senior in journalism and mass communications, catches a few rays on a deck at the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity house.

High temperatures bring many outside to frolic in sunshine

PAM FRAHM
Collegian

High temperatures for late January and early February average in the upper 30s. For the past few weeks, however, daily highs have consistently been in the 50s, with many days above 60 degrees.

According to the National Weather Service, the high temperature in Manhattan on Saturday was 75 degrees, and Sunday followed with a high of 71.

Many students were seen making the most of the warm weather by spending time outdoors studying, getting exercise or just lying around.

Leigh Hinthorn, senior in marketing, said she and her roommate took advantage of the high temperatures and got some exercise at the same time.

"We went to play tennis, because it was too nice to stay inside. After we played tennis, we went out to the lake and hiked around," she said.

Ken Labas, science and operations officer for the National Weather Service in Topeka, said "there's nothing you can put your finger on" to explain the warm weather.

"During the past few weeks, we've been in a weather pattern that's been rather quiet," Labas said.

Winds and cold air that normally blow over the middle part of the country this time of year have been sidetracked into Canada.

The lack of snow on the ground and the position of the sun higher in the sky account for most of the temperature increase.

Labas said the unseasonable temperatures have also been caused by the warming of the air from the Rocky Mountains. The low and middle levels of air coming from the west have been warmer than normal.

The near-record temperatures are not expected to last through the week, however.

"Temperatures are so far out of whack that it won't take much to knock them down," Labas said.

Domestic issues debated

Democratic presidential hopefuls attack Bush, each other to gain in polls

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Collegian

In anticipation of the crucial New Hampshire primary, Democratic presidential hopefuls tried to define themselves during a nationally televised debate Friday night.

The five leading democratic candidates met for the debate in Manchester, N.H., less than three weeks before the state's presidential preference primary day.

Discussion focused on economic and domestic issues with each candidate describing his plans if elected to the White House.

In the process, President Bush and his State of the Union address were attacked by all the candidates.

Former Sen. Paul Tsongas of Massachusetts said Bush's health-care proposal was an outrage.

"He just wanted to say something about health care," he said. "The cynicism is outrageous."

Tsongas joined other candidates in attacking Bush's character. He said Bush has no core.

"There is nothing he wouldn't sabotage for personal gain," Tsongas said.

There were also several heated exchanges among the group of candidates.

An unusual change, candidates took aim at Tsongas, who is doing well in New Hampshire polls.

"I've moved up in the polls, and now I'm Darth Vader," Tsongas said.

Tsongas, who portrayed himself as economically realistic, said he wanted to rescue the country by getting people jobs.

He criticized fellow candidates Sen. Bob Kerrey of Nebraska and Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton for offering tax cuts that are popular politics, but "not responsible.

"I'm not running to be Santa Claus," he said.

Tsongas said Kerrey's tax plan would save taxpayers a mere 97 cents a day.

"I have the same tax you do. The difference is, I want to give people a job, not hand them $1," he said. "We can have a $30-billion tax cut to the middle class or $30 billion to build an engine to drive this economy."

Clinton, who is leading in the polls, defended his middle-class tax cut and said he wanted to shift the tax burden to the wealthy.

"The thing that bothers me is not that people make money. The thing that bothers me is the way people made money in the 1980s by pushing paper and laying off workers," he said.

In addition to a middle-class tax cut, Clinton suggested speeding up the highway plan and a capital gains tax for those who create new jobs.

Clinton was the only candidate to mention higher education. He recommended $8 billion be put in the budget to finance college loans.

Kerrey emphasized saving and investment, cutting the deficit and federal bureaucracy. He said Americans need someone to level with them.

He also touted his universal health-care plan as the best.

School finance plan discussed

Local legislators meet to discuss issues over eggs

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Collegian

School finance, the issue that will most likely dominate this year's legislative session, dominated the first Eggs and Issues breakfast Saturday morning.

Local legislators attended the monthly breakfast sponsored by the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce to discuss the beginning of the session.

Steve McKee, USD 383 superintendent, also spoke at the meeting. He spoke about what Manhattan has to gain and lose with the current proposed school finance plan.

Gov. Joan Finney unveiled the plan during her State of the State address Jan. 15. It suggests a statewide 45-mill levy with all property taxes to go to the state for fair distribution.

McKee said he likes the plan because Manhattan would see significantly lower property taxes and gain $1.7 million as a result, but he admitted there are some problems.

"There's an opportunity to lose local control, and equal spending does not necessarily mean equal educational opportunity," he said.

"There's also no enticement to be efficient. You get a certain amount, and you spend it all because there is no impact down the road."

McKee said capital improvements could be hindered if there is not a provision made in the proposal.

Defense keys first Big 8 win; KU up next

CHRISTOPHER ASSAF/Collegian

K-State forward Aaron Collier knocks a rebound from University of Colorado center Poncho Hodges in the first half of their game Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum. The Cats won their first Big Eight game of the season 62-56 to improve their record to 11-6, 1-3 in the Big Eight.

Intensity, communication help Cats down CU, 62-56

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

K-State buttered its bread Saturday afternoon.

The result was a 62-56 win over Colorado in Bramlage Coliseum, the Cats' first of the Big Eight campaign against three defeats. The Wildcats are 11-6 overall.

It was defense that led the Cats, several players said following the breakthrough win.

"Defense is our bread and butter," said center Wylie Howard, who had a game-high 11 rebounds, including eight on the defensive end.

"We try to force teams into turnovers and get into the transition game off of steals."

According to Askia Jones, who knocked home a pair of key buckets late, one thing keyed the solid defensive effort.

"Communication is the main thing," he said. "When you've got everyone talking, everyone alert, it's easy.

"We try to dictate the flow of the game, and we did that today."

Indeed, K-State slowed the visiting Buffs to a crawl in the opening 20 minutes, limiting CU to just 22 shots and 22 points in the initial stanza.

"I thought in the first half we played very well defensively," said K-State coach Dana Altman, who finally found reason to smile about the result of a Big Eight contest.

And as Colorado struggled in the first half, K-State was putting together a solid, yet less-than-flashy effort.

The one K-State spark in the opening period came from forward Trasel Rone, who had 11 of his 14 points in the first half and knocked down three of five 3-point attempts.

But just as quickly as Rone was scoring points, he was committing fouls. Altman was forced to take the good with the bad.

In fact, with win in hand, he assessed the performance of Rone and Gaylon Nickerson — who had a team-high 15 points — in a fashion that had everyone in attendance at the postgame press conference smiling or laughing.

"To say they've turned the corner," Altman said of Rone and Nickerson, who have both struggled at times, "I don't think that's accurate.

"But at least they've turned their blinker on."

That small light came on for more than just Rone and Nickerson, Howard said, because the team was determined it would finally shed a bit of extra baggage.

"We were more focused than we were early," he said. "We gave it 100 percent at the defensive end, and were good enough offensively."

Just barely good enough.

K-State shot just 39.6 percent for the game, but hit key shots when needed.

Some of those key buckets came from the floor; a good number of others at the charity stripe.

Of those from the floor, none were more important, Altman said, than a pair by Jones — one a 3 and the other a 2.

With Colorado on an 8-0 run that cut a 12-point K-State lead to just 4 points at 40-36, the Cats took a timeout.

Following the break, Jones, with time winding down on the shot clock, knocked down a 22-footer from the far wing that gave the Cats a bit of breathing room at 43-36 with 8:45 left.

"That was a big shot," Altman said. "They went to a zone, and we worked it around and got a three."

And after the final media timeout of the contest with 3:53 left, Jones came out firing again, canning a 16-footer from the left baseline to lift K-State to an 8-point, 47-39 edge.

"Those shots really helped my confidence," said Jones, who suffered to a 2-of-6 shooting performance, including a 1-of-5 effort from outside the arc. "And I think

Overcoming Allen crowd important, veterans say

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

When their new teammates ask them about playing at Kansas, Wylie Howard, Askia Jones and Marcus Zeigler issue a warning: Don't be overcome by the elements.

That will be a challenge, the players and Coach Dana Altman admit, as the Cats battle the fifth-ranked Jayhawks at 8:30 tonight in Lawrence's Allen Fieldhouse.

"The new players had better be ready for something like they've never seen," said Howard, who scored 8 points and pulled down five rebounds in K-State's 69-67 loss in Allen last year.

"We (returning players) know how loud it is, and how the student body really gets on you. But if you haven't played there. ..."

For Jones, who was a starter in a 70-58 Kansas win in Allen during his freshman season of 1989-90, his first experience in Lawrence was one he'll never forget.

And he said he's tried to pass along some of what he learned that day to his teammates.

"What a crowd," Jones said of the KU faithful, 15,000-strong who pack the Big Eight's oldest facility every game.

"That was easily the loudest crowd I can remember playing in front of on the road during my freshman year.

"We just need to play our game — defense and rebounding — and good things will come."

And if K-State begins to stray from that game plan, if the fans and the atmosphere become too much for the community college transfers and freshmen to handle, the returnees must step forward, Zeigler said.

"It's very important for us, if someone gets off course, to step up and make sure it gets turned around," Zeigler said. "Because as long as we take care of the defensive end, we'll be OK."

The idea that K-State would be just that was echoed by KU coach Roy Williams Friday, even before the Wildcats got Big Eight win No. 1 against Colorado Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum.

"We were 0-2 last year in the conference," Williams said of last year's Jayhawk unit, which ended the year battling Duke for a national title. "And they're 0-3 this year (prior to the CU game).

"But it's definitely not time to slit any wrists, because there's still time for them to do something this year."

Williams said he has been impressed by K-State's athleticism, and the Cats had been victims of bad luck.

"They are much more athletic than they were last year," he said. "But the ball has just not gone in the hole for them on some nights. But it will."

K-State, now 11-6 overall and 1-3 in the conference, began doing a bit of what Williams hinted they might against Colorado, in a 62-56 win.

But Altman said KU — 16-1 and 4-0 — presents challenges like no other team his Cats have faced.

"Kansas is a very good basketball team," Altman said. "They're very well coached, but we'll go down there swinging."

K-State will need to swing hard to connect with the knockout blow, as the Hawks are 7-1 in Allen this season (the loss was to Louisville) and have won the last four straight in the series by an average of just less than 13 points a game.

And this will likely be a Kansas team riding a wave of confidence. On Saturday, the Jayhawks, for the first time in Williams' three-plus years at Kansas, knocked off No. 18 Oklahoma in Norman's Lloyd Noble Center.

But Williams downplayed the significance of the 96-95 win.

"Lloyd Noble has nice lights and nice acoustics, and I'm sure Mr. Noble was a heckuva guy and all that. But it's just a building.

"I know people don't believe me sometimes, but it really doesn't matter to me whether it's on the road or at home. A win is a win."

A second win in the league is what Altman and Co. are after, and they're after it in a game that will be nationally televised on ESPN.

The last time K-State was on ESPN? Oklahoma State 72, K-State 34.

"That was not a good basketball game," Altman said. "We threw away the tape.

"But we're going to go down there to handle the basketball and make it work."

And Altman's players need little incentive to make it work. The opponent, after all, is going to be wearing crimson and blue.

INSIDE STUFF

A 'Skip' in his Step

Gaylon Nickerson hopes increased confidence shows on floor

PATRICK OBLEY
Collegian

Gaylon Nickerson's nickname is Skip.

Prior to the Big Eight season, most people might have thought "Skip" stood for "skip the game," as Nickerson struggled to find confidence in his game and ultimately, himself.

But in Saturday's big win against Colorado, where Nickerson played a key role, "Skip" meant "skip the past and focus on the future."

"I know what kind of player I am," Nickerson, who led the Cats with 15 points, said. "In the past, it was hard for me, knowing I wasn't playing up to what I was capable of. I knew the fans expected more than what I had shown."

For someone who was following Skip's collegiate career, the nickname might have been short for "hop, skip and jump."

Nickerson spent his freshman season at Wichita State, where he played in 29 games, starting 14. By what he terms as a "bad situation," Nickerson left the Shockers and hooked up with Butler County Community College.

The move turned out to be one of the highlights of his career. In leading Butler to a 23-6 record, Nickerson averaged 20.3 points, six rebounds and five assists a game and was named a consensus All-American. As a member of the National Junior College All-Star team, Nickerson led the squad to an undefeated 8-0 mark and a gold medal.

With numerous schools knocking on his door, Nickerson chose K-State

"Obviously, Gaylon comes to us with outstanding credentials," Cats head coach Dana Altman said upon Nickerson's decision to attend K-State. "There's no question that he has a chance to be quite a player at Kansas State."

There is no doubt mouths watered when Nickerson hit 7 of 10 shots for 15 points in 26 minutes against Texas-San Antonio in the season opener. And when he stood out as the lone star of the Lamar drubbing, scoring 19 points, Nickerson's performance provided hope that the Cats would not be killed once the Big Eight season tipped off.

When the new year began, however, Skip had seemingly skipped out of town. Against Oklahoma State, he had a mere five points. Against Iowa State, just four. And although he scored 18 against Oklahoma, no one noticed since the bleachers had emptied well before the buzzer sounded on a 117-76 defeat.

Nickerson's confidence was in the cellar, along with K-State's record. But finally, said Nickerson, the ghosts of games past were exorcised with Saturday's game.

"I had lost confidence in myself," Nickerson said. "I had the same shots this time as I had in the past. The only difference this time was I made the shots."

Though the offensive numbers are the most visible indicators of his performance, Nickerson says the public has skipped over his contributions on defense.

"I still feel like I'm more of a defensive player than offensive," Nickerson said. "I felt I did my part as always on defense this time. It's just that in the past when I played good defense, I didn't have the offense to go with it."

After the Colorado game, Altman said he was pleased with Nickerson's progress, but admitted he wasn't quite at his potential.

"I know I still have a lot of work to do," Nickerson said. "But now, I really do feel more confident that if the shot is there, I can hit that shot.

"Yeah, this first Big Eight win is special," Nickerson continued. "But there's many more I want. If I can do what I know I can do, I will play a part in getting those wins."

SPORTS DIGEST

NFL: DeBerg, Cherry left unprotected

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — Former All-Pro safety Deron Cherry and quarterback Steve DeBerg, who has started 31 of the last 32 regular season games, were among 18 players left unprotected in Plan B free agency by the Kansas City Chiefs.

DeBerg, 38, has also started three playoff games for the Chiefs the past two years but lost his starting job at the end of the season to Mark Vlasic. In three years of plan B, no starting quarterback ever has been left unprotected.

Vlasic, who suffered a season-ending injury in his first start, was among the 37 players the Chiefs protected Saturday. The unprotected players can negotiate with any other NFL team through April 1.

The NFL required every team to submit by Saturday a list of 37 players who would be protected under Plan B free-agency. The unprotected players can negotiate with any of the other teams through April 1.

Olympics: Lithuania gets ice dancers

COURCHEVEL, France (AP) — One is from Lithuania, the other from Russia. So what country should the couple represent in the ice dancing competition in the Winter Olympics?

The International Olympic Committee said Sunday that it had approved the pair's request to compete for Lithuania, one of the three Baltic states which regained independence from Moscow last year.

Povilas Vanagas, a Lithuanian, and his wife Margarita Drobiazko, a Russian, competed for Lithuania in the recent European Figure Skating Championships in Lausanne and finished 15th in the dance competition.

Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia will compete as independent nations in the Albertville Games, which begin next Saturday. Russia and four other former Soviet republics are fielding a unified team and using the Olympic flag and anthem.

NBA: Murphy tells Hall to forget him

HOUSTON (AP) — Former Houston Rockets guard Calvin Murphy says after being passed up three straight years for the Basketball Hall of Fame, he no longer is interested in the honor.

"To me, it's gotten to the point where I'm not going to accept the nomination anymore," Murphy said Saturday, a day after he learned he failed to receive the required number of votes for entrance into the Hall.

"It doesn't mean anything to me anymore. It's lost its luster with me," said Murphy, who played 13 seasons for the Rockets, from 1970 to 1983. "They put a Russian (Sergei Belov) into the Hall. What has he done for the game? What are his credentials? It's just ridiculous. Three different sets of voters have decided I'm not deserving. It's ridiculous. And it's no fun to get to this stage and have that major letdown. So I'm going to put it in writing."

Murphy said he will send a letter to the Hald of Fame directors and request that he no longer be nominated.

LADY CATS BASKETBALL

First half letdown dooms K-State

No. 20 Kansas hands Lady Cats worst loss of year

PATRICK OBLEY
Collegian

On Jan. 21, Marian Washington was worried about intrastate rival K-State.

The head coach of the Lady Jayhawks had just witnessed a Lady Cat comeback that nearly knocked off then-Big Eight conference leader Nebraska.

Down by as many as 17 points, the Lady Cats had a chance to win late before falling 87-82.

Washington told her players K-State was a team the Hawks could not take lightly. If they let down, she told them, K-State will make them pay.

Sunday, the No. 20 Jayhawks did not let down.

Behind freshman forward Angela Aycock's 22 points, the Lady Hawks handed the Lady Cats their worst loss of the year, an 82-52 verdict on the Bramlage Coliseum floor.

"I saw Kansas State almost beat Nebraska in person, and I knew we would really have to work hard to come in here and beat them," Washington said.

"I knew Kansas State was not a club we could take lightly."

In the early going, the Lady Cats proved Washington's words weren't just a smokescreen, darting out to a 7-2 lead with 17:51 showing.

Three minutes later, however, that lead had evaporated, and the two teams were deadlocked at 11-11.

After that point, the Lady Cats sunk into the depths of KU's tenacious defense — never to resurface.

Danielle Shareef's jumper at 11:05 triggered an 11-1 Lady Hawk tear, which put the visitors up 22-12 en route to a 40-24 halftime lead.

Lady Cat coach Susan Yow said the letdown during the last 11 minutes was a mystery to her.

"I don't have any answer for that let down," said Yow, whose team hit just three shots from the field during that stretch.

"We just weren't moving anymore on offense, and we were standing around on defense.

"I know the players are disappointed," Yow continued. "I asked them what went wrong, and they said that at the 11-minute mark, they got down, and they didn't know why."

KU increased its lead throughout the second half, with the final score being the largest margin of the contest.

Washington said she thought the K-State collapses might have been the result of fatigue induced by her team's defense.

"Defense has been our mainstay all season," Washington said. "That was certainly no different this time."

Coming into the game, the Hawks were ranked No. 1 in the nation in scoring defense, allowing just 53.3 points a game. They also averaged over 42 rebounds a game. Both feats were accomplished Sunday.

On offense, KU extended K-State's zone with Kay Kay Hart's 3-point sharpshooting early on.

With the zone extended to deny perimeter shots, Aycock, Shareef and Alanna Slater went wild inside.

"You come out in a zone when you don't think the other team can shoot from the perimeter," Yow said. "But they were really hot against us."

The glaring K-State weakness was on the boards, where the Lady Cats were outrebounded 44-28.

The deficit in itself wasn't that disappointing for Yow. The 21 offensive rebounds by KU, however, were.

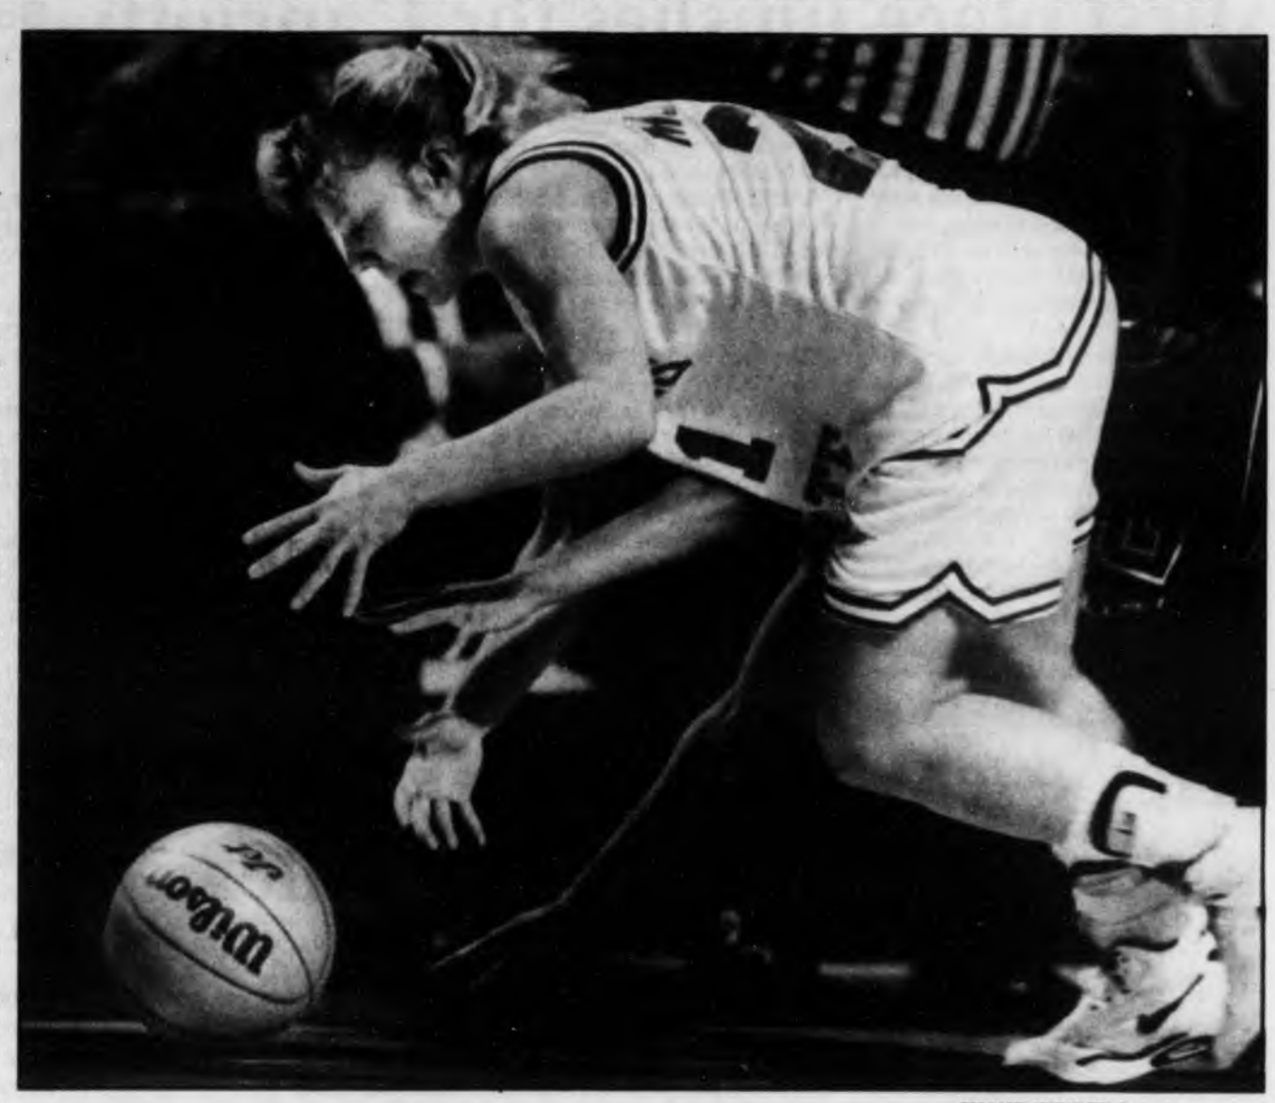
"Rebounding has been our Achilles heel all year long. We keep a stat specifically for second chance points off offensive rebounds," Yow said.

"KU got 26 second-chance points. They don't get those second chances unless they get offensive rebounds. You cannot allow a 15-3, top-20 team have offensive rebounds and expect to win."

A key to KU's domination on the boards was Lady Cat center Jennifer Grebing's early foul trouble. Grebing was whistled for two quick fouls and had to be benched for much of the first half.

"That was tough for us," Yow said. "In that situation, you are no longer substituting for skill, but to keep players in the game."

Grebing and her subsequent replacement, Pam Stoltz, both fouled out.



Mary Jo Miller led the Lady Cats with 11 points. Leah Honeycutt added 9 points and grabbed nine rebounds.

"We were totally dominated out there," Yow said.

"That had a lot to do with our letdown. At some point in time, we just lost our faith that we could win this ball game."

The loss dropped the Lady Cats to 5-14 overall and 2-4 in league play.

K-State will spend the next 10 days on the road for contests at Colorado and Nebraska. Kansas moved to 16-3 and 5-1.

INSIDE STUFF

KU freshman Aycock answers coach's challenge

Injuries force newcomer into leadership role; career-high 22 is result

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

With the injury bug biting the Lady Jayhawk basketball program frequently during the last month, Kansas coach Marian Washington recently challenged a talented freshman performer to play like a veteran — and now.

That talented freshman, Angela Aycock, stepped up and did just that Sunday afternoon, scoring a career-high 22 points to lead KU to an 82-52 win over K-State in Bramlage Coliseum.

With Lisa Tate suffering a stress fracture of the tibia, Tanya Bonham tearing two knee ligaments and Marthea McCloud tearing a knee ligament of her own, Washington's bench looked more like the outpatient ward of a hospital.

That's one reason she challenged Aycock, named by local media as the Big Eight's preseason choice to become the league's newcomer of the year, to finish growing up in a hurry.

"I had a meeting with the coaches," said Aycock, who was the USA Today player of the year in Texas last season and was a second-team Parade All-American at Dallas' Lincoln High.

"I had been in a little slump. The coaches said, 'Hey, you're playing like a freshman.' They wanted me to do more."

Yes, Washington and her staff had told a freshman she was playing like, well, a freshman. That was all the motivation Aycock needed.

"I like the pressure," she said, "because it makes me feel like I'm a big part of the team."

Washington wants Aycock to be just that down the Big Eight stretch for the 20th-ranked Lady Jayhawks.

"By being an aggressor, she helps everyone out," Washington said of Aycock, whose previous career best was a 17-point effort against Weber State in the season's second game.

"And I'm going to push her real hard. Down the stretch, I think you're going to see some big things from her."

After watching the freshman hit 11 of 18 shots against her Lady Cats, Coach Susan Yow had nothing but praise for Aycock.

"She's a very nice player, a very nice player. She's going to be a real complement to the Big Eight," Yow said.

Aycock has now scored in double figures in 10 of the 16 games in which she's played, but Washington still expected — and expects — more.

"After her first couple of games, she started playing real conservative basketball," Washington said. "We need more from her than that."

What KU doesn't need, Washington and Aycock both insist, is a performance from the 6-foot-2 freshman that will make anyone forget about former Lady Jayhawk All-American Lynette Woodard.

Woodard was Woodard, and Aycock ... you get the picture.

"I worried about it at first, but now there's not so much pressure on me," Aycock said of the inevitable comparisons.

"But I'm not trying to be a Lynette Woodard. I just want to be the best player I can."

And for now, Washington and Aycock said they hope that player will be anything but the freshman she truly is.

"We've got to have her if we're going to stay tough," Washington said.

KU's Angela Aycock (30) said her performance Sunday was the result of Lady Hawks coach Marian Washington's challenge to be a leader.

Golly, Tuttle Creek is really kinda ugly

DAVID FRESE

Maybe this greenhouse effect thing isn't all that bad, seeing how it makes for good fishing weather.

I didn't go this weekend, though I wish I would have. I told a friend that I really wanted to hit the lake and hook a big one. He said it was cruelty to animals to hunt or fish for sport. I told him he wore too much black and spent too much time at the Espresso Royale talking about rights for unborn gay athiest baby seals.

I have another friend who we'll call Brad. Brad and I met here at K-State. He's married now, pretty happy, too. We used to get loaded and load up my old white Ford Granada with our cooler, a couple broken-tipped Zebcos and a smelly minnow bucket in the back seat. Then we'd head to Oscar's, pick up a dozen medium-sized minners and head for Tuttle Creek.

I like Tuttle Creek and all, but it's an eyesore and there's nothing in the world more unnatural. If you don't believe me, then go out to the Top of the World out southwest of town on a clear sunny day, like tomorrow for instance, and look at it. All around there's miles of hilly prairie, some of the most beautiful country you can see in Kansas, and then there's this big damn dam right smack in the middle of it. It's like a big pus-filled sore on the plains.

I've never had much luck there, fishing or otherwise, so maybe that's why my thoughts on the subject are such. When I was a boy, I can't remember this all too clear — I was only four or five at the time — but my grandparents took me out to Tuttle and we camped out in their Winnebago. I begged for my Papa to let me sleep in the top bunk. He finally gave in, much to my grandma's chagrin. I thought I was pretty big stuff.

Big stuff, until I fell out of the bunk, straight on to my noggin. I had a helluva bump on my head for a long time.

I don't think my grandpa ever took me fishing. He did tell me once that if I wanted to catch a lot of fish I should take one of my mother's L'eggs, fill it with corn, tie it off, throw it in the lake or pond and come back to the same spot a week later. The fish there would bite like mad.

Or I could always throw a lit stick of dynamite in the water, and the fish would all be killed or knocked unconscious and float up to the surface. I found out a few years later that it was kind of illegal to do both of those. It confused me at first that my grandpa would tell me to do those things, but he might have been a little confused in the later years. I remember now that he worried a lot about the Russians taking over the country.

About three years after he told me the secret of successful fishing, he died while I was camping out in the Rockies. Before I left, he held on to me in the hospital–he'd had a stroke and could barely stand.

"Take care of your parents," he said, his voice was all raspy and phlegmy. "But watch out for the Communists."

I told Brad that story for the first time about two summers ago while we were out fishing at the lake. He drank the rest of his beer and was quiet for quite a while. The water splished-splashed on the shore and the sun beat down on our skinny shirtless chests. Finally, he got up and opened the cooler.

"I wish I had some dynamite," he said, grabbing a beer. "You want a beer?"

I said yeah because we weren't catching anything.

BIG EIGHT

No. 3 Cowboys dump Tigers; move to 20-0

ASSOCIATED PRES

STILLWATER, Okla. — No. 3 Oklahoma State was able to slow down Anthony Peeler on Sunday and bring Missouri's offense to a halt in the process.

Peeler scored 18 points, but hit just five of 14 shots, and the Cowboys held No. 8 Missouri to 38 percent shooting in an 84-61 victory.

Oklahoma State is 20-0, the best start in Big Eight history, after winning its 27th straight at home.

Corey Williams scored 22 points and Byron Houston had 19 for the Cowboys, who shot 63 percent. Missouri had been holding opponents to 39 percent, best in the league.

Williams scored 13 in the first half when the Cowboys opened as much as a 16-point lead. Houston, who had eight points and three fouls at halftime, scored four baskets in the first five minutes of the second half to help Oklahoma State maintain a comfortable lead.

Peeler came in averaging a league-high 26.7 points in Big Eight games. The job of defending him fell to Williams and reserve Cornell Hatcher.

Houston and Oklahoma State's other two big men, Bryant Reeves and Randy Davis, had three fouls apiece in a bruising first half that saw 29 fouls committed. But the defense helped create the 16-point lead, and they went to halftime with a 45-37 lead.

INDOOR TRACK

Lincoln yields just two first place finishes for Capriotti

BRIAN ANDERSON
Collegian

The only things track coach John Capriotti brought back with him from the Nebraska Triangular were two first-place winners and a cold.

Despite the cold he caught, Capriotti sounded positive about the future of his squad, not to mention plugged-up.

"We're heading in the right direction," said Capriotti. The women's squad captured the two first-place finishes, while the men came away empty from the Bob Devaney Sports Center in Lincoln, Neb. "I felt that we came out better than expected."

K-State went up against host Nebraska and the Arkansas Razorbacks.

The women jumpers shined in their events as Dee Dee Tribue won the triple jump with a leap of 39-feet-3 3/4 inches and Gwen Wentland won the high jump with a vault of 6-feet-3/4 inches.

Connie Teaberry finished behind Wentland in the high jump with a 5-foot-11 1/2 inch jump. In the long jump, Kathy Janicke received third place with a bound 18-feet-6 1/2 inches.

The men's squad took six top-three places in the meet. Dante McGrew came in third in the long jump with a leap of 22-feet-7 inches, Chris Pryor was second-best in the 400 meters with a time of 50.09 seconds and in the 800 meters, Jared Storm finished with at 1:53.67 to take third place. Anthony Williams brought in third place in a time of 2:25.85.

In the 1,600 meter relay, K-State men finished third in a time of 3 minutes and 22 seconds, nearly nine seconds behind the winner, Nebraska, and runner-up, Arkansas.

The tightest competion of the Triangular was 55 meter dash. Football players Gerald Benton and Thomas Randolph took second and third places, respectively. Benton, despite slipping from the starting blocks, came across the tape with a time of 6.29, three-hundreths of a second behind the winner. Benton edged out Randolph by one-hundreth of a second with a time of 6.30.

The track team will split up this weekend with half of the team going to the Iowa State Memorial in Ames, Iowa. The other group will return to Lincoln for the Husker Invitational.

HEALTH

Primary health clinic sought

Board of Health applies for state health-care grant

ULRIKE DAUER
Collegian

Riley County-Manhattan Board of Health members voted Jan. 31 to apply for a $140,000 state grant to establish a primary health-care clinic in Manhattan.

The new clinic addresses the needs of 11,000 to 12,000 people in the county who are not covered by health insurance and whose income is less than 150 percent of the poverty level according to guidelines set by the federal government.

In order to get the grant provided by the Kansas Department of Health and Environment, the community will need to raise a matching $140,000.

Funds and capacities now available will allow the new facility to serve about 1,800 clients per year or 16 percent of the individuals who qualify, said Chuck Murphy, director of the Riley County-Manhattan Health Department.

He said working conditions will be tight, but he expects it to succeed.

The issue of a primary care clinic had been brought up for several years, said Dr. William Tiemann, president of the Riley County-Manhattan Board of Health.

He said last July the state decided to start providing health programs for low-income, uninsured individuals.

"For the first time the state decided to put money into such programs," he said.

Tiemann said the clinic will be installed in an existing building, since there is not enough money available to build a new building.

Once the state grant is awarded, the community has one year to provide the matching funds, Murphy said.

Tiemann said the matching funds will be collected from private contributions, fundraising, and will include unpaid, volunteered service hours.

Several board members expressed concern that the money the community has to provide for the clinic will be allocated from other areas.

"If this is funded, it will be funded instead of something else, not in addition," Wilton Thomas, health board treasurer said.

A way to cut costs is to shar programs with other communit health programs or sell programs.

Murphy said both hospitals alread agreed to help out with matching ser vices.

"There is a good cooperation wit the hospitals," he said.

In another motion, the board vote against establishing a non-profit pri vate clinic.

A private clinic would not qualif for state funds and could not be starte by the health department, a publi agency, said Dr. Katherine Rathbun health officer with the Topeka Shawnee County Health Depart ment.

Rathbun said it is important t apply for federal grants as well a state grants.

To qualify for a federal grant, th clinic needs to accept patients wh are already covered by Medicare Medicaid.

She said the big advantage to con sider is Medicare by law is required t pay for every visit at 100 percent o reasonable cost.

OLYMPICS

Hey everybody, there's still time left to go to Albertville

If spring break is still too far away, scrape together some money and go to the Olympics

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

School is just two weeks old, but many students may already be getting tired of it. And spring break is still five weeks away.

So, how about some additional vacations? Like in Europe, in the Alps, in France? Lets go to Albertville, the little town in southwest France that is host to the XVI Olympic Games this year.

The Games start Feb. 8, but for spontaneous travelers among K-State students, that shouldn't be a problem.

Many of the events aren't sold out yet, but customers are no longer able to purchase tickets in most of the United States.

Olson-Travel World, located at Manhattan Beach in California, is the only outlet for tickets in the United States. According to one of the company's travel counselors, Olson-Travel distributed thousands of tickets for Albertville.

But that doesn't mean the dream to attend the Olympics in person is over. Feeling skiers in skin-tight outfits flying by at 80 mph during downhill races is still possible.

For several events, such as cross-country and alpine skiing, hockey and figure skating, ticket offices in Albertville still have seats available in various price categories, the travel counselor said.

Attendance to hockey games at Meribel costs from $24 and $102, tickets for the figure-skating events can be purchased for $61-$204.

The prices for standing next to the runs at the alpine ski races at Val d'Isère and Maribel vary from $20 to $61; for cross country events, $16 to $24.

Besides those events, ski-jumping competitions at Courchevel, bobsled and luge runs at La Plagne, freestyle skiing at Tignes and curling at Pralognan La Vanoise should still be open to the general public.

Of course, traveling without booked tickets to the Olympics is somewhat risky. On the other hand, not traveling with an official Olympics travel agency usually turns out to be cheaper.

Flight tickets are still available for the time of the Olympics, which run through Feb. 23.

A representative of Kansas State Travel Service said for a seven-day trip to Albertville, a round-trip flight from Kansas City to Paris costs $478 plus tax.

Travel Unlimited Inc. offers a two-way flight to Geneva, Switzerland, for $508.80. Geneva is just about 40 miles away from Albertville.

A travel counselor said a train service runs between Albertville and Geneva, which would cost about 230 Swiss Franks ($166) each ride.

Just think, instead of being in school, you could see the Olympics.

they lifted the team."

They did just that, according to point guard Marcus Zeigler.

"We needed a leader to step up like Ski did," Zeigler said.

"He was 0-for-5 or something like that forever, and then he hits a couple of big shots. It was very important to us."

As important as Jones's heroics were, Zeigler and three other teammates also knocked down key charities inside the last three minutes to help the Cats to the win.

In fact, K-State was 11 of 12 at the line in the final minutes, with Zeigler and Nickerson each knocking down four attempts each and Jones a perfect 2 of 2. Only John Rettiger, who converted on the second shot of a two-shot opportunity, missed in the final three minutes.

With shots falling in key situations down the stretch, K-State was able to answer a burning question players had been asking of themselves of late.

"Can we compete in the Big Eight? We all had been asking ourselves that," Howard said.

"We always knew deep down that we could, but we had to prove it first."

Rivalry

"When you come here," said Trasel Rone, a community college transfer about to battle the Jayhawks for the first time, "you learn to dislike KU, because, well, because they're KU, and we're K-State.

"We'll be ready."

But another community college transfer, Gaylon Nickerson, is going to take a more Williams-like, low-key, approach.

"I feel the tension of the rivalry and all," Nickerson said. "But I'll be up for the game not just because it's a rivalry, but because it's a game.

"And we've got to have a couple of good ones in a row."

STUDENT GOVERNMENT

ASK invites students to lobby

DEREK THOMAN
Collegian

In an attempt to get K-State students involved with the lobbying process, the Associated Students of Kansas will play host at a training session at 7 p.m. in K-State Union Staterooms 1 and 2.

ASK Lobby Day will be Monday, February 10, in Topeka, and Jim Persinger, chief of staff to Student Body President Jackie McClaskey, said a high student turnout at the informational meeting would be appreciated.

"During a tight budget year, a high student turnout at Topeka is a necessity," Persinger said. "The meeting will educate students about ASK, discuss the legislative priorities, and answer general questions."

Students who attend the meeting today and decide to attend the ASK Lobby Day will tour the Capitol, participate in a short rally, and attend a press conference which will include Gov. Joan Finney and Senate Majority Leader Fred Kerr, R-Pratt.

"ASK issues sometimes differ from K-State's," Tim Oswalt, State and Community Affairs Director, said. "Each of the issues are a good effect on K-State, though."

The people who go next Monday will be split into groups of three or four with either a member of the lobby team or a member of the legislative affairs committee as the leader.

The six 1992 legislative priorities ASK will be lobbying for include capital improvements, a contiguous county waiver, GTA fee waivers, the base budgets, financial aid for students, and support for community service programs.

Oswalt said he is satisfied with the priorities set up for ASK Lobby Day.

"We can't find one that isn't a positive one for K-State," Oswalt said.

Persinger encourages students to attend today's meeting and to be present at the ASK Lobby Day, which begins at 9 a.m.

KSU KANSAS STATE UNIVERSITY CONFERENCE
principal-counselor-student
The Office of Admissions cordially invites former students of these high schools to attend the 1992 Principal-Counselor-Student Conference. High school principals and counselors will be on campus to visit with you about your preparation for and experiences in KSU Academic programs. Your participation will help the University build a stronger relationship with your former high school faculty.
You are welcome to drop by between 10:15 a.m. and 12:15 p.m. on Wednesday, February 19. This is an excellent opportunity for you to renew old friendships with former classmates. The Provost has asked that your instructors excuse you from these class periods.

Theatre turns stage into different world

TOM LISTER
Collegian

We all went to Wonderland.

Yesterday, the Black Light Theatre of Prague turned the stage of McCain Auditorium into a different world during its black light production of "Alice in Wonderland."

The performance was more than entertaining — it was compelling.

Dana Srncova delighted the audience as Alice while Bob Dufek played White Rabbit. Both performed with an enthusiasm matched only by that of the crowd. Together they took all 1,586 members of the audience through an animated and colorful version of the Lewis Carroll classic.

For adults not familiar with "Alice in Wonderland," the show could have been a bit confusing. Those who knew the basics of the tale, however, were drawn into the adventure. And from the sounds of the "oohs" and "aahs" in the balcony, the children were as well.

Director Jiri Srnec has written a production that combines the interest of the original story with the intrigue of underlying allusions to Czechoslovakia's political situation under the Soviet Communist party. "Alice" pulled it off without a hitch, and the allusions came across well.

Two actors dressed as red birds pranced the stage with whips, threatening Alice as she tried to hold the remains of her name. Later, White Rabbit snips off the birds' wings after Alice becomes queen of Wonderland. Srnec shows his vision of Czechoslovakia emerging into its own Wonderland — freedom. The political references presented even more opportunity for audience interest.

The combined efforts of actors and technicians brought everything to life. Cast members dressed in black performed wonders under the black lights. The audience had the chance to see pages fly from a book that Alice read, flamingos and elephants roam the stage, and White Rabbit disappeared into a pocket watch– all live on stage. The coordination and the end result were nothing short of amazing.

In addition, Srnec created the musical score that captured the mood of every scene. Music varied from classical to jazz with great ease.

According to Lloyd Martin, tour manager of the production, 17 people are in the company.

"We're working on a bare minimum of cast," he said.

The bare minimum, however, makes the show.

"Alice" made a great Sunday afternoon even better. McCain Auditorium presented Manhattan with an opportunity for entertainment unsurpassed in the local movie theaters.

It sure beat the hell out of "The Last Boy Scout."

Cattle stay in shape

HOLLY CAMPBELL
Collegian

The recent unseasonably warm weather has been an advantage to most cattle producers.

The higher temperatures have saved producers money that normally would have been spent on supplements, said Gerry Kuhl, beef cattle Extension specialist and associate professor of animal sciences and industry.

November to January is usually when most cattle are grazing. This year, Kuhl said, it was colder and drier than normal during that period, so the producers lost their opportunities to graze cattle.

Cattle did not gain weight as well, so producers had to feed more, and earlier, he said.

"The cost of gain rose substantially," Kuhl said.

The recent warm weather, however, has helped producers, because they have not had to supplement as much as they normally do at this time.

When the weather is cold, producers must feed more accurately, Kuhl said.

As the temperature decreases, cattle must take in more feed for body maintenance. Therefore, producers must make sure their cattle are receiving enough protein in their ration, he said.

Protein can be supplemented to the diet by feeding more for age, such as hay and silage.

Corey Krehbiel, herdsman at the Purebred Beef Unit and assistant instructor of animal sciences and industry, said they have been feeding additional protein during the cold weather.

"It gives them more energy," he said.

The dry summer and cold fall have caused the producers to use up their feed faster than normal, Krehbiel said.

Consequently, he said, the cattle were in better condition before the winter.

It is necessary to feed cattle well during winter months to keep them from loosing their body condition. If cattle are too thin, their reproductive performance drops off, Kuhl said.

Females won't re-breed, he said, and that means later calving next year. Poor body condition causes a higher death rate of calves and lower calf weaning weight, he said.

"The animals aren't as physically strong," Kuhl said.

Temperature, as well as wind chill, are important when dealing with winter conditions, Kuhl said.

"Wind chill is what the cattle actually feel," he said.

Due to their hair, cattle are much more able to deal with low temperatures than humans. Kuhl said cattle are comfortable down to 30 degrees.

Kuhl said below 30 degrees, however, the energy requirement for cattle increases 1 percent for every 1-degree drop in temperature.

Cattle use more energy to help them stay warm, so when producers see a decline in the temperature, they must gradually increase the energy requirement in the diet.

Movie a psychological terror

'The Hand that Rocks the Cradle' box-office smash

JENNIFER BEALS
Collegian

Planting seeds of doubt.

"The Hand That Rocks the Cradle" is set in the lush, Pacific Northwest — perfect for gardening.

This film is the story of how one trusting mother hires a beautiful, live-in nanny to take care of her children.

Unfortunately for the Bartels, Peyton DeMott (Rebecca DeMornay) brings in more baggage than just the suitcase she totes.

This film pits DeMornay ("Risky Business") against her rival, Annabella Sciorra ("Jungle Fever").

DeMornay first tries to crumble Sciorra through manipulation and doubt, then by stealing her family.

Unknown to Claire (Sciorra), Peyton was the wife of Claire's obstetrician. When Dr. DeMott examined Claire for the first time, he molested her and was brought up on charges.

Unable to withstand the stress of the situation, Dr. DeMott commits suicide and leaves an expectant wife behind. When Peyton loses her baby, she discovers Claire is the cause and vows to destroy her.

Peyton is a complete psychological terror. Director Curtis Hanson did a wonderful job in dissecting such a complicated woman.

The audience is given the chance to see her mentally tear apart Claire, piece by piece.

In one scene, Peyton empties all of Claire's asthma medicine, which puts her in intensive care. At another point of the film, Claire's husband (Matt McCoy) entrusts her with an important document to be mailed, so Peyton destroys it.

Peyton finally gets to reap what she has sown when she finally invades the most intimate bond between a mother and her baby — she breast feeds the baby. This not only throws off the feeding schedule, which Claire detects, but the infant begins to pull away from Claire.

One thing that Peyton overlooks is the handyman. Ernie Hudson, who portrays a mentally limited man, witnesses what she's doing and decides to protect the family he loves.

"The Hand That Rocks the Cradle" is a deliciously mind-bending movie.

Sciorra portrays Claire with sincerity and believability. At no time in the film is she ever transparent or fake.

DeMornay should also be given credit for tackling such a meaty role. Many vile characters lack the chemistry to make the audience hate, but fortunately for Peyton, this is not a problem.

This movie is currently the subject of many talk shows across the country.

Not only has "The Hand That Rocks the Cradle" been a powerful box-office smash, but if it can get families to thoroughly check out their babysitters, it's a good thing.

Retired professor receives medals

SHANE KEYSER/Collegian

Mark Guffy, a retired professor at K-State, is offered congratulations by Marine reservists after receiving medals from World War II.

JENNIFER BEALS
Collegian

The sunlight radiated through the windowpane and amplified the stars and stripes of the flag.

A hush fell over the room as Mark Guffy, retired K-State professor of radiology and World War II Marine Corps pilot, was presented with three Distinguished Flying Crosses and 12 Air Medals Saturday at the Marine Corps Reserve Center in Topeka.

"He has assured me that he is no hero," Ray Lummus, inspector instructor, said. "He represents a special American."

Unfortunately, this rare event almost did not take place.

Guffy said during a reunion two years ago, he realized neither he nor his squadron received any recognition during World War II.

Guffy said after he realized this, he went forward and submitted a copy of his log book, in which he had collected more than 390 flying hours, to see if he qualified for any awards.

On Nov. 22, 1991, the Secretary of the Navy extended the qualification time and allowed Guffy to receive the medals.

"It's fabulous," Lummus said. "One of the things that the Marines believe in is tradition and Dr. Guffy and his generation helped create those traditions — it's really special."

"It's really a big surprise," Guffy said, as he took a drag off his cigarette, "Better late than never."

In a press release, Lummus said Guffy had encountered a number of close calls during the war.

"On one occasion his Martin Torpedo Bomber crashed at sea, exploding on impact and killing his two crewmen. Although injured, Dr. Guffy miraculously survived the crash," Lummus said.

After the war, Guffy attended Colorado State University and received his master's and doctorate of veterinary medicine degrees.

After a few years of private practice, he obtained a doctorate in veterinary radiology.

Lummus was a professor of radiology in the Department of Surgery and Medicine at K-State from 1963 until he retired in 1988.

During his years at K-State, Guffy not only filled the role of an educator, but a writer as well.

"I wrote over 50 scientific articles," Guffy said. "A large amount were for continuing education and were distributed across Kansas and the country."

Stephan

Hochhauser, a Manhattan attorney, said she believes Stephan is innocent until proven guilty, but she is concerned trust be will lost in the office if he does not leave it.

"It's bringing up cynicism and doubt to the office. I think he needs to resign," she said.

"He is not that important. It's the office that is important. Under the indictment, you can't have trust."

Hochhauser said she does not know why Stephan insists on hanging on to his position after all of the controversy throughout his term.

"I don't know. I'm sure it's a big part of his life," she said.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said there has been no improprieties in how Stephan's office was run.

"In Kansas, like in the rest of the country, you are innocent until proven guilty," she said.

"He was elected by the people, and he should continue to do his job, unless he is found guilty. Then, I would want him to step down."

Oleen said trust in the office is important, but stability is more important.

"If he was removed now, the governor would appoint someone of a different party — jobs would change," she said. "We don't need that shaken up at this point, when we have a full plate in Topeka.

"I'm disappointed this happened, but I want the stability to continue."

Rabies

of the bite.

"Once it reaches the brain, the disease is not reversible," she said.

The K-State diagnostic lab where Briggs works is nationally renowned for its rabies testing. Any animal in the state that shows signs of having rabies is brought to the lab for testing.

"If a pet is not vaccinated, signs of rabies are personality changes, hind limb paralysis, or foaming at the mouth," Briggs said.

Briggs also said there are two types of rabies. Furious rabies occurs in cats when they contract the disease.

"This is what people think of when they think of rabies," she said. "The animal acts enraged and crazy."

Briggs said dogs, on the other hand, contract dumb rabies.

"Paralysis takes over their body," she said.

Briggs said the No. 1 rabid domestic animal is the cat.

"Many owners don't vaccinate their cats, and they are the most likely to come in contact with a rabid animal," she said.

Briggs said almost all human exposure to rabies is contracted through cats.

"Vaccinate your cats especially," she said. "The cost is much less than undergoing post-rabid treatment."

Budget

about the mention of the Throckmorton addition.

"The plant sciences building has gone through an entirely different process than most programs that are considered to be pork barrel," he said.

Bush said in his State of the Union address that he wants to eliminate Congressional pork-barrelling, because it is a political tactic designed to enhance legislators' image with their constituents.

"We did a feasibility study. It went through the budgeting process, and the conclusion by Congress was that it was a wise investment to make," Woods said.

Wire reports quote U.S. Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., as saying Congress will most likely provide money next year for K-State's projects.

"My view is that it's about 99-percent certain that the funding will come," Dole said. "I think it's pretty safe to say that it's going to happen."

Denying an eating disorder can be a fatal mistake.

Eating disorders, such as anorexia and bulimia, can affect children, teenagers, and adults. If you or someone you know, male or female...

- is preoccupied with weight and body size
- eats large amounts of food followed by self-induced vomiting
- uses laxatives or diuretics to control weight
- prefers to eat alone or eats secretly
- exercises compulsively
- denies that he or she has a problem
- expresses feelings of being fat although they may even be underweight
- avoids meals (though they may prepare them)

...it may signal an eating disorder. Most victims can't stop their self-destructive behavior without professional help. Left untreated, either disorder can become chronic and result in severe health damage, even death.

The Menninger Clinic will present a free public Eating Disorders Education Forum featuring:

- A presentation on eating disorders by the Menninger professional staff
- A question and answer period coordinated by Menninger mental health professionals
- The 28-minute film Fear of Fat
- An opportunity, if you choose, to meet privately with a Menninger mental health professional trained in eating disorders. (This brief screening is designed to be informational and will provide free professional guidance, but is not a substitute for a detailed, psychological evaluation.)

Lawrence bar features area bands during two-day concert

Clockwise from top: Band members play on despite a stage-diving fan. A steady stream of fans climbed onto the stage bumping the band and knocking over microphones.

Roach Factory kicks off its set in the Outhouse Saturday. The show started Friday and concluded on Saturday. Bands from Lawrence and Manhattan played in the show.

Roach Factory guitarist Lincoln Linder gets close to the mike near the end of the set.

I always wondered why they call it the Outhouse.

But after a two-hour drive to Lawrence, my need for a bathroom was answered by a nasty toilet with no running water in a cinder-block room with graffiti-covered walls.

"We're here, we're queer, you deal with it," the inside of the door said.

No one ever said the place lacked atmosphere.

Friday and Saturday saw something unusual happen in these here parts.

The Outhouse brought Manhattan and Lawrence music fans together for two blowout shows with bands from both cities.

It's always a treat to see bands from the so-called alternative scene in various Manhattan mainstays as the Spot and the Wareham, but to see them in their destined venue is another.

A hell hole, that is.

Dr. Zeus, CREEP, Tuber, Truck Stop Love and Roach Factory were the Manhattan delegates in the two-night showcase Friday and Saturday.

They grinded through hour-or-so long sets that sent combat boot-clad skinhead types flying. For the rest who wanted to keep all facial bones in tact, the view from the rear was just as good.

The highlights of Saturday included Truck Stop's cover of Bad Co.'s "Feel Like Makin' Love" and the best damn Roach Factory set I've ever scene.

The movers and shakers of the Manhattan underground scene had the opportunity to hang out on stage behind the bands. Eddie Skoog was visible through the smoke-filled air like the boy next door gone bad.

Anyone who has never been to the Outhouse needs an explanation.

They say the place is an old, abandoned gas station. What it is now is an unpainted cinder-block building out in the middle of a field east of Lawrence.

There's no age limit and no bar. Strictly BYOB. Saturday, a bonfire burned outside the entrance, warming the hands of skinny, tattoo-laden, leather-clad youth.

And although the location was unfamiliar, it created feelings of faint recognition. It was like the Manhattan scene wishes it could be.

Or how it should be, if given half the chance.

Red tape tangles students

Pre-physical therapy majors have trouble with KU, WSU grad schools

TRISHA PERRIGO
Collegian

The red tape of getting into a physical therapy school is keeping students out instead of putting them in.

Stacey Norton, senior in pre-physical therapy, said the graduate department at Wichita State University did not send her folder, which includes her recommendations, on to the university's physical therapy department for review.

This resulted in her being placed low on the alternate list.

Wichita State has a rolling admissions policy, which means the first applicants to meet the requirements are the first to be accepted.

With only 32 openings, one late or lost recommendation could mean denial, Norton said.

"It's frustrating, because it messes with our lives," said Renee Rucker, senior in pre-physical therapy. "We've put four years into this."

Rucker said she called to confirm that her recommendations had safely been delivered to the University of Kansas physical therapy department, only to find they had no record of them.

"After three stressful days of waiting, I called," Rucker said. "They said they had everything. I just think she didn't look hard enough the first time I called."

Christine Thiel, senior in pre-physical therapy, is still waiting.

"Wichita didn't send me everything to complete my application," Thiel said.

"I received my physical therapy application. However, I was unaware that two to three days later, a graduate school application was supposed to arrive. The application never followed, and I had no idea I was missing anything, until I called."

Ron Iacovetta, assistant dean of the graduate department at Wichita State, said there are a lot of people applying to the physical therapy department, which results in many denials.

"The physical therapy department has rigid requirements and rigid deadlines," he said.

"It's best to visit with the department about requirements and deadlines. My advice is to check early, check application and anything else needed for acceptance."

Chandi Ginther, senior in pre-physical therapy, said she met the deadlines, but when she called the KU physical therapy department to make sure her folder was complete, one of the three recommendations had been lost in the mail.

"It's lack of communication between the student and the college. It is their responsibility (the university's) to get the information (to the students) the year before," Ginther said.

Kansas colleges require ACT test

Results show overall knowledge in different areas

GINGER BURD
Collegian

The American Collegiate Testing Program administers a test high-school juniors or seniors must take in order to gain admissions to Kansas colleges and universities.

It is sometimes questioned whether or not the ACT accurately tests what students have learned in school.

Don Hoyt, assistant provost for planning and evaluation services, said the test is given to students to find their knowledge in certain areas.

He said the test does not test exact concepts, but it is an overall view of their knowledge in an area.

Concepts being the same worldwide does not mean knowledge of those concepts is the same.

Michael Lynch, assistant vice president for institutional advancement, said foreign students are not required to take the ACT, but are required to take TOEFL, Test of English as Foreign Language, to test their English usage.

When foreign students decide to take the ACT, there is always a chance they will have difficulties due to the English language.

Lynch said since the ACT is a timed test, foreign students may have problems with the reading parts of the test, even if their English is better than the average student. This could be a reason, he said, for the scores in math averaging higher than the scores in English.

Sometimes students don't feel the ACT tests what they know, but it tests how well they take tests. Hoyt said this is a correct assumption.

ACT is just one test, and a student's knowledge is analyzed by that one test, he said. If they can not take the test well, their score will be lower.

Hoyt said knowledge at the university level is also tested the same

Scores used to place students in appropriate classes

GINGER BURD
Collegian

Being a part of the American Collegiate Testing Program is just one of the many requirements on a high-school senior's schedule.

In order for a student to be admitted to K-State, he must have taken either the ACT or the Scholastic Aptitude Test. No certain score on either test, however, is required to gain admission.

The ACT and SAT scores are used to place students in college courses.

"We use the ACT primarily as an advising tool for freshmen, to help place them in the right classes their first semester, or even the first year," said Michael Lynch, assistant vice president for institutional advancement.

A Kansas student planning to attend college outside the state would usually be required to take the SAT. A Kansas student planning to attend a college in-state, however, would only need to take the ACT.

The main differences in the two tests are the locations where the tests are predominately taken and the subjects students are quizzed about.

Lynch said the SAT is predominately used west of the Rocky Mountains and in the eastern fourth of the United States.

The ACT is mainly used in the Midwest. This is possibly because the ACT was developed in Iowa, and the SAT originated at Princeton, he said.

The other thing that makes the tests different are the things students are tested about.

The SAT tests in areas of verbal, math and written English.

Patricia Farrant, assistant vice president of public affairs for ACT, said the ACT tests in English, math, reading and science reasoning.

In October 1989, the ACT was

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

Events scheduled during February

STEPHANIE LOEPPKE
Collegian

There are several events planned at K-State this month in celebration of Black History Month.

The national event is nothing new — the first month-long celebration was in 1926, said Mordean Taylor-Archer, assistant provost for multicultural affairs.

Twenty-seven activities throughout February will be offered to educate students, faculty and the general public about the history and current status of African-Americans.

Events include a Spike Lee Film Festival each Sunday beginning Feb. 2 at the K-State Union Little Theatre and the Harlem Globe Trotters Feb. 11 at Bramlage Coliseum.

Susan Taylor, editor of Essence Magazine, will speak Feb. 25 at the Union Forum Theatre.

"I feel it is necessary because Black History Month can be an educational tool for the people who don't know much about black history," Dedra Martin, sophomore in public relations, said.

Preparation for the program began last fall, and plans for 1993 have begun.

The committee has requested the presence of astronaut Mae Jemison for 1993.

Jemison was asked for this year when a group of students heard her speak in St. Louis in fall 1991. She declined because of a planned space shuttle flight this fall, said Pat Mahon, graduate student in student counseling and personal services.

Nez Savala, junior in humanities and ethnic studies, said the events will compare to Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

U.S. sends first Haitians home

Human rights activists say people face death, intimidation

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti — The United States sent home the first of thousands of Haitian refugees Monday, turning 381 people over to Haitian authorities and an uncertain future.

U.N. officials and human rights advocates warned that many of the 12,000 boat people in U.S. custody face death or intimidation at the hands of Haitian security forces if they return to their towns and villages.

Officials at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, where nearly all the Haitians are being held, said those who returned on two Coast Guard cutters Monday did so voluntarily, while others did not want to go back.

Dozens in the first group said they had risked their lives fleeing in rickety boats to get away from Haiti's poverty and not political persecution.

"I was looking for a better life," said Roger Rochelle, a 30-year-old father of five who said he left Haiti in a small boat with other refugees on Nov. 13 and was picked up at sea Nov. 17.

"I saw there was nothing to be gained in Guantanamo. I was homesick for my family," he said.

The refugees, mostly young men, but also a few women and small children, came ashore clutching small bundles of clothing and other items given to them at Guantanamo. Red Cross officials gave them $15 on arrival.

The United States has denied asylum to most intercepted Haitians, saying they were not political refugees as U.S. law requires. The Supreme Court opened the way Friday for their repatriation by overturning a federal judge's order that had blocked their return for months.

The repatriation caused an outcry among some politicians and advocates of the immigrants who feel these people would be exposed to political reprisal on their return.

"Had we been any other country — white or Spanish — we would have had a chance," Florence Comeau of the Haitian Affairs Committee in New York said Monday. "The Cubans can come in any time. The Cubans are people, the Haitians are people, but one is light-skinned and the other is not."

In Washington, White House press secretary Marlin Fitzwater said the repatriation was being monitored by U.S. Embassy officers as well as representatives of the Organization of American States and the Red Cross.

"We have received no credible reports of reprisals against any individual Haitians who attempted to reach the United States, including those who are repatriated after the coup" that toppled President Jean-Bertrand Aristide on Sept. 30, Fitzwater said.

Gen. Colin Powell, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told reporters in Washington he did not expect any serious problems.

The U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees issued a statement at its Geneva headquarters criticizing the repatriation, warning that many returnees could be exposed to danger.

"Continuing reports of serious human rights abuses and violence by security forces since the overthrow of the democratically elected government of Haiti are cause for great concern," it said.

In London, the human rights group

NEWS DIGEST

▶ DUKE FILES IN PRIMARY

TOPEKA (AP) — David Duke, controversial former Lousiana legislator and onetime Ku Klux Klan leader filed by mail for a spot on the state's Republican primary ballot.

Duke mailed a check to the Secretary of State's office to cover the cost of filing to be on the April 7 ballot.

A state Republican Party official said the party had no reaction to Duke's filing.

The only other well-known candidate to file is Nebraska Sen. Bob Kerrey.

▶ PRISON NO LONGER CO-ED

LANSING (AP) — State corrections officials are limiting contact between male and female prisoners at the Lansing state prison after 16 women became pregnant in six years.

Male and female inmates no longer eat and have recreation time together, a corrections department spokesman said.

State legislators and the Wichita chapter of the National Organization of Women had urged the department to change the policy.

▶ JUDGE CANCELS GAY BAN

DALLAS (AP) — A Texas state judge on Monday struck down a Dallas police ban on gay and lesbian officers.

The policy was based on the state sodomy law that makes homosexual activity a misdemeanor.

District Judge Larry Fuller said the policy violates a constitutional guarantee to privacy.

The case was brought by Mica England, 27, a lesbian police officer applicant.

▶ MIYAZAWA SAYS U.S WORKERS ARE LAZY

TOKYO (AP) — Japanese Prime Minister Kiichi Miyazawa said Monday that U.S. workers were losing the drive to live by the sweat of brow.

The Japanese Foreign Ministry later issued a statement saying Miyazawa had no intention whatsoever of criticizing American workers.

A White House spokesman said Miyazawa's comments would cause U.S. workers to be more competitive.

Representatives recruit new students

DENNIS O'KEEFE
Collegian

K-State admissions representatives are a key ingredient of K-State's student recruitment and retention program.

The representatives develop personal relationships with prospective students and their families, alumni, and high-school counselors to highlight K-State.

The representatives are relatively recent K-State graduates, and they must commit themselves to the program for one year.

"Candidates for the positions must have high energy and a commitment toward leadership, and be very enthusiastic about K-State," said Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life.

K-State alumni apply for the positions for a number of reasons.

Some, like Pam Zenger, 1988 marketing graduate, have a fondness for K-State that generates an enthusiasm for the position.

"I enjoy helping students, and I love K-State," Zenger said.

Todd Huck, 1991 history graduate, said it gives him a chance to share his own K-State experiences with prospective students.

Other representatives return to K-State after briefly experiencing the work force most graduates can't wait to enter.

Kristin Dreiling, 1989 apparel and textile marketing graduate, worked in retailing a year before coming back to K-State.

"I discovered retailing didn't appeal to me, and I decided to look toward higher education for a more fulfilling career," she said.

Each fall, representatives visit every high school in the state.

During the spring semester, they make it back to 60-65 percent of the schools they visited during the fall. This means spending many days and weeks on the road.

"On the average, we spend two months on the road in the fall, and we spend one in the spring," said Mark Harms, 1990 animal science graduate.

The representatives are assigned a specific territory to recruit from and many recruit within the state. However, a few visit targeted high schools in Colorado, Nebraska, Missouri and the Chicago suburbs.

The program was initiated in 1986 by University President Jon Wefald and has helped to make K-State the choice for Kansas high-school graduates, Bosco said.

"We attract more high-school seniors than any other school in the state," Bosco said.

Some high-school counselors have said they are impressed with the program.

"The K-State representatives are very approachable, and their level of enthusiasm is outstanding," said Mel Smith, student counselor at Shawnee Mission North High School.

Smith, a K-State alumnus, said he pushes K-State because of the admissions representatives.

"They stay in continuous contact with prospective students and really start to shine when they work one-on-one with them," he said.

"We strive to be friendly, comfortable and responsive to the prospective students' needs," Courtney Novak, 1991 marketing graduate, said.

"It's unique that we're recent graduates, because we can tell our K-State experiences with sincerity."

A special component of the recruitment program is the minority recruitment and scholarship committee.

Karen Hester, 1991 mathematics graduate, is the coordinator of the committee, which places extra emphasis on minority recruiting and plans special programs to attract minorities.

"Minorities are worried about minority population and the number of minority scholarships that we offer," Hester said.

At 7:12 p.m., a major-damage, minor-injury, hit-and-run accident report was filed. The accident occurred at 4th and Leavenworth streets between a vehicle owned by Michael P. Kennedy of St. George, and an unknown, hit-and-run vehicle.

At 7:25 p.m., Gaylen R. Hohman of Manchester was arrested for DUI at 4th and Leavenworth streets. Subject was released on $2,000 bond. An arrest report was filed.

At 8:07 p.m., Charles Ince, 1701 Sunnyslope Lane., was arrested for distribution of marijuana and no drug-tax stamp on warrant No. 91-CR1029. Subject was confined in lieu of $5,000 bond. An arrest report was filed.

At 9:01 p.m., Aaron Baker was injured in an accident at 17th and Colorado streets. An injury report was filed.

At 11:58 p.m., burglary and arrest reports were filed on three suspects at 5th and Yuma streets. James Armstrong, Rt. 1, Box 88, Riley; and Richard Tilton and Jessie Price, both of Lot 50, Fairmont Trailer Court were all confined in lieu of $1,000 bond each.

MONDAY, FEB. 3

At 12:44 a.m., an explosion was reported at the 500 block of Sunset Ave. The police report cited several calls reporting a very bright light and explosion in the area. The officer was advised the explosion had been at the Beta Theta Pi house at 500 Sunset Ave.

At 3:03 a.m., Willard Brown of Wichita was given a notice to appear for driving with a suspended license at the intersection of highway K-18 and Walnut Drive.

At 8:16 a.m., James Merriweather, 1917 Judson, reported $600 stolen from his apartment. A report was filed.

At 12:25 p.m., Corrine McDonald-Alexander, 115 Southlawn Trailer Court, Ogden, reported the theft of a wedding band, a necklace and an earring set. The loss is $200, and a theft report was filed.

College introduces new program

LISA SNEATH
Collegian

The College of Technology at K-State-Salina has introduced a new program in the civil engineering technology field.

The geographic information system curriculum has been submitted to the Kansas Board of Regents for approval as an associate degree program in the College of Technology.

GIS is a new development in the combination of maps and informational databases, and it is currently being taught at K-State-Salina.

"It's a computerized mapping system used to generate maps through the use of a computer — rather than traditional means," said Steve Thompson, associate professor of civil engineering technology.

"But it's a lot more than that, because it allows you to store things in the computer about the objects on the map."

GIS uses latitude and longitude to determine the location of an object and any information about the object useful to the mapping process.

The GIS is able to point to a house and report how many people live there, the ages of them, what year the house was built, the elevation of the house and any other information about the house that is on record.

Last June, K-State-Salina was awarded a $50,000 National Science Foundation grant to match the $50,000 already spent by the college. The money will support the development of a GIS laboratory, Thompson said.

So far, the funding has been used toward the purchase of GIS computer equipment, software and a surveying instrument.

Also being established at K-State-Salina is a global positioning system base station. This system has a receiver that is

K-STATE UNION

Union Station celebrates first year

Lunch crowd big, increased evening clientele sought

SUSAN DONOVAN
Collegian

K-State's Union Station is gradually turning into grand central station.

Union Station celebrated its first anniversary Jan. 16, the same anniversary as Operation Desert Storm.

Teto Henderson, manager of Union Station, said regular seating capacity in Union Station is 240, and this has remained constant throughout lunchtime hours. However, Henderson said he did estimate one lunchtime crowd in late January to be 300.

Heather Henshall, freshman in arts and sciences and Union Station employee since March 1991, said lunchtime is the busiest time.

"To me, it seems like there are a lot more people coming in during lunch than there were last year," she said. "But on the weekends, it is not as busy."

Ann Claussen, assistant director of the K-State Union, said she is pleased with the customer turnout after being in business for one year.

"We've come a long way since our opening and are very pleased with our lunch crowd," she said. "We have a steady customer count that pleases us and is continuing to grow.

"We are working on a variety of strategies to enhance an evening clientele."

Henderson said lunch turnouts are great, but he wants to work on ideas that will attract evening customers.

Both Claussen and Henderson agree that obtaining an evening clientele might not be possible for Union Station.

Diverse entertainment and good food are the key strategies to encourage evening customers and build a steady clientele, they said.

Henderson said different activities and entertainment functions occur during the week and on weekends.

In February, Union Station offers a variety of entertainment attractions.

These events include Julie Schrader, a folk art vocalist; a spring fashion show presented by the K-State Apparel and Design Club; Sonny Kenner, a rhythm and blues band; and a play, "Isis and Other Goddesses (A Black Woman's Story)," sponsored by the Graphic Art Theatre and Women's Resource Center.

Henderson said weekend functions vary.

He said Union Station also offers swing dance lessons.

MORTAR BOARD

Kassebaum speech will kick off national week

Senator will lecture about environmental issues next week

BETSY BERKLEY
Collegian

National Mortar Board Week will begin with a lecture by Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan.

Kassebaum will speak about environmental issues at 2:30 p.m. Feb. 11 in K-State Union Forum Hall.

The lecture is sponsored by the Mortar Board national senior honorary as part of the annual Mortar Board Week.

K-State's theme this year is "Wildcats for the World," which will focus on student awareness of the environment.

Kassebaum also will answer questions about environmental issues.

"This time will be a good opportunity for students to tell her face-to-face about the environmental concerns they have," Beverly Primm, senior in marketing, said.

Mortar Board chose Kassebaum because of her representation of Kansas in the U.S. Senate, Primm said.

Amy Miller, senior in management and marketing, said Kassebaum coming to K-State is a way to bring in students.

"We are very excited to be able to offer this opportunity to students," she said.

Throughout the week, there will be activities promoting global awareness in the Union.

VOTER REGISTRATION

■ Students can register to vote at the Student Government Services Office in the K-State Union. The procedure takes about five minutes and can be done between 8 a.m. and 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

EDITORIALS

Students should register to vote here

The recent ordinance to restrict noise in Aggieville and Manhattan has brought to light the absence of student input in city government.

City commissioners have said in a roundabout way they don't really care about what students think — it won't do them any good to show up at meetings, protest, make signs or even make a whole lot of the kind of noise the commissioners are trying to squelch.

They aren't voting citizens of Manhattan. So it's really all in vain.

There's a way to change that.

The process of registering to vote in Manhattan takes only five minutes, and it can be done at a place no farther than the K-State Union.

Students can change their residency to Manhattan if they're interested in the Manhattan political scene. Those who don't agree with what goes on here, whether it be rental inspection, speed limits or noise ordinances, should register because students are important to this community.

About a month ago, Eegee's closed its doors for good. The owner said student breaks and the Gulf War were two of the main reasons for the restaurants' financial woes.

This city depends on the residents of Manhattan who support this noise ban. But they also depend on students and on Fort Riley.

Let's make them realize this.

Many of us will spend several years in Manhattan. If you care about what goes on in the city where you live 9-12 months of the year, then register in Manhattan.

Register. Vote.

Make your voice count.

Disabilities act mandated; no financing provided

Equal opportunity.

Before, it was only for those who were "normal."

But no more.

It has been more than two weeks since the Americans with Disabilities Act went into effect.

The bill bans discrimination against disabled people and guarantees equal access to public facilities. These include public accommodations, employment opportunities, telecommunications and transportation.

The typical stereotype of a disabled person is someone in a wheelchair. This bill, however, also includes those with hearing impairments, impaired vision, impaired speech, those who are mentally retarded, as well as those with epilepsy and the AIDS virus.

Business owners, as well as those who operated public facilities, no longer have an excuse to deny equal access to the handicapped.

Now, it's the law.

K-State has been improving the accessibility of campus, no doubt in preparation of this bill. The upgrades in the K-State Union and Fairchild Hall are prime examples.

But the University must continue to improve the campus to benefit all students.

With the current financial problems that plague higher education, many fear the cost to make the necessary improvements. Older buildings like Calvin Hall, for instance, need extensive renovations to meet the new requirements.

The state has a legitimate argument.

If Congress is as committed as it claims to be to providing equal opportunities to the handicapped, it should be willing to help states finance improvements or help them find a way to do so.

Mandating rules without providing solutions is a cop-out.

THOUGHTS ON WRITING

I (Wait—

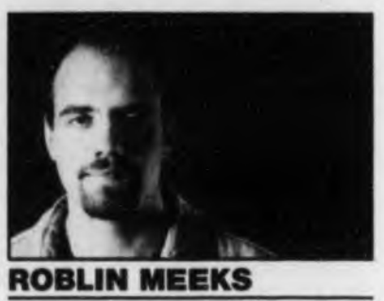
Why should anyone want to read what I write?

Simply because I applied for this job, got an idea in my head that I could place one word after another, gives me some sort of right to claim coherence? And to think that I'm also asking people to believe me.

Me.

"So why am I writing?" he asked himself (parenthetically).

Milan Kundera wrote that each one of us has a desire — no, obsession — to write, to convey in words something — anything — to an unknown public of readers. The realization of the conveyance becomes the purpose, not the substance or meaning. The ears we surround ourselves with grow tired of hearing us speak, so we turn to the anonymous.



Graphomania.

That's what he calls it. Eventually, the inherent tendency of words, used only in and of themselves, to become reflective encapsulates ourselves within a solipsistic wall of mirrors. Voices from without die away.

Kundera has a point. There definitely is some sort of raw, unadulterated, narcissistic pleasure felt from seeing your own words in print. That goes without saying. I always read the things I write. The typeset sentence gives power. Lends authority. Paragraphs mean business, and if you can build one solid — choosing sentences baked hard like adobe — it can become a cudgel.

But I don't intend to bludgeon anyone.

The purpose of language and writing is, after all, to communicate. Right? The entire reason, or one main one at least, I write these things weekly is to say something worth saying (The money isn't that great of an incentive.). I try, or at least want, to somewhat organize the morass of thoughts in my head through lethargic letters, and, in the process, I hope to have my ideas make some sort of sense to someone besides myself. If another person understands, I've accomplished at least a little.

ROBLIN MEEKS

Writing can make people famous. Important. It also has a tendency to blur the distinction between truth and falsehood. I've always been told never to believe everything I read — it's like running with scissors.

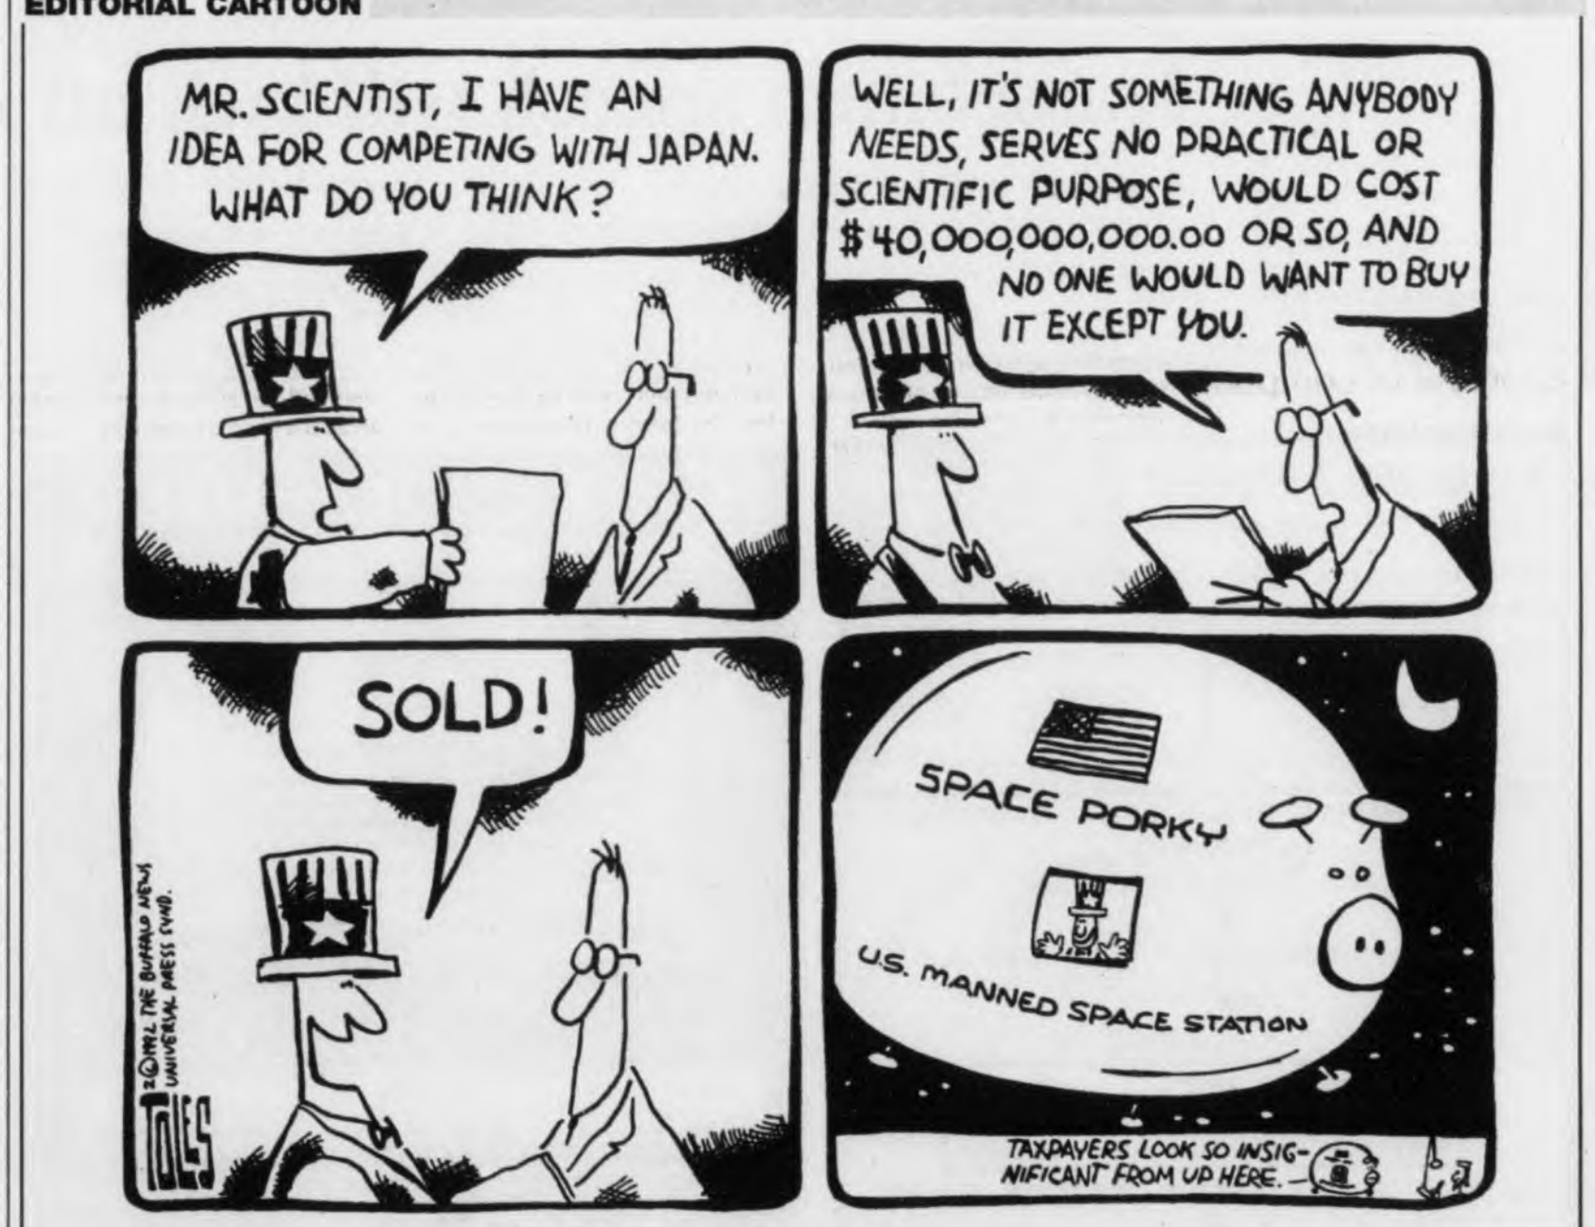
But how can any words, or mine in this case, communicate the necessity of concepts which have no lexicon? In this variegated kaleidoscopic panorama of human interaction, how am I supposed to distinguish the fine points, single out the significance, find the mean between the extremes of virtue and vice?

Wittgenstein wrote in his Tractatus: "There are, indeed, things that cannot be put into words. They make themselves manifest. They are what is mystical."

Vocabularies stall in the face of serendipitous digression.

It's amazing. The insane profundity of the ultimately wordless has drawn the fascination of word-users from language's inception. Tolstoy was obsessed with it. He, and others like him, have tried to gild the sense of ethics onto pages. And for how long have poets been trying to convince someone of their deepest love. Success only comes when a reader, who has felt (in one degree or another) the feelings the writer is attempting to represent, recalls them. A description can't convey the feeling itself, but only strive to resound it.

I'VE ALWAYS BEEN TOLD NEVER TO BELIEVE EVERYTHING I READ — IT'S LIKE RUNNING WITH SCISSORS.



And I'm supposed to give all of this a try? What the hell do I know? How am I even to talk about how I don't know how to talk about the things no one can talk about? That alone barely makes sense to me.

Wittgenstein: "What we cannot speak about we must pass over in silence."

Or maybe, in the light of it all, I) don't have the foggiest.

Yet.

EDITORIAL CARTOON

There's more than a month of Black History

Boy, are there a lot of uninformed people around here. But I guess this is a good place to get informed and learn, being a college and all. So while I've got your attention, I'm going to add my own little lesson.

It's about Black History Month. I thought it timely to expound upon my own personal feelings concerning this 28-day celebration set aside to acknowledge the contributions of blacks in history.

It sucks.

Now, I know there are people who will agree or disagree with me on that point before they read the reason why, and it is foolish to do so.

I'm tired of living in white (which I will call "Anglo" for the remainder of this column) history years and observing "ethnic" history months. What makes Anglo history 328 (or 327 during a leap year) days more important than ethnic history?

EVE WILSON

An even better question is, "Could there be an Anglo history without all of the ethnic histories?" Face it, Anglos didn't build the world and everything in it as some would like to believe.

I don't like the fact that I am expected to live and learn Anglo history every day of my collegiate career or even every day of my life. And don't tell me to "accept it," as suggested about my ideas last week. Why should I have to accept something that is wrong to me? If our forefathers and mothers had accepted slavery and the idea that a woman's place is in the home, where would we be today?

That's why I won't accept that future children may be subjected to the same lack of information I have faced in my education.

In the early years, when I went to schools that had children of several ethnic groups, I always wondered why there weren't many people who looked like myself and my classmates in the books we read at school.

The only things I ever learned about African Americans at school were that they had been slaves, that Crispus Attucks was shot by the British, Harriet Tubman created the Underground Railroad, slavery was the cause of the Civil War, Martin Luther King, Jr., was the leader of the civil rights movement, and most black people are poor and uneducated.

No one ever taught me about the great civilizations along the Tanzanian lakes where Africans produced steel in one fuel-saving step at 1825 degrees as early as 1500 years ago or that this temperature wasn't reached outside of those civilizations until the 19th century. Likewise, when I learned about Galileo and other astronomers, no one mentioned the 300 B.C. African astronomers of Namoratunga, Kenya, who built an observatory, plotted star charts, and whose prehistoric calendars are the most accurate ever found. When I was taught about the explorers, no word was heard about the Africans already in the Americas. I could go on.

These are just a few examples. I think it's clear that it would take much more than 28 set-aside days to observe and learn about African-American history.

And that doesn't even begin to mention the countless numbers of other histories perpetually overlooked in the United States of America. I would like to learn more about Native-American history and Mexican-American history too, without being limited to a concentrated month's worth of information, because just as there are countless things to be learned from African-American history and Anglo history, there are many things to be learned from others.

We all deserve better than a few ethnic history months spread throughout the year. Don't accept less.

TAXES

Proposed cuts may hit students' wallets

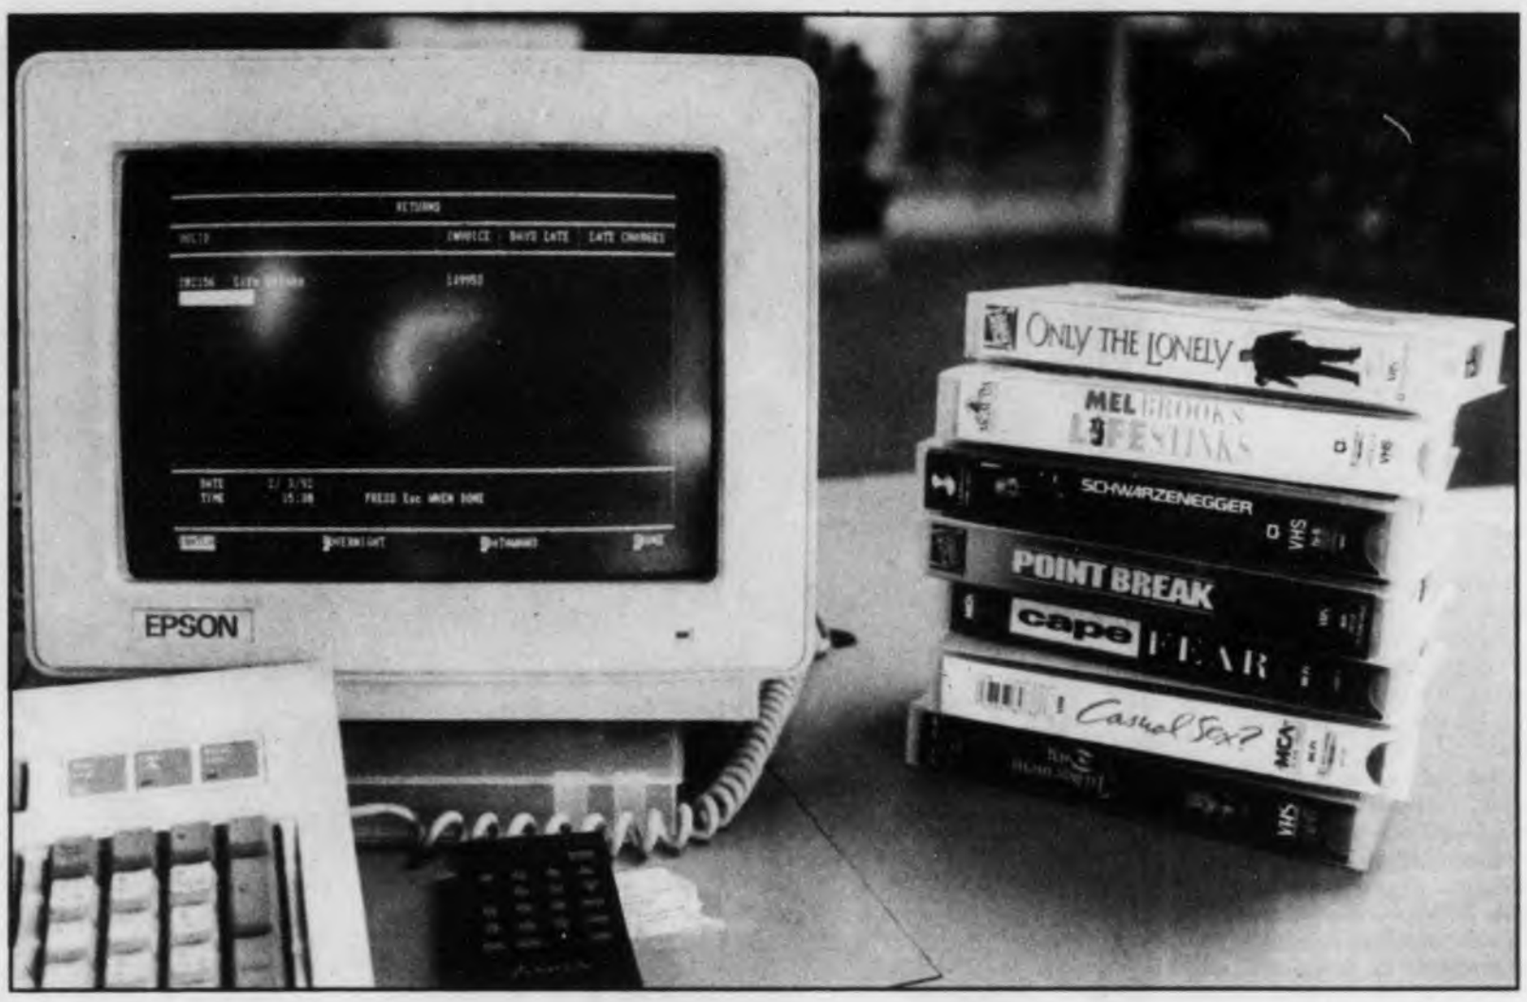
Finney proposes repealing tax exemptions for water, gas, other items

JOE VADER
Collegian

Gov. Joan Finney is asking the Legislature to close tax loopholes that may adversely affect K-State students' pocketbooks.

As part of her 1993 budget proposal, Finney suggested repealing $105 million worth of currently tax exempted items. The revenue could be one way to finance $217 million of property tax relief.

The Legislature has been given a list of more than 50 exempted items to consider repealing. Many are common purchases for students, such as water, gas, electricity and coin-operated laundry.



Finney has provided no guidelines on which exemptions to squelch. Some legislators have said this is a political tactic, so the governor cannot be held accountable. And others have said Finney wants the Legislature to have the freedom to choose for themselves.

"She's not provided the leadership on which exemptions are to be cut," Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan said.

But Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, said that is unfair criticism.

Hochhauser said the governor had a bill before the Legislature last year that stated specifically what she wanted off the exemption list, and the Legislature turned it down.

■ See EXEMPT Page 10

SHANE KEYSER/Collegian

Home videos, laundromats and gas are currently tax-exempt; however, if Finney's plan goes through, their tax-exempt status will be lost.

ACADEMICS

Finney recommends increasing GTA fee waivers

Cost deferrment could help K-State meet class demands

MITCH HIXSON
Collegian

Gov. Joan Finney's recommendation to increase all graduate teaching assistants' fee waivers from 75 to 100 percent is just the tip of the iceberg.

"In many areas on campus, our stipends for GTAs are not competitive nationally," said Brad Fenwick, associate dean of the graduate school. "Hopefully, this is just the start of additional funding."

The waiver increase will make K-State more competitive in hiring not just the number of GTAs the University needs, but the quality of GTAs the students and faculty deserve, Fenwick said.

However, he said he does not see the increase in the waiver bringing an increase in applicants.

Fenwick said departments talk with him often about how difficult it is to recruit the kind of graduate students they want and the students should have, with GTA stipends as low as they currently are.

Fenwick said he hopes the state Legislature is starting to understand the problem facing K-State.

While the number of classes K-State has been offering has remained constant, the demand for classes has increased because of an increase in the size of the student body.

This sometimes forces departments to pay GTAs less, so they can have more of them, Fenwick said.

"Ultimately, this means we're out of the bidding for other top GTAs because our stipends are lower," he said.

"The academics are at risk of not being the same quality they were just a few years ago, because we cannot draw as many of the top GTA prospects."

Charles Hostetler, Kansas Board of Regents member, said the board has recommended the waiver increase for the last three years.

"We're very pleased the governor says the waiver should be raised," he said.

Even though Finney proposed the waiver increase in her budget package, Hostetler said it will be up to the regents to put the waiver in place once it has passed the Legislature.

Tony Barilla, economics GTA, said he thought K-State was fine monetarily and academically when he applied.

"But the main reason I came here was because I really wanted to work with a couple members of the faculty who are nationally known," he said.

Barilla said the lower fee waiver was probably a factor for some students, unless the person was a "Harvard type" and had a lot of extra money.

"Paying fees is painful, so the less you have to pay, the better off you are," he said.

"Money is a factor when you pick schools, but I wanted to come here, regardless, because of the faculty in my department."

Lance Speere, journalism and mass communications GTA, said the money definitely influences a graduate student's decision about where to go.

"The amount of time put in by graduate students is big, and there are less scholarships and grants for graduate students. It helps to get anything, especially if you're a teaching GTA," he said.

Some people do not realize the importance of GTAs, Fenwick said.

"They make the difference in the quality of education," he said.

"They give undergraduates better education, they better research for the University, and they are a big stimulus for the faculty to stay current in their field."

Casino gambling in Kansas stalls

Department of Interior withholds approval of compact

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Kickapoo Indian tribe's plan for casino gambling in Kansas stalled Monday when the Department of the Interior withheld its approval until a dispute is resolved between Gov. Joan Finney and the Legislature.

Interior Secretary Manuel Lujan told Finney the department couldn't approve a compact signed by her with the Kickapoos, which would allow the tribe to operate a casino on their reservation near Hiawatha.

Steven Goldstein, a spokesman for Lujan, said the department concluded that under Kansas law, the compact needed more than the governor's approval.

In delivering that message to Finney, Lujan cited a ruling by Kansas Attorney General Bob Stephan that the compact required approval of the Legislature as well as the governor.

"The matter now is in the hands of the Kickapoo Nation to determine whether they want to send the compact to the Kansas Legislature or whether they want to go to federal court to resolve this matter," Finney said after the meeting.

Lance Burr, a Lawrence lawyer who serves as attorney general for the Kickapoos, said no decision had been made by the tribal council on what actions to take next.

"We're prepared and willing to do anything necessary to get the job done. This is just a continuing battle," he said.

Among the various options:

■ The Kickapoos could ask the federal courts to approve their casino proposal, arguing they have followed the proper procedure in seeking approval of the compact.

Goldstein said such a lawsuit probably couldn't be filed until Feb. 24, which is the end of a 180-day period allowed for gambling compact negotiations with a state.

■ The governor, attorney general or Legislature could ask the state courts for a ruling on the question of who represents the state of Kansas in approving the gambling contract.

Under a 1988 law, the Indian Gaming Act, tribes can establish Las Vegas-style casinos with games such as blackjack and roulette if they enter into a compact with a state that allows some form of gambling.

At issue in the Kansas case is whether Finney alone represents the state in signing the compact. Goldstein said the department and its chief attorney based the agency's position on Stephan's ruling that the Legislature must be part of the approval process.

"Our solicitor indicated that there presently exists a compact between the tribe and the governor, but under Kansas law, what is needed is a compact between the tribe and the state," Goldstein said.

He said Lujan didn't reject the compact, but the secretary made it clear the dispute between Finney and the Legislature must be resolved before the Interior Department could move ahead with approval of the casino proposal.

Goldstein said if the Kansas attorney general issued a different ruling, determining the governor's approval was sufficient, then the department would change its position.

Lujan also told Finney it would be very difficult for the department to reject a compact if it was properly approved by the state and the gambling proposal met a number of agency standards, Goldstein said.

For example, it must be demonstrated to the department that the casino will not affect the neighboring areas and has the support of the local community, he said.

So far, the department has approved 23 compacts allowing Indian gambling operations in other states. In general, the compacts involve issues such as licensing procedures, hours of casino operations and capacity of a casino.

Students can save basketball program

TODD FERTIG GUEST

Not long ago, a statement was made concerning athletic ticket sales that many thought would never be made at K-State.

The comment came from a student working with the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics to investigate potential changes for the basketball program. Seeking feedback from Student Senate on options being discussed, the student admitted, "Football ticket sales are being used to promote basketball ticket sales."

The student spoke concerning the decline in basketball season tickets purchased by students, noting the recent success, both on the field and at the box office, of the football program. Football tickets, which three years ago were practically given away to draw a crowd for Homecoming, may actually be used as a tool to attract more students to purchase basketball tickets, the student said.

Hysterical laughter would have met such a statement just a few short years ago.

The athletic department, however, is not laughing over the apparant lack of support for the basketball team as it struggles to right itself. Student season-ticket sales were a huge disappointment, and the average attendance has been dismal. The department is weighing every option in search of a means to put students back in the stands.

In case Bill Snyder and his bunch have caused some to forget, be reminded: K-State is a basketball school, first and foremost. It is Ahearn, deafening cheers, Jayhawk-tackling fans and a sea of purple that made it that way. And it is the students that hold the future of the program in their hands.

The athletic department realizes this and is trying everything within its power to motivate student support as the team battles its way back.

But to the athletic department, basketball is a business. Basketball has been, in fact, the department's lifeblood. It helped to support the University's non-revenue sports, as well as its floundering football program. The revenue produced by the basketball program is crucial, and for that reason, the department is considering all its options.

Though poor attendance of recent games hurts the basketball team, such disinterest could prove more injurious in the long run to the students attending the games.

A few student leaders have been meeting informally with the heads of the athletic department to discuss the changes already made in the ticket-sale process and to investigate further possibilities. All ideas and proposals will be handed over to the official ticket-sales committee for further consideration when the new committee members are selected.

Subjects considered in these meetings have ranged from parking permits for students to combined football/basketball season tickets. It is apparent from the topics addressed at the meetings that the objective is to satisfy the students and bring them back to Bramlage.

But as stated before, students must realize that basketball is big business. If revenue generated within the student body is not sufficient, it will be sought elsewhere. Currently the student body is guaranteed 6,000 season tickets each season, but only about 2,000 were sold this season. If the lack of student support continues, the department may determine seating reserved for students could be cut to make more tickets available to the public.

The eagerness of the athletic department to accommodate students is not something to be taken for granted. If students want the campout back, they should demand it. If they want better seating for handicapped students, they should provide a proposal.

If their recent lack of interest continues, the wishes of the students may no longer outweigh economic stress. Now is the time for students to make the program what they want it to be. Otherwise, they may find themselves on the outside looking in

Early spurt lifts Kansas to 80-58 win

Despite loss, Altman pleased by team's play

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

LAWRENCE — When you're facing the No. 3 team in the nation, any lapse — even if it's a mere four-minute one — can be fatal.

K-State found that to be oh, so true Monday night, watching Kansas go on a 14-0 run early en route to an 80-58 win in Allen Fieldhouse.

"KU's just a much better basketball team than we are right now," Cat coach Dana Altman said after Kansas, now 17-1 overall and 5-0 in the Big Eight, used an early outside shooting barrage and a dominant inside game in dismantling the visitors.

Indeed, though 3-point shots by Rex Walters and Alonzo Jamison and a jumper by Adonis Jordan keyed the early 14-point Hawk answer to a short-lived 4-0 K-State edge, it was inside play that lifted Kansas.

Junior transfer Eric Pauley scored 17 points and Jamison added 16 as KU won the battle of the big men convincingly.

"They didn't beat us with a lot of 3-pointers," said K-State's Gaylon Nickerson of Kansas, which connected on but six of 21 trey attempts . "They beat us inside with second shots.

"When you give up those kind of shots, they're going to hit for a high percentage."

And the Jayhawks did just that, especially in the first 20 minutes.

Kansas was a blistering 56.7 percent from the floor in the opening half and finished the night shooting 52.4 percent as a team.

Pauley said that the high percentage and the success he, Jamison and Richard Scott enjoyed while combining to go 19 of 26 from the floor, may have been the direct result of what Walters, Jordan and their guard mates were able to do on the perimeter early.

And while Pauley, Jamison and the Hawks put on a jump-shooting clinic, shooting woes continued to plague K-State, 11-7 and 1-4, as the Cats shot just 36.1 percent from the floor in their third-poorest effort of the year to date.

"If we had just knocked down a few shots, we would have been OK," said Altman, who pointed to a missed, open 3-point attempt by Askia Jones in the waning seconds of the opening half as a big one.

The Hawks led just 39-30 at the time, with Jones attempting to cut the lead to a tenuous 6.

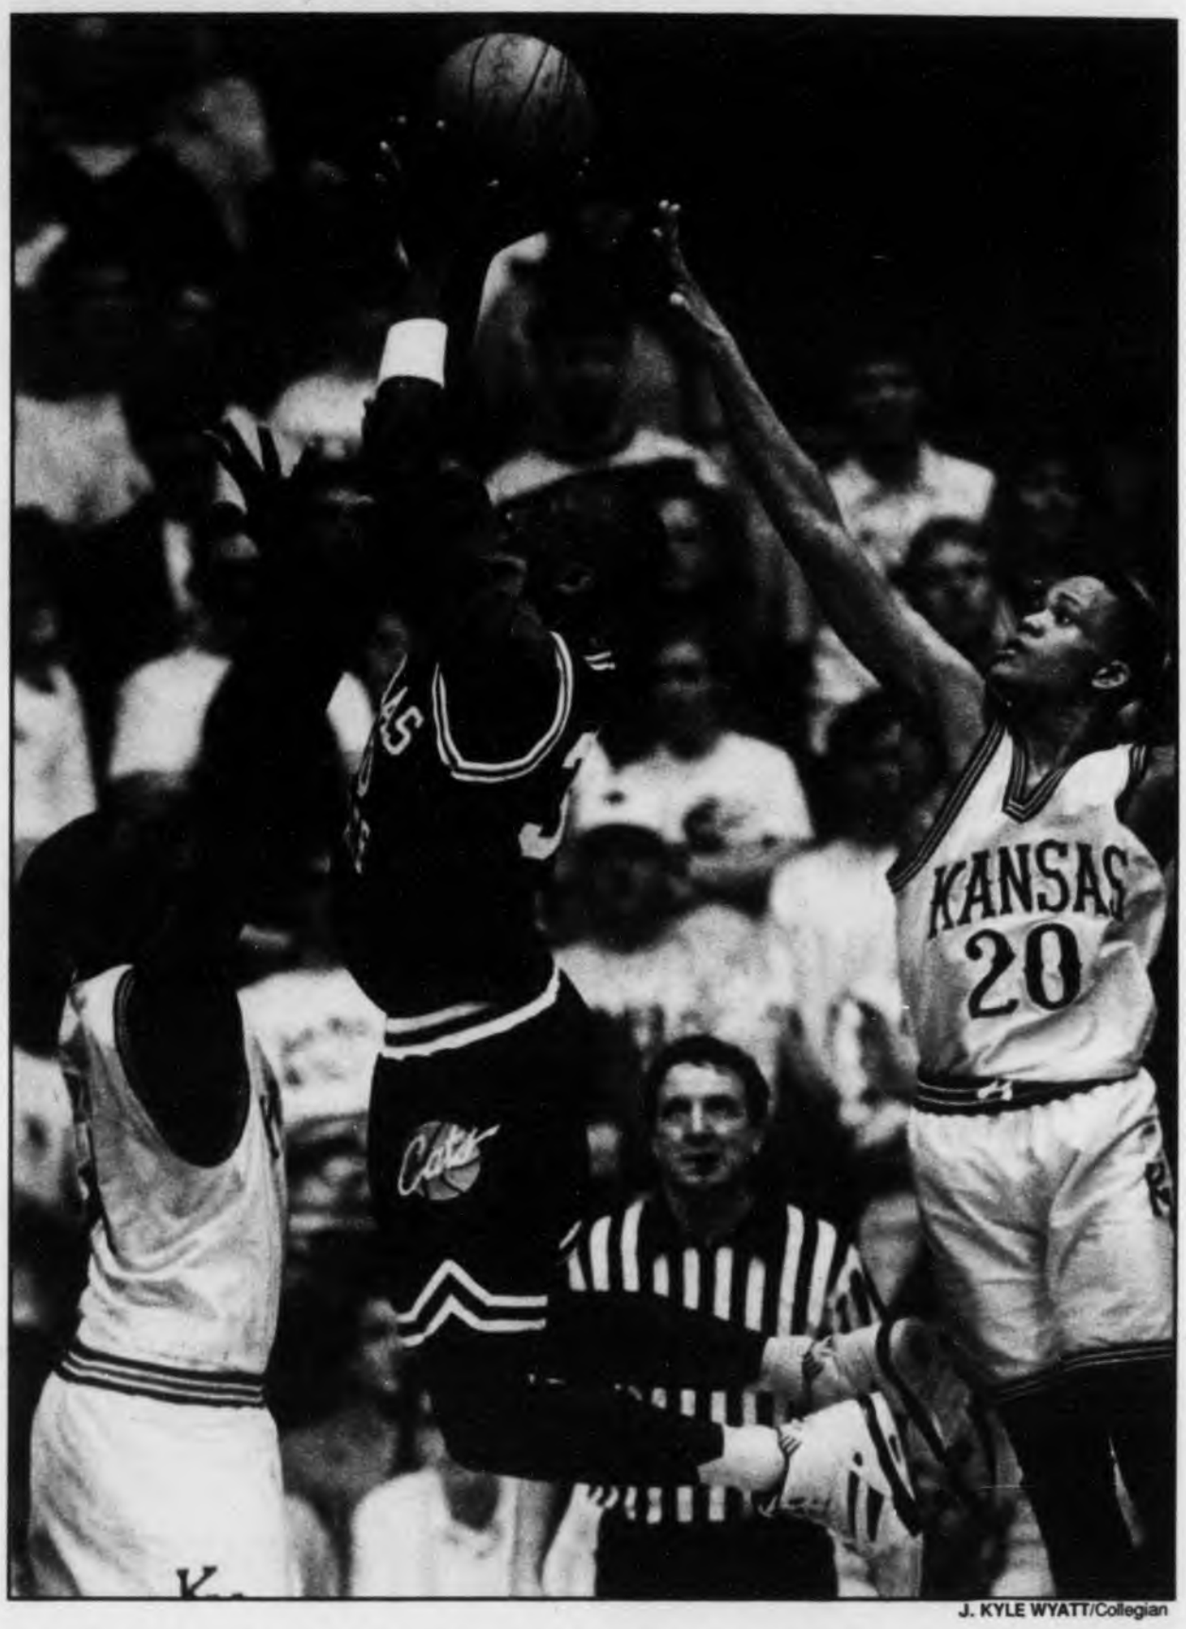
"If you're going to stay in a game like this one on the road, you've got to knock that shot down," Altman said.

Jones didn't, however, and Kansas kicked it into cruise control in the second 20 minutes, leading by as many as 25 at one point — 74-49 — when Pauley completed a conventional 3-point play with 7:27 remaining.

But despite the size of the second-half deficit and the margin of defeat, Altman was encouraged with his team's effort for the most part.

"I thought we at least continued to play throughout the game," he said. "And that's encouraging."

Another thing that encouraged Altman was the play of the trio of Jones, Nickerson and Vincent Jackson, who each scored in double figures, marking the first time in conference play that all three reached twin digits in the same contest.



Jones had 15 points to lead the Cats, while Nickerson had 14 and Jackson 10.

"I thought Vince Jackson in particular did some good things," Altman said of the junior college transfer, who also had six rebounds — including five on the defensive end — in just under 22 minutes of work.

Altman, though noting the strange nature of what he was saying, pointed to a 15-turnover performance by K-State as an encouraging sign.

"Fifteen's not bad," he said. "I know that's an awkward statement, but in this place with all the presses and defenses, I think 15's not bad."

All of the positives — even if they were small — weren't enough to get it done for K-State, which will be idle until Saturday's meeting with Nebraska in Bramlage Coliseum.

INSIDE STUFF

Pauley, Jamison provide inside punch for Hawks

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

LAWRENCE — Rex Walters and Adonis Jordan. Adonis Jordan and Rex Walters. Three-pointers from everywhere. Pressure out front.

When talking about the Kansas basketball team, several recurring themes always seem to pop up.

But Monday night, in KU's 80-58 win over K-State in Allen Fieldhouse, the story of the game for the No. 3 Jayhawks was the inside play of center Eric Pauley and forward Alonzo Jamison.

Pauley had a career-best 17 points and Jamison knocked home 16 more as KU grabbed its fifth-consecutive win over its arch-rivals from Manhattan.

Jamison has been a consistent thorn in K-State's side in recent seasons, but the effort of junior college transfer Pauley was somewhat of a surprise, K-State coach Dana Altman said.

"He had a very good ballgame," Altman said of Pauley, who had five rebounds and went 8 of 10 from the floor. "He shot the ball awfully well."

The success was welcome for Pauley, who admittedly has struggled at times in his first season in Lawrence before getting some things untracked of late in conference play.

"Shots weren't going in ... I was in a big, big slump," Pauley said in recounting his early-year woes. "I wasn't even rebounding."

But balanced scoring efforts in both halves Monday night — he had 8 points in the first half and 9 in the second — gave Pauley something he's steadily been gaining more of lately: confidence.

"I'm very, very critical of myself," he said. "But my confidence has been up lately, and that's a big part of what I was able to do tonight, especially offensively."

The 17-point effort bested Pauley's previous 16-point outings against Southern Mississippi and Colorado.

And it came at a great time, he said.

"It felt super to do it tonight," Pauley said. "This is a solid rivalry, and I was glad to take a big part in our win."

Also stepping up big was Jamison, the Big Eight's player of the week last week, who showed why he's regarded as one of the loop's best.

Jamison's effort left Altman and Askia Jones — who was responsible for guarding him all night long — in awe.

"Jamison has always been a tough match for us," Altman said of the 6-6 bruiser.

The toughness Jamison possesses comes from a variety of areas, Jones said.

"He's just a great, fundamentally sound player," Jones said of Jamison. "He's got a knack for the game and is just a super team player."

Though realizing he has had some success against K-State through the years, Jamison wanted to keep it all in perspective on the court.

"I just go out and try to do what I can and nothing more," he said. "I think I knew that if I started hitting shots and played good defense, good things would happen."

Jamison got done at least half of what he wanted to get done.

"Offensively, I think I played well," he said. "But at the defensive end, I was late in getting to the shot."

Jones had 15 points — his best in a Big Eight game — against Jamison Monday night.

Netters open season against Brigham Young

Respect is one thing, winning is another says netter coach Bietau

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

It's tennis time again.

K-State's netters open their spring season at 11 a.m. Saturday with Brigham Young at the Wood Valley Club in Topeka.

According to Coach Steve Bietau, BYU is the right opponent at the right time to see where his nationally ranked players stand.

"I think it will be a good match," Bietau said. "I don't know if a win is realistic yet, but I expect us to be very competitive.

"BYU is a team that has a tremendous reputation," he said. "They've been in the top 15 or 20 in the country for the last 10 or 12 years. I know their depth is very good, and I know their doubles teams are much better than they were last semester."

Respect is one thing, Bietau said. Knowing his team can now compete with BYU is another. The times when K-State knew they would lose 7-1 or 7-2 even before the matches are over.

In last fall's meeting with BYU, Karin Lusnic beat Jennifer Holmes in two sets at the Riviera Championships, while Michèle Riniker won against Evica Koljanin at the Regionals.

"We had some individual success against them this fall," Bietau said. "But the thing that is different now is that it's a team match, not an individual. So you have to look how the team's depth is, how strong the three doubles are and who they have on position five and six. Because all those matches count."

And Bietau admitted that BYU has a very strong roster, placing five players among the top 25 in the region.

"They got a new player in January who'll be in the top spots," he said. "And (No. 7 in the region) Koljanin has been losing some challenge matches. I wouldn't be surprised to see her on position four or even five."

The netter's answer on that is simple, setting on the strength of their top players and of the players' ability to play hard in competition.

"We want to see Karin going in more (to the net), and we want Michèle to pick up where she left off last fall," Bietau said. "Mareke (Plocher), Suzanne (Sim) and Neili (Wilcox) are good competitors and play hard regardless of who it is."

Bietau said Plocher, Riniker and Lusnic will play on the top three positions, and Wilcox and Sim are set on four and five. Number six is still open between Amy Grantham and Martine Shrubsole, since both players are a little bit sore. However, Bietau said he hasn't made a final decision of who is playing on what position against BYU.

For the doubles Plocher and Lusnic, and Riniker and Wilcox are planned to play the top two doubles while the third combination is not set yet.

Overall, Bietau said the match against BYU is one of several preparation duals for the Big Eight season, which starts in April.

"If we can win the match, it would be a great step for us," he said. "But it's still conceivable not to win and still have a good match."

Dance to benefit bone marrow bank

Block & Bridle fundraiser for those on waiting list

MEGAN MULLIKIN
Collegian

Block & Bridle has planned a fundraiser to benefit persons waiting for bone marrow transplants.

"Giving the Chance of Life" was designated by Block & Bridle as the theme of a bone dance, which will increase the bone marrow bank that can benefit anyone who needs bone marrow.

FABRIZIUS

"Block & Bridle got the idea after we found out that Julie Fabrizius, one of our members, had chronic myelogenous leukemia," Danette King, senior in animal sciences and industry, said.

"We decided we wanted to help by increasing the bone marrow at the bank."

The dance will be from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. Feb. 8 at the Blue River Pub. The dance is open to the public, and the cover charge is $5. The money raised at the dance is needed to fund the blood drive scheduled for Feb. 24.

King said it costs from $50 to $75 to test each donor's blood in hopes of a possible marrow match.

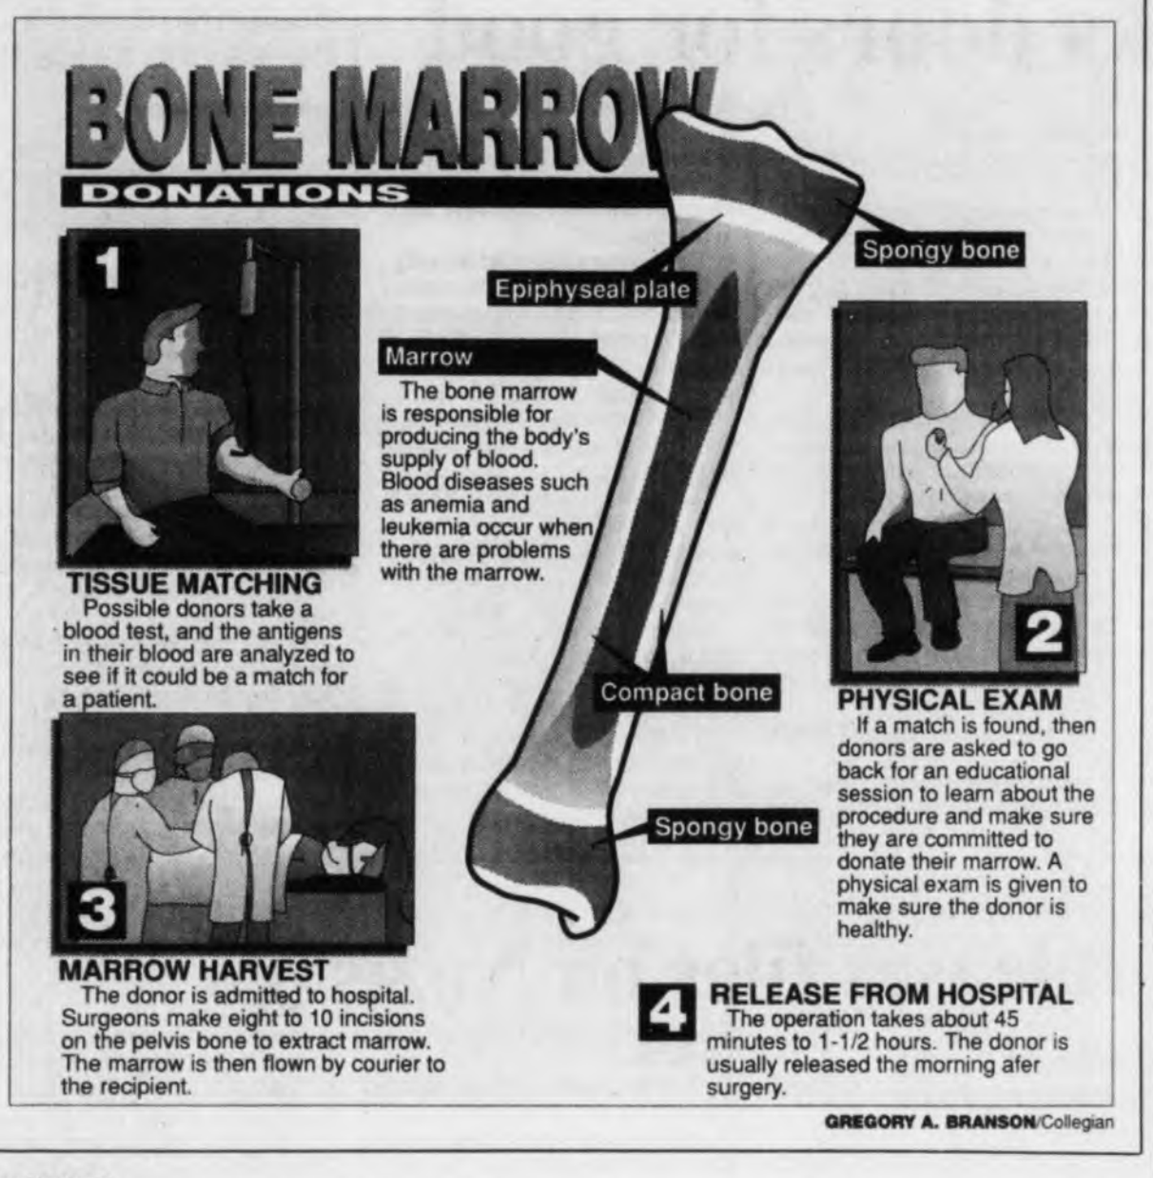
"Everything is being donated, including the rent for Blue River Pub and the disc jockey. All the money made at the door will go directly to the blood drive," she said.

To get a match, the donor's blood must have the same six antigens (genetic make-up) as the patient's blood.

Fabrizius, senior in animal sciences and communications, said these are the only antigens that can be tested. She also said there is never a perfect match, because other antigens are still a factor.

At the last blood drive, King said, the group ran out of money because about 300 more people than expected donated blood.

The group needs to raise $25,000 this time to accommodate the students willing to donate. King said they are expecting about 500 people.



"The support at the last drive was fabulous. It blew our minds," she said.

King said Block & Bridle has helped nearly double the amount of bone marrow in the bank in Kansas.

"I never dreamed we'd get that many people. Everyone has been great. K-State is full of good people," Fabrizius said.

A person's chance of receiving the needed bone marrow could be as low as one in a million. As of now,

Haiti

Amnesty International said the United States was responsible for safeguarding the Haitian boat people.

"We don't know that everyone is going to be arrested, tortured or killed, but it is certainly a risk," spokeswoman Anita Tiessen said.

Amnesty reported last month more than 1,500 people had been killed in Haiti since the coup in a systematic campaign of political repression.

The Red Cross reported no serious illness among the boat people, although many said they had lost weight and were exhausted.

They stood quietly in line and followed instructions without complaint as they were met by port police, immigration officials, U.S. diplomats and a couple dozen foreign correspondents. They answered roll call and were passed through immigration after being identified and fingerprinted.

Red Cross volunteers gave each food cards, $15 cash — enough for bus fare home and a meal — and a ride to provincial bus stations. The food cards can be redeemed at Red Cross stations across the country, the Western Hemisphere's most impoverished.

An OAS economic blockade aimed at forcing Aristide's return has made life even more difficult than it was before the coup.

UNICORN provides campus information

CHRISTINA CARBAJAL

K-State now has a new way students, faculty and staff can get information about campus events, class line schedules, campus job opportunities or current weather information.

The University Central Online Resource Network is an information system now available on K-State's main computer, said Betsy Edwards, computing and network services staff assistant.

UNICORN, which CNS began in the fall, is open to students, faculty and staff by obtaining a free computing account from offices in Cardwell 25, Edwards said.

"If you have an account, you can use certain campus computers and get on the University's academic computing system, which stores UNICORN," she said. "Already, about 7,000 students and 1,800 faculty and staff have accounts, and the numbers will grow as more people discover how easy and time-saving it is."

She said users of the UNICORN program don't need to know much about computers because no special commands or techniques are needed, and all the instructions are shown on

Schnauzer saves owners' lives

Dog alerts family to gas leak, wins pet of the year award

ASSOCIATED PRESS

RANSOM — Zak the schnauzer was named pet of the year in Kansas for alerting the family of a K-State student to a leak of deadly carbon monoxide gas in their home.

Cindy Rufenacht, senior in accounting, was unavailable for comment Monday night.

Zak, honored by the Kansas Veterinary Medicine Association, alerted the family after a then 17-year-old Cindy was overcome by the gas in her basement room.

Everyone, including Cindy, was able to get out of the house. They've all since recovered from the gas leak during the 1988 Super Bowl weekend.

The veterinary association said since this was the first year it honored a pet, it extended nominations past last year.

The Rufenacht family had returned to their western Kansas home from a party that weekend. Cindy Rufenacht went to her basement room, and the rest of the family gathered in the kitchen.

Zak followed Cindy downstairs. He always stayed with a family member who was sick, Doris Rufenacht said.

"We heard Zak bark ... just one howl," Doris said. "We thought he was outside, so we went out to look for him, but we couldn't find him."

Alex Rufenacht, 16, shortly afterward found his sister passed out. He yelled for help.

Doris then found Zak under a dresser.

"We thought he was dead," said Doris, who by then was feeling woozy herself.

Alex was sent to call an ambulance and took the seemingly dead Zak outside. By the time the ambulance arrived, Doris, too, had passed out.

The family was rushed to a hospital and later underwent intensive 24-hour oxygen therapy.

Career center seeks better liaison with students

New ambassador group helps inform peers about services, gives feedback

KRISTIN SCHMIDT
Collegian

A new student liaison group is in place at the Career Planning and Placement Center.

Director Jim Akin said he hopes it will expose more students to the center's services.

In spring 1991, each college dean was asked to select two students to represent the college as ambassadors to Career Planning and Placement.

The 14 members of the Student Liaison Committee meet once a month to discuss the center's services, to think of new ways the center can reach students and to solve problems the center is experiencing in reaching students, Akin said.

He said many students do not know what the center has to offer.

"We're there to help people explore and establish career goals, and then help them reach toward those goals as they near graduation," Akin said.

The group takes an individual approach.

Members take information from the meeting back to their interest groups, classmates and friends, said Scott Aberle, senior in mechanical engineering and president of the group.

The best thing about the group, Akin said, is that members share the ways people are getting information about the center to their peers.

These ideas have led to satellite tables for the center, which are being set up in Durland Hall, as well as a column about the center that appears monthly in the College of Human Ecology newsletter.

Tracey Fraser, assistant director of Career Planning and Placement, said another benefit is the immediate feedback and response from students.

The committee helps the staff get an idea about how they can reach students and why some students don't use the services, Aberle said.

Akin said he thinks the group has had a positive effect on the center. The result is more students using the programs and services, he said.

Akin attributed the greater use to the state of the job market and the higher percentage of seniors.

In the future, Akin said, he would like to add more diversity to the group by adding graduate students.

AGGIEVILLE

Eegee's unable to pay bills, locks doors for good

Owner cites food prices, labor, school breaks as reasons for closing

JENNIFER BEALS
Collegian

One Aggieville tradition is now only a memory.

Eegee's Restaurant and Ice Creamery, 1129 Laramie St., locked its doors forever Dec. 8, 1991.

King Crawford, former owner and manager, said there were many reasons for the closing.

"I take some blame," he said. "Labor, cost values and food prices went up, and I just didn't identify the slowing of the economy."

Crawford also said Operation Desert Storm and student vacations contributed to the store's financial woes.

"When the troops were deployed to Saudi Arabia, and the students left for vacation, Aggieville turned into a ghost town.

"Money was tight, and the only restaurants that survived were multi-store corporations," he said.

This is not the first time Eegee's has closed. In February 1991, Crawford closed the doors and filed Chapter 11 Reorganization Bankruptcy.

"This type of bankruptcy protects the business from tax collectors and others to whom we owe money," Crawford said.

"It also allows the business a break to make money and to pay taxes and bills."

Crawford said one stipulation of the bankruptcy agreement was for the owners to have a plan to begin the payback of debts in January 1992.

Eegee's doors reopened March 23, 1991.

"We started to make money in March and April. Then we faced the summer months of June and July, which are always the worst months historically," Crawford said.

"As we progressed from August through November, we were back on the plus side."

This is where Eegee's hit a snag.

Crawford said that in December, another historically tough month, Eegee's began to survey the past months and found there was no way to make the payments.

On a Sunday night in December, the doors of Eegee's were locked for the last time.

"Everyone wanted me to keep it open the last week, but I felt I'd deceive the students by having them go home on vacation believing we were here," Crawford said.

Laura Palmer, K-State alumna, said it was kind of shocking.

"Eegee's never seemed like it was having problems," she said.

Bill McGuire, junior in electrical engineering, said, "I only ate there a few times, but it was my favorite place to eat."

AGGIEVILLE

Live music bar revives the past

Brother's again stopping point for bands and students

KRISTIN SCHMIDT
Collegian

A new generation of K-Staters will get a chance to experience a bit of the past when Brother's bar reclaims its space in Aggieville.

Owners Joel Stone, senior in radio-television, and Chris Glamann, KU graduate, bought the bar, which was formerly Study Hall, at 1120 Moro.

Stone and Glamann said they decided to reopen it as Brother's because it once had strong ties to K-State.

Opening day is planned for Feb. 6.

"Brother's was always one of those places. You heard of Aggieville, but you also heard about Brother's," Stone said.

Stone and Glamann are both members of the band Mere Mortals. Stone said they decided live music in a setting diverse kinds of people could enjoy is the key to making Brother's popular again.

Stone also said Aggieville lacks a bar that serves as a stopping point for many new bands, and students would appreciate having the option to hear live music more often.

"The whole thing behind Aggieville is to have choices," Stone said.

"I want it to be a place where everyone can go. I want greeks and people who have nothing to do with that."

Stone said he and Glamann will make the music at Brother's diverse enough to attract all groups of students. This includes, he said, the possibility of having jazz musicians play occasionally.

Because of their ties to the music business, Glamann said, they have resources other club owners don't have. He said their knowledge of area bands and their ability to book bigger-name bands has advantages.

Bands will be scheduled to play every Thursday and Friday night, and a disc jockey will play dance music on Saturday nights, Glamann said.

To complete the bar's "total image change," A.J. Johnson, senior in radio-television and Brother's manager, said they will hire "employees who want to work here and are nice to the customers."

In addition to the changing focus of the bar, Glamann and Stone made changes in the decor.

They have painted the ceiling, the walls and the entryway in dark green, gray and burgundy.

With the help of friends, they also sanded and refinished the floor, recovered the dance floor in black-and-white tiles and repaired the restrooms, Stone said.

Changes also had to be made to accommodate the live music format.

The left end of the dance floor, which also serves as the stage, was removed to "get more seats around the stage, so everyone can see what's going on," Stone said.

Glamann and Stone also added a permanent sound system and an extra lighting system of 50-60 lights exclusively for the bands. These are in addition to the lighting already on the dance floor.

Stone said the system will save them from having to rent one each time a band plays.

Glamann said they can hire bands for less money if the band does not have to bring that equipment.

They also had the DJ booth repositioned to keep most of the sound on the dance floor, Stone said.

According to Glamann, a goal of Brother's is to "keep things different."

Argentina releases files on Nazis

Records could document rumor that men fled to country after WWII

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina — After decades of secrecy, the government of Argentina on Monday displayed some of its files on Nazis who fled to Argentina after World War II.

The Argentinean government also said all the files would be made public soon.

"This is a debt Argentina is paying to humanity," President Carlos Menem told a news conference attended by Cabinet ministers, foreign ambassadors, Nazi hunters and reporters from around the world.

Experts said the documents might shed light on some of history's dark corners, particularly on how former top Nazis vanished from Europe as the Third Reich collapsed and showed up months and years later in this South American nation.

The Nazis came presumably because Argentina's president then, Juan Domingo Peron, admired Adolf Hitler and his Fascist ally, Benito Mussolini of Italy.

The files now are locked away by the Federal Police, Immigration Department and other agencies. Menem's decree removed them from protection by an official secrets act and ordered them collected by the National Archives.

They are to be turned over within 30 days and will be opened for public inspection as soon as they are put on microfilm.

Adolf Eichmann, the architect of Hitler's attempted extermination of Europe's Jews, found refuge here. So did Josef Mengele, the "Angel of Death" at the Auschwitz concentration camp. There have been rumors of sightings of Martin Bormann, Hitler's top deputy who many experts think died in Berlin in 1945.

"There are all types of stories about (escapes) with the cooperation of ... the Vatican and the International Red Cross," said Shimon Samuels of the Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust studies. "I think it's very important to prove what happened."

Eichmann was kidnapped by Israeli commandos in 1960, taken to Jerusalem for trial, convicted and hanged. Mengele's family said he drowned in Brazil in 1979.

Josef Schwammberger, a commandant at labor camps in Poland, was extradited in 1990 and now is on trial in Stuttgart, Germany, for war crimes.

Schwammberger, now 79, lived in Argentina under his own name.

So did Mengele, who obtained a driver's license and an identity card from police, the magazine Somos reported over the weekend, after apparently having had at least limited access to the Federal Police files.

Aides said Menem was moved to act by requests from the World Jewish Congress and unfavorable publicity in newspapers for not doing so.

"Today, we are putting at the disposition of the entire world something that for years Argentina has guarded," Interior Minister Jose Luis Manzano said. "It's not as much as has been speculated, nor as little as we would have liked."

CAMPUS

K-State plugs into educational network

Video transmits engineering class live to UMKC; students can call in questions

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

K-State is offering a course in electrical engineering this semester through the Kansas City Educational Network.

KC Ed Net is a consortium among a number of universities in the Kansas City area.

"Basically, the network was formed in spring 1991," said Lance Lewis, program coordinator in the Division of Continuing Education.

K-State, the University of Missouri at Kansas City, Kansas City metropolitan community colleges and Central Missouri State University are members of the network.

"UMKC is the central link of the network from where all the signals are spread to the participating schools," Lewis said.

Fault Analysis and Protection of Electric Power System is a class taught at K-State and transmitted to UMKC via compressed video.

David Soldan, head of the electrical and computer engineering department, explained technically how the transmission works.

"You have two TV cameras and a production crew in the classroom that televises the signal," Soldan said.

"That signal then is put into a fiber-optic cable and compressed in a codec, which is fed into the telephone system. A wire connection then sends the signal down to UMKC, where it decodes the signal and turns it back into a video picture."

The basic difference between KC Ed Net and the existing TELENET regents network already at K-State is that KC Ed Net is a one-way video and two-way audio system. TELENET is a one-way audio system.

Students at UMKC who are enrolled at K-State have video screens and telephones in their classroom.

"UMKC students have the capability to interact with the instructor via the telephone," Lewis said.

"In other words, someone in Kansas City can call in a question to the instructor."

For students sitting in the classroom in Manhattan, it is a class like any other, said Anil Pahwa, associate professor of electrical and computer engineering.

"As far as learning, it's not different," said Pahwa, who teaches the class. "We learn the same thing as we would without television."

The only difference, he said, is that his preparation is slightly different, and students can call in from another university while he is lecturing.

Students at K-State pay the usual fee for taking the course, Lewis said.

"For the students in Kansas City, there is an additional fee of $150 per credit hour," he said.

"It's not really inexpensive. However, it does give us the opportunity to teach the class live in Kansas City, versus teaching it on a video basis or having an instructor driving back and forth."

Tests are given in college to test comprehension of a certain subject. If a student can not take the ACT well, he is likely to have problems taking tests in college, he said.

Richard Harris, professor of psychology, has a similar outlook on the accuracy of the test.

"The ACT is supposed to predict a student's ability in college," Harris said.

Harris said if that means testing how well a student takes a test, then that is how it should be, since that is basically what goes on at a university.

Harris said one way this knowledge is helpful in advising may be in determination of how many hours a student should take.

If they do not score exceptionally high in an area, students may not want to take a lot of hours when they are working with that area, he said.

Also, if advisers know of problem areas, he said, they may request help, such as a tutoring service.

Students sometimes will take the test more than once.

Lynch said some students will take the test their junior year of high school and score low in a certain area because they have not had a class in that area yet.

He said it would then be to their advantage to retake the test a year or so after they have had a class in the area where they scored poorly. This way, he said, the test is a more accurate report of their knowledge.

Harris said he feels the ACT is a good measure of how students could do in college if properly advised.

One complaint Harris has about the ACT is that it is sometimes thought of an intelligence test, when it is really only a test of a student's ability.

completely redone, Lynch said. The test used to test in the areas of English, math, social studies, reading and natural sciences.

The test was redone to better suit the needs of improved education, he said.

Along with the test being changed, he said, the results have also been improved.

Another reason for the tests being so divided in the United States is the initial use of the tests.

Don Hoyt, assistant provost for planning and evaluation services, said the SAT was first used in private education for selective admission to schools.

Since there are not that many private schools in the Midwest, he said, the ACT was used in public schools that have non-selective admission.

Hoyt said the ACT first came about because schools needed a way to evaluate a student's past education without each school having its own test. He said it was a real hassle for anyone transferring to another school, because they would have to take a new set of tests.

With the ACT, there is now a universal way all schools may evaluate a student's past education, Hoyt said.

He said K-State uses the ACT because that is what everyone here is used to using.

Not only is the familiarity of the test important, Hoyt said, but the complex report ACT sends to the school concerning the student's test is helpful to advisers in placing students in the proper classes.

the computer screen.

Another attraction of UNICORN is that a variety of information is concentrated in one source, and it saves the user time when looking for different kind of information, Edwards said.

"We were looking for new vehicles to show a larger amount of people which classes were closed, and UNICORN could be used on advisers' computers when working with their students during enrollment," University Registrar Don Foster said.

Foster said he decided to use UNICORN because it was an easier way to keep the closed class list up to date.

Foster said he also included the fall line schedule in UNICORN because it saved time and allowed easy access to information as advisers and students planned their schedules.

Part of her job, Edwards said, was to find people like Foster who could benefit from the system. She said she keeps in mind how many people would actually use UNICORN when adding information to the system that could attract more users.

A new attraction called USA Today Update began Monday on the UNICORN system. Edwards said she hopes it will attract more users because articles from 20 different areas of the newspaper are summarized to give the user an easy, overall look at the day's news.

The USA Today Update will continue through Feb. 7 and possibly longer if it is successful and they can continue funding it, she said.

Exempt

Hochhauser said although some exemptions should be repealed, there are many that should be kept.

"If the Legislature decides to place sales tax on coin-operated laundries, then it would affect students greatly," Hochhauser said.

Hochhauser said she would not vote for such a tax.

Oleen said she agreed.

"We're not talking millions and millions of dollars to be raised by exemptions," Oleen said.

Oleen also said it would be difficult to gauge compliance with such a tax.

"We can say that we're going to start taxing coin-operated laundry, but how do you collect that?" she said. "Now if it's a utility bill, it's a printed thing. You've got the meter. You figure out 4.25 percent sales tax based upon how much fuel they've used. There's a record of it, and they either send it in or they don't. The compliance on that is high."

Oleen said she sees problems with taxing utilities as well.

"The ones that are big, the ones that make a difference where you can really start whackin' around and getting to the $217 million, they affect Kansans. And that's the utilities. That's the interstate phone calls — that's another one that will be big with the students."

K-State students are likely to be affected no matter what direction the Legislature takes.

Darren Landis, junior in pre-respiratory therapy, said that a tax on utilities and coin-operated laundry would affect him more than increased property taxes.

"We have a year lease, so that's not going to affect us," Landis said.

Landis said he spends about $12 a month on laundry and pays about $45 a month in utilities in off-campus housing.

"As for the future," Landis said, "The property tax will affect me more, whether I'm renting or owning."

There is definitely a battle brewing in Topeka as to how money is going to be raised for property tax relief and financing education in the 1993 budget year.

"I have heard the songs, seen the dances and so on," Oleen said, "And the music's not going to change down here until we really look at this as a state and say we are too dependent on property taxes. Sales and income are too low. We've got to make some adjustments."

Hochhauser said she would like to see a different plan, too.

"I would much rather see us talk about taking some of the exemptions away and increasing upper level income tax than the plan she has laid out," she said.

only 20 percent receive the marrow transplant, Fabrizius said.

If a million people donated, patients would have an excellent chance of getting the transplant, she said.

Tonya Brown, representative for the American Red Cross and Marrow Donor Program, said if a donor's tissue type matches the patient's, the headquarters of the National Marrow Donor Program will contact the potential donor.

This donor would go through an evaluation, including a physical. If the donor meets the criteria, then it would be up to the donor to contact the coordinator to go ahead with the transplant, Brown said.

She said the surgery usually consists of a local anesthetic and eight to 10 small incisions on the pelvic bone to extract the marrow.

It is standard procedure for the National Marrow Donor Program to use the pelvic bone, she said, but that might differ for other organizations.

The procedure takes from 45 minutes to an hour, and the donor is dismissed from the hospital the day after the surgery, Brown said.

GIS

used to determine the latitude and longitude of any object to be mapped.

"What we use is a receiver," Thompson said. "It's a lot like a radio receiver, if you want to think about it that way.

"This receiver receives information from positioning satellites, which are military navigational satellites, NAVSTAR.

"It will receive information from the satellites that will tell you what your latitude and longitude is. You can do that from anywhere in the world."

According to a report written by Thompson and his associate, Rick Miller, GIS coordinator for the Kansas Department of Health and Environment, the United States Department of Defense designed the NAVSTAR system to provide an accurate worldwide navigational system.

Currently, NAVSTAR consists of 16 satellites orbiting the earth twice a day at an altitude of about 12,500 miles.

"The constellation (all of the satellites) is not complete yet. But when they get all the satellites up there, it will be a 24-hour-a-day, seven-day-a-week system," Thompson said.

Thompson said the global positioning system unit could be set up over water sites, as well as contamination sites, to get their exact positioning in relation to each other.

He said eventually this will enable statewide GIS coverage of all the drinking water sites and contamination sites. This will allow for an almost exact picture of what danger contamination sites pose to drinking and irrigation water supplies, he said.

GIS will be used more as its potential is realized, Miller said.

Miller's project is to map all the drinking water wells in Kansas, as well as record when the wells were dug, how deep the wells are, who the owners are, where the owners live, whether there are any fresh water supplies and whether there are any waste water discharges.

According to a press release from the Division of Water Resources of the Kansas Department of Agriculture, the division has awarded K-State-Salina a $15,000 contract to map the irrigation wells around Garden City, using the GPS system.

The GPS receivers will be placed over the water wells to determine their position for mapping. The mapping will allow for the installation of water meters.

Staff Reporter Mark Engler contributed to this report.

McGowan teaches life, cognitive skills, empowers students

Multicultural education emphasized

RENEE NOSS
Collegian

An African proverb hangs on the bulletin board in Juanita McGowan's office: "When spider webs unite, they can tie up a lion."

The words are appropriate for a woman who has committed her life to meeting the needs of black students.

Juanita McGowan

McGowan, assistant professor of education, is a program planner for the Midwest Race and Desegregation Assistance Center.

The center, a federally funded project in the College of Education, works with public schools in Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa and Missouri to promote multicultural education.

McGowan works with a school district's central administrators, counselors, teachers and students to achieve what she calls a "multicultural education," assuring that all students, regardless of race, gender or national origin, are receiving quality education.

McGowan said although her job specifically requires her to work with personnel at public schools, the University community also allows her to volunteer her time to student leadership training.

"Most of my role is probably training, working with students and then speaking to them individually," McGowan said.

"I feel it's important for me to teach them everything I know and to share with them, because they truly are our future."

McGowan said her job is interesting because there is no telling who might come in.

"Probably most of my work is with African-American students. But there are some white students who I meet in different situations," she said.

Learning about oneself and culture is a life-long process, McGowan said. But, at some point, a person begins to realize his purpose in life and how everything fits together, she said.

McGowan began this process in the fourth grade when her school principal said she needed to retake the Stanford Achievement Test because her score was too high.

At this point, she said, she realized people had certain expectations of her because of her skin color.

"I wanted to get in and help people, and help people understand people with differences," McGowan said.

McGowan said she is sensitive to the needs of black students and feels a responsibility to be a role model and mentor.

She said she uses a holistic approach in her teaching, which focuses on cognitive skills as well as life skills.

"So much of my time is spent just encouraging students, helping them to believe in themselves, because they're powerful, they're knowledgeable," she said.

"It's just helping them to see that, supporting them and having someone to talk to. I think that's important."

McGowan said she believes Black History Month is an important tool in educating African-Americans about their heritage and the majority of the population about the contributions of blacks throughout history.

She said it's hard to fit everything all in one month.

"I think that as we celebrate life, and as we celebrate diversity, it should be a daily thing."

Dedra Martin, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, said she shares McGowan's attitude.

"Black History Month is a necessary educational tool for people who Soldiers repel coup efforts

Venezuelan government withstands takeover attempts by rebel troops

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CARACAS, Venezuela — Loyal soldiers repulsed an attack by rebel troops and tanks on the presidential palace Tuesday, crushing an attempt to topple one of Latin America's most stable democracies.

El Nacional newspaper reported 70 people were killed in the early morning attack, but the government gave no casualty figures. Government forces arrested 300 rebel soldiers as the rebellion against President Carlos Andres Perez quickly collapsed.

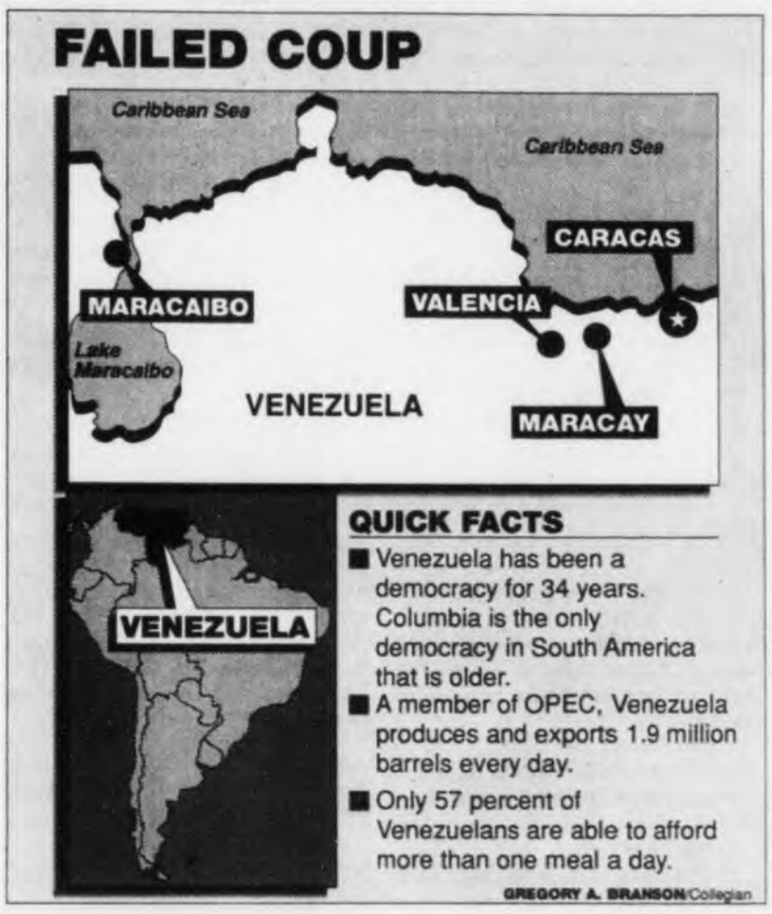
By Tuesday afternoon, Defense Minister Fernando Ochoa said loyal troops had completely suffocated the rebels, who had earlier abducted a state governor and staged attacks in the western cities of Maracay, Valencia and Maracaibo.

Witnesses said loyal F-16 fighter pilots fired on rebellious troops from the Paramacuay Armored Brigade in Valencia, 100 miles west of Caracas.

Ochoa said four leaders of a rebel paratroop regiment were among those arrested, including Lt. Col. Hugo Chavez, who in a TV address urged fellow fighters to surrender before more blood is shed.

Another detained coup leader, Lt. Col. Francisco Arias, said the rebels sought to rescue the Venezuelan people from politicians, demagoguery and bureaucracy.

The coup attempt followed violent protests and labor unrest arising from a growing disparity between rich and poor in Venezuela.



The government of this oil-rich nation, an OPEC member, has admitted just 57 percent of Venezuelans are able to afford more than one meal a day.

A border dispute with Colombia has created tension between Perez and the military, which opposes giving Colombia rights to the oil-and mineral-rich Gulf of Venezuela.

Soldiers, like many others in the country, have seen their wages shrink dramatically because of inflation.

Arias said rebels chose Feb. 4 for the uprising to mark the birthday of Venezuelan hero Antonio Jose de Sure, the second-in-command in Simon Bolivar's war against Spanish rule in the early 19th century.

Residency hard to establish

DOUGLAS GRUSH
Collegian

Out-of-state students pay nearly $2,000 more in tuition and fees than Kansas residents, and some say the policy is flawed.

The 4,148 non-resident students make up 25 percent of the student body.

Non-resident fees are $2,688.45, while resident fees are $849.45.

University guidelines classify non-resident students as those from outside Kansas — except for a few military provisions.

In order to receive resident status, students must sit out a year without attending school while simultaneously adhering to more than a dozen policies to qualify for resident status, said Gunile DeVault, associate registrar.

Many of the students who pay non-resident tuition and fees are graduate students, DeVault said. They are also often from other countries, he said.

Policies to acquire residency in Kansas include working to pay state taxes, registering to vote and signing a statement of intention of residency.

Students such as Mike Riolo, senior in computer science, say the poli-

Pick-up lines: cute, crude or Cro-Magnon?

TARA HUN
Collegian

Before going to college, Lisa Ruskanen, freshman in psychology, received a warning.

It came from one of her father's best friends.

He said if a young man approached her at a party and said, "Was someone in your family a thief? He stole that twinkle from the stars and put it in your eyes," she had better stay away from him.

That line, he said, was in use back in the 1960s.

Lisa's father's friend intended this as a warning, but Lisa took it differently.

She wondered how many pick-up lines were floating around Manhattan these days. She began to listen for them at parties, and wrote down the ones she liked.

Now, she has a list of more than 30 posted on her door at 410 Moore Hall for all passersby to see.

From the seemingly simple, "My roommate's out of town," to the innuendo, "That's a nice shirt, but it'd look better crumpled up on my floor," to the lines of an old country song, "If I told you you have a beautiful body, would you hold it against me?"

Does Lisa actually use these lines?

"Just for fun," she said. "It's funny to see the initial expressions on people's faces. Then they usually laugh and tell you one."

SHANE KEYSER/Collegian

Lisa Ruskanen, freshman in psychology, has gathered a collection of pick-up lines, which she updates regularly and posts on the door of her room. According to Ruskanen, people just started leaving her notes with different lines they had heard.

WORST WORLD'S GREATEST PICK-UP LINES

■ Fuck me if I'm wrong, but do I know you?

■ My roommate's out of town.

■ Can I see your room? Wanna see my room?

■ Do you want to have pizza and fuck? What – you don't like pizza?

■ Your pants are so clean, I can see myself in them.

■ Can I see your tan lines?

■ I'm not trying anything. I always put my hand there.

■ Have I seen you before? No? Oh, I must have seen you in my dreams.

■ Hi, how are you? Pretty good. I know you're pretty, but are you good?

■ Wanna go back to my place and do the things I'm gonna tell my friends we did anyway?

■ Wanna have some good, clean fun? Neither do I.

■ Are you a real cowboy? Will you teach me how to ride?

■ If I swore you were an angel, would you treat me like the devil tonight?

■ Beauty is only a lightswitch away.

RECOGNITION

▶SEILER EARNS WOLF CREEK SCHOLARSHIP

THOMAS LISTER
Collegian

Craig Seiler, junior in civil engineering, received a $1,000 scholarship from Wolf Creek Nuclear Operating Corporation.

Seiler received the scholarship after writing a paper on the future of electricity.

While at K-State, Seiler has maintained a grade point average above 3.5 and been a member of the student chapter of the American Society of Civil Engineers.

Seiler was an engineering ambassador and served on standing committees for the Student Governing Association. Seiler currently works at U-LearN.

Seiler said he is planning to emphasize in environmental engineering.

Wolf Creek offered similar scholarships to Wichita State University and the University of Kansas.

One winner was selected from each school.

▶SCHALLES ELECTED TO SIMMENTAL BOARD

JENNIFER NICHOLS
Collegian

Robert Schalles, professor of animal breeding and genetics, has been elected to the American Simmental Association's board of trustees.

The ASA is an organization in which members own and breed Simmental cattle, a type of beef cattle that originated in Switzerland, Schalles said.

Schalles said he believes his job at the University will help him in his work on the board. Currently, he is working on a genetic beef improvement program.

"Basically, the objectives that all of us have in meat production, regardless of what breed or where we're working, is to produce a high-quality product," Schalles said.

"And over the past good number of years now, consumers have wanted to decrease fat or calorie intake and still maintain the quality of the protein. A lot of that is done through the genetics of the animal."

Schalles has been president of the Kansas Simmental Association for two terms and has written three brochures and several magazine articles for the ASA.

He has served on the ASA publications board and owns 20 Simmentals.

"I always enjoy working with cattle," Schalles said. "It's an important part of the food supply for the people."

Schalles's term began in January.

▶HAVLIN RECEIVES NELSON AWARD

CARMEN DAY
Collegian

John Havlin, associate professor of agronomy, was recently presented the Werner L. Nelson Award from the Fluid Fertilizer Foundation and the National Fertilizer Solutions Association.

Gerry Posler, head of the agronomy department, said Havlin's work in the development of soil fertility and plant nutrition management contributed to winning the award.

"He is trying to increase crop yields for the benefit of the American farmer and consumer," Posler said.

Havlin said the goal of his research is to develop nutrient management systems that will maximize productivity and profitability, and at the same time, sustain soil productivity and environmental quality.

"There seems to be this sense out there that in order to have a clean environment and internally productive food production system, you have to do this without fertilizers," he said.

"You must just use the products wisely and prudently while maintaining yields and making money on farms."

Although Havlin has been busy with research, he said teaching is his favorite part of the job.

"I love it the most," he said.

Randy Brown, research assistant and graduate student in agronomy, said he respects Havlin and the achievements he's made.

"John is a very deserving recipient of this award. He has an extremely good relationship with both industry and university professionals, and with his students," he said.

Motorcyclist runs over student's foot —

Ikehara sustains minor injury

Hinata Ikehara winces as EMS workers load her onto a gurney Tuesday afternoon near Calvin Hall. Ikehara suffered a severely sprained ankle after a motorcyclist inadvertently ran over her foot.

A motorcyclist inadvertently ran over a student's foot Tuesday afternoon as she tried to cross the street in front of the Calvin Hall circular drive.

Hinata Ikehara, 22, sophomore in the English Language Program and Goodnow Hall resident, said she looked both ways before attempting to cross to the sidewalk on Mid-Campus Drive and did not see the motorcycle, K-State Police Officer Roy Doughty said.

The motorcyclist said Ikehara stepped right out in front of him, and it was too late to even slow down when he saw her.

The motorcyclist remained on the scene until help arrived and signed a statement for the campus police.

No charges were filed in what was determined to be a pedestrian/vehicle accident, Officer Mike Baysinger said.

"I review statements from both sides before making a determination on whether or not charges will be filed," Baysinger said.

Ikehara's foot was braced at the scene, and she was transported at 3:40 p.m. by Riley County Ambulance to Memorial Hospital.

Ikehara said her foot was severely sprained, but not broken, and she was released from the hospital.

Sex scenes exciting but distracting in 'Henry and June'

Story of Nin's search for purity overshadowed

JENNIFER BEALS
Collegian

There is a thin line between love and lust.

"Henry and June," starring Maria De Medeiros, Fred Ward, Uma Thurman and Richard Grant, is the story of one woman's uncontrollable passions and her search for innocence and purity.

The film, based on the novels of Anais Nin, is set between the villas of the rich, French countryside and the back alleys of Paris in the 1930s.

Anais Nin(De Medeiros) is a woman of many facets.

Throughout the entire movie, she constantly searches for love from friends and strangers. Driven by her insatiable libido, she attains many lovers, but never captures what she really wants — love.

Anais also fools the audience into believing she's a virtuous woman. She plays up her demure looks to fool her husband, Hugo (Grant), and to tease others. De Medeiros conveys a vast amount of emotion in her eyes, so there's no need for words.

Another facet of Anais is her pursuit of innocence. As she cheats on her husband and her lovers, she constantly wishes she were virginal.

As the plot develops, the audience meets Henry Miller, an American writer played by Fred Ward.

Miller immediately captures the eyes and interests of Anais. At first, Anais is fascinated by Miller's charms and rugged personality. Later, she discovers the truth about his life.

His wife, June (Uma Thurman), is an actress who has left him for another woman. Miller is obviously upset by this and feels that he just can't trust women.

To make matters worse, June arrives on the scene shortly after Henry begins to get his footing.

Anais and June begin to be good friends, but as before, Anais gives June the eye, just as she would look at her other lovers. They also begin what turns out to be just another short-lived relationship.

The plot of "Henry and June" is submerged.

Director Philip Kaufman hid the storyline between numerous sex scenes and boring, drawn-out holes in the script.

K-State accessibility examined

Compliance with disability act focus of committee

ROB DE CORTIE
Collegian

Insufficient parking at Anderson Hall, slippery floors in Eisenhower Hall and illegible signs were just some of the concerns expressed Tuesday night at a meeting regarding the Americans With Disabilities Act.

A committee formed by K-State President Jon Wefald met to examine K-State's policies, practices and facilities involving the disabled to ensure compliance with the act.

The act passed by Congress describes in detail the responsibilities of the private and public sector toward the disabled. The federal law took effect Jan. 26.

Other issues discussed during the meeting included housing for handicapped people, stairways at Bramlage Coliseum, transportation at night, the legibility of computers and the accessibility of public accommodations such as the K-State Union and McCain Auditorium.

The ADA committee is made up of 20 people. Members include administrators, faculty, staff and students.

The committee is then divided into four sections: Employment issues, public accommodations and services, physical accessibility and academic services.

The act covers a wide range of activities most people usually don't relate directly to the disabled, said Ronald Downey, interim director of Planning and Evaluation Services and co-chairman of the committee.

"The reason for this meeting was to get input," he said.

"I think the concerns that have been expressed are very helpful for the committee to do the things that need to be done."

Downey said each subcommittee will study the issues thoroughly and come up with recommendations.

"We hope to be finished with this by April 1," he said.

Paul Palenske, Manhattan resident, said he hopes the committee will come up with a comprehensive plan.

"Bring a brand-new handicapped person to K-State," he said.

"Let's make him go to some meetings, make sure he has to go to the bathroom and make sure he wants something to eat or drink. Boy, this person is going to have some problems."

Sen. David Morales Bello, an ally of Perez, said in Congress that three of Perez' bodyguards were killed in the palace attack. Perez, with an aide, escaped hidden under an overcoat and managed to get to a private TV station, according to news accounts.

From there, Perez telephoned Ochoa and told him: "No negotiations. Give them bullets. I want to be back in (the palace) soon," according to an account in El Nacional newspaper.

Six hours later, the 69-year-old Perez declared from the palace that he had beat back the first coup attempt in Venezuela since the early 1960s.

The government banned public demonstrations, broadened police arrest powers and suspended some constitutional civil rights guarantees for at least 10 days.

The United States, Mexico, Brazil, Cuba, the Organization of American States and the European Community condemned the coup attempt. Venezuela has the second longest-standing democracy in South America, following Colombia.

President Bush, a strong ally of Perez who took office about the same time three years ago, called the attempted overthrow an outrageous, illegal military coup against one of the great democratic leaders of our hemisphere.

Caracas residents in several areas of the city were caught in the crossfire between the rival forces.

City intersections need stop signs

Only in Manhattan can drivers find a four-way go intersection.

Not only do students living in the Aggieville slum district come home to converted apartments that should be condemned, but they risk their lives to get there.

Most of the intersections in the neighborhood are unmarked — even though they are among the most frequently traveled residential streets in Manhattan.

Our friendly Riley County police officers will remind us that the car to the right has the right-of-way. We all learned that in drivers education classes seven years ago, remember?

But in this particular neighborhood, it's impossible to see if there is any car to the right until the driver is embedded in your windshield. Between crowded houses, trees and parallel parking, visibility is at a minimum.

Fenderbenders occur frequently. Just a quick glance at the police report section of the paper will confirm that.

It seems it will take a major accident, however, followed by a lawsuit to get any results.

Students, the time is now to take matters into your own hands.

Forget waiting for the city – make your own stop signs.

Follow a general rule of thumb. East-west streets like Moro and Laramie have right of way over north-south streets.

Everyone knows stop signs are expensive. However, certain pizza-chain boxes resemble the legal octogon shape. Some cheap spray paint and a yard stick will make do until the first violent spring storm.

Sure, the signs will look cluttered and cheap, but at least the city planners can't argue they don't fit in with the surrounding neighborhood.

Kansas makes wise choice allowing Duke's primary bid

Kansas politics has thankfully taken a giant step to the left.

Monday, David Duke filed for the April 7 presidential primary in Kansas. Duke says he believes that Kansans will identify with his feelings toward the social welfare system and will help him vie for the Republican nomination.

What's surprising is that Kansas found it in its liberal heart to allow Duke to register, like all other candidates, with a letter of intent and a $100 filing fee.

In states like Florida and Maryland, the Republican party has stalled Duke's challenges to register for the state presidential primary.

While Duke's philosophies, personal background and history may not be agreeable with the masses, he is a legitimate candidate because he is playing by all the rules.

The electoral process was organized in such a way to promote fairness and equal opportunity. Nowhere does the law mandate that the presidential hopeful be a Republican or Democrat or never have participated in controversial activities like the Ku Klux Klan.

Duke, like any other candidate, is asking for a chance to let democracy work. That is what he and the people of this country deserve.

The state's election committee deserves thanks and respect for sticking to the principals of elected government for and steering away from the example set by other states to squelch the democratic process.

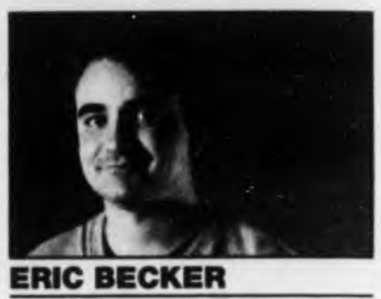
An American teen-age journal

A friend of mine spent a week in January as an assistant teacher at Oak Park High School in Kansas City, Mo. During that time he helped conduct a class of 11th- and 12th-grade students called "Problem Solving."

As part of their assigned work for the class, these students were asked to keep journals. They were to write about particular problems they were experiencing and to describe some of the feelings they had relating to these problems.

Excerpts from these journals were eventually anonymously compiled by the teacher with whom my friend worked, and copies of this sampling were handed out to members of the class. My friend brought a copy of the document — which was called "It Is What You Make It" — back to Manhattan and showed it to me.

I was touched by the trials that these writings represented in the lives of the high school students who had written them. These excerpts seemed significantly representative of the kinds of problems being experienced by young adults living in a world that is haywire with unresolved social issues. Because of their significance, I would like to share of few of these entries in this week's column.



Please read these following entries (set off by dashes) as individual efforts, and remember that they were written by students who have not yet graduated from high school:

— This school is divided into too many groups. This Jocks, Freaks and new-wave thing is crap. I think everyone in this school would have more fun if everyone could get along.

— My dad will say "I will treat you like an adult, but you better prove to me that you can handle it." My mom would say "As soon as you grow up and act like an adult, I will treat you like one."

— In my opinion, it would be nice to have parents. It would be nice to have someone tell you what to do and let them worry about things. I hate it when my friends bitch about their parents. If they only knew how it is to live on your own and have to go to school. Let me tell you it is no piece of cake!

— My friend came back from M.U. today. She hates it up there and I can tell it's really changed her and not for the better. She's not as much fun as she used to be. She's also lost a lot of weight because she's always nervous and either doesn't eat, or she throws it up. I'm really worried about her, but I don't know how to approach her with it. She has always helped me with my problems so I feel bad about not knowing what to do.

— As you know, I am almost four months pregnant and married. Everything's been going okay. We have had our problems but are working them out. But this morning my husband mentioned giving our baby up for adoption because right now we can't even support ourselves much less a baby too. I'm so confused about doing this and it seems to me he already has his mind made up about doing it, which surprises me a lot and makes me angry. How can he even consider giving up a child that is ours, without even trying to make it work? I don't think I can.

— I think they should put condom machines in all of the bathrooms here at school. It would prevent, for one thing, a lot of unwanted pregnancies and a whole lot of sexually transmitted diseases. I'm not saying it's OK, but I mean, people need to face it: Everyone is having sex. I think that if people were more aware of it and acknowledged it there would be a little less of everything.

— I feel sorry for Magic (Johnson) because I visited _____ in the hospital. I watched him waste away to nothing, telling his mom he saw angels and they told him they were coming to get him and take him away. I have strong faith in God but some things I admit I can't understand. And furthermore, anyone who tells AIDS jokes is sick and has never watched someone scream out in pain 48 hours before they are taken from this earth and they can fuck off!

— Went and saw a play about people who do drugs and why I should not do them. Personally, it just made me want to go out and get some and do them. There was some chick talking about how when you trip on acid you see things and write things that you normally wouldn't. Kinda cool! I just want a hit of acid, or maybe not. I'm not sure if one hit will affect me or will it addict me to it?

— Last Friday _____ committed suicide. He had two friends over, and they were drinking. _____ said he had to run downstairs for a second. He ran down, locked the door and shot himself. The two guys heard the shot and ran to the door but it was locked. They called his name and eventually, after he didn't answer, they kicked down the door and saw him. You know what I really don't understand? Why did he want to let his friends see him like that?

It has been said that this is a world of adult problems. When a society's young are affected by adult problems, it seems that adults must bear much of the responsibility.

Our society has created the world in which these kids must grow up, and is creating its own citizens in the process.

These are things for us to remember as our generation approaches it own trial: it's own turn at the wheel. Let's hope there's a way to get off of this gravel, and find a way on to a paved road. We owe it to everyone.

When You're Not What Your Parents Expected

I saw my favorite brother-in-law in the K-State Union today. This is the first time I've seen him since registration. He told me my sister is clipping my columns and saving them. I wondered if she would try to blackmail me later by showing them to my parents.

He said, "I know your parents. They're not THAT bad." Not as bad as he thought I was making them sound anyway.

He was right. Perhaps I have been a little harsh in my judgment of my parents. After all, just like me, they are human.

But what I think is really the base of the problems between my parents and me is not a personality conflict but a generation gap and a parent-child conflict.

It boils down to the simple fact that I am in my early 20s, and my parents think I'm stupid.

When I was home this weekend I talked to my ex-husband, Ivan, and a friend of ours, Rob. We were all talking about one thing—that our parents think we're crazy. Not as a group, but as individuals. Our parents don't think we use the sense a god gave a good horse.

I get along with Ivan's and Rob's parents. Rob gets along with Ivan's parents. Ivan gets along with Rob's parents.

We are all in our early 20s. Our parents can't appreciate us because they are too close to see us objectively, but other people's parents think we're great (or at least human in a non-zombie kind of way).

Our parents envisioned our entire lives in the first 10 minutes after our births. The choices we are making now, and the lives we are living, are not quite what they had envisioned.

We are putting the finishing touches on the adults we will become and what paths we will take as adults. Our parents are experiencing the final realization that they no longer have a real say in that process. We are not the people they had wanted. Maybe we are better; maybe we are worse. We are definitely different.

My parents woke up one day when I was 15 and realized they were losing their control on my life. They no longer had a direct effect on the decisions I made. The less control they felt they had, the tighter they hung onto what control they did have.

Curfews were stringent. I was grounded a week for every minute I was late. They thought I did drugs or drank a lot. They had psychological evaluations done on me. I was threatened with being sent to the county girls home for juvenile delinquents. All because of the crazy behavior that goes along with being a teenager and growing up.

I have never been arrested (to date). I didn't drink and didn't smoke before I was 21. I've never taken illicit substances, and I never will. I don't have any speeding tickets on my record, and I didn't get a parking ticket until I came to K-State. (I'm sure most of us are familiar with K-State parking tickets.)

I was really proud of myself when I got my driver's license. I didn't get into any accidents.

I have two older sisters who were dumb behind the wheel. One was notorious for speeding on ice, hitting the house with the car and accidentally wiping out mailboxes in all kinds of weather.

CARLA JONES

My other sister steered her way into a ditch while changing the radio station. She was put on high-risk insurance because she had so many tickets and accidents on her record at one time.

My biggest problems as a teenager were that I wore a lot of black, tried to commit suicide and spent some time in the Kansas City punk scene. This was definitely not what my parents had envisioned in the first 10 minutes of my life: blue lips, spiked hair, mini skirts, net stockings, and flannel shirts — and the turquoise and rhinestone dog collar I wore around my right ankle every day.

All in all I wasn't a bad kid, just a little weird. I still am, thank you very much. I like it that way. But I am the bane of my parents' existence because of it.

I don't mean to hurt my parents or alienate them from my life, but I refuse to become the person they want me to be because I would hate that person.

My parents, and any parents going through the "Twenties Transition" with their children, would have a much easier time if they would just sit back and watch the developing human being. Instead of being control mongers, parents must realize that we should be taking responsibility for our own actions by the time we are in our 20s.

Parents who realize they are losing control of their children should stop using force, fear, emotional blackmail or any other manipulation tool they can think of.

In an ideal situation, which none of us lives in, parents would be "accepting" of the people we are becoming. They would just enjoy watching the development of another human being.

I love my parents, but I am so tired of hearing, "Well Carla, you are going to do whatever you want to do no matter what we say."

Too bad it's true.

▶CAMPUS CRUSADE NEEDS VIEWING EXPERIENCE

Editor,

CAMPUS CRUSADE FOR CHRIST. What is it with these guys? Every time I turn around there is something new that I am not allowed to do. This group's latest evil event, which the general public is not allowed to partake in, is watching the movie "Henry and June" just because it has a wicked rating of NC-17.

I challenge this group to watch the movie before deciding, on its merits, whether or not it should be considered "pornographic" and banned. If after examining the movie they find it pornographic, violent or just a bad movie, then I suggest that they don't recommend it to their friends. May I remind this religious organization that the first amendment in the U.S. Constitution gives them the freedom of religion, as well as giving me the freedom FROM religion.

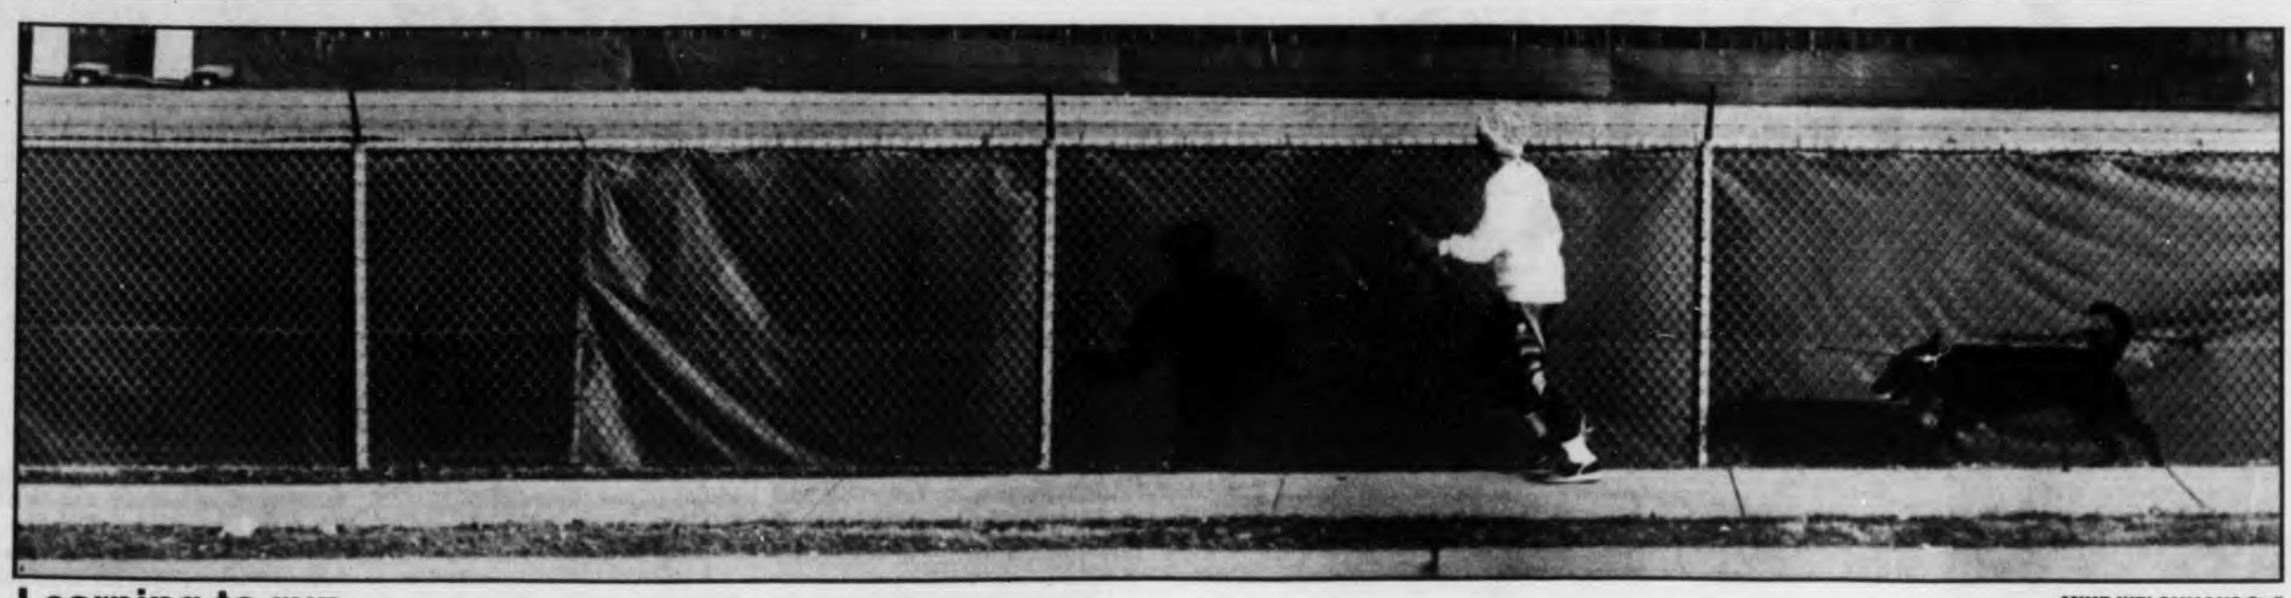
▶FRECKLES AREN'T IMPERFECTIONS



Editor,

I have a trivial question regarding the column "There's a person behind that face." The author states the people she finds most interesting are the people who have imperfections such as freckles, wrinkles, and crooked eyes, ears and mouths.

Excuse me, Carla Jones? Since when did freckles become an "imperfection?" My mother told me they were angel kisses, and I'll stick with that story. Thank you.

Sincerely (imperfect freckles and all),

Association maintains database

Homecoming dance, annual reunions add variety to organization

VICKY SAENZ
Collegian

Graduating from K-State may mean no more classes and tests, but it does not have to mean the end of participation in University activities.

The KSU Alumni Association has worked since 1874 to build and enhance the relationship among the University, alumni and friends.

Its programs seek to keep K-Staters informed and interested in the University and its activities.

The desired effect is to complement and strengthen the University so it can continue to fulfill its mission of teaching, research and service.

Fred Thibodeau, executive director of the Alumni Association and K-State alumnus, said he believes strongly in the association.

"We have long-term as well as short-term goals and strategies," he said. "We run a whole host of programs related to these goals and strategies."

Thibodeau said the Alumni Association has two main goals of which most people are not aware. One is managing the alumni database for the University.

"We have about 100,000 alumni on the files," he said.

"What we've been able to do over the years is to maintain a 95-percent addressable database."

Thibodeau said maintaining the database is important because without it, the Alumni Association and the University are limited in what they are able to do.

He said Alumni Association representatives make about 6,000 changes to the database each month.

Another Alumni Association responsibility is publishing the K-Stater magazine. The magazine is published five times a year, and it is sent to 31,000 members of the association, as well as to all graduates.

"The magazine has been a very positive outcome. It gives the alumni the opportunity to find out what's going on," Thibodeau said.

The association coordinates several other programs, including the Homecoming dance, Parents' Weekend, annual spring reunions and college nights.

Both Parents' Weekend and the Homecoming dance are new responsibilities for the Alumni Association.

"We are going on our second year of working with Parents' Weekend and Homecoming," said Becky Klingler, director of constituent programs.

"They are not new to the University, but they are new to us," she said.

Thibodeau said Homecoming has mostly been a student-centered activity in the past.

"We haven't had much of a tradition for people to come back to these events, but the opportunity exists for us to expand that whole concept and involve alumni in ways they've never been involved before," he said.

The Alumni Association is also

LITTLE AMERICAN ROYAL

Annual livestock show open to anyone

TODD KNAPPENBERGER

Organizers said they hope the 1992 Little American Royal will be bigger and better than last year's.

The 64th Annual LAR, a yearly livestock show co-sponsored by Block & Bridle and the Dairy Science Club in conjunction with the All-University Open House, will be April 4 in Weber Arena.

Brian Dunn, junior in animal sciences and industry and president of this year's LAR, said there were 120 contestants last year. This year, he said, the committee is hoping for 150 contestants.

"The nice thing is," he said, "the LAR encourages everybody to get involved if they have any interest in livestock at all."

Students care for, groom, train and show a livestock animal in head-to-head competition with their peers.

Judging will be based on how well animals are groomed, as well as how well they are displayed by the exhibitors.

Dunn said he encouraged everyone, whether they are studying anything agriculture-related or not, to get involved.

"There are benefits to showing" Dunn said.

"You have the opportunity to learn something about an animal you know little about, meet lots of people and get to know your professors better."

Kate Reilly, junior in agricultural economics and treasurer of the '92 LAR, said she agreed anyone who gets involved will benefit from the experience.

Sign-ups for this year's show are February 24-27. The first meeting for contestants will be Feb. 27.

SNOW AT LAST

The first snowfall of the season fell in Albertville, France, this week. The storm is expected to last through opening ceremonies on Saturday, dumping about 3 feet of snow.

Before the flakes came down, some thought the Jamaican bobsledding team would have the inside track.

LADY CATS BASKETBALL

Lady Cats hope to snap 2-game losing streak today at CU

COLLEGIAN STAFF

BOULDER, Colo. — The Lady Cats will try to right their listing ship when they play Colorado tonight.

After beginning the Big Eight season with a 2-2 mark after four games, the Lady Cats have lost their last two games by fairly decisive margins — 80-64 at Missouri and 82-52 to No. 20 Kansas in front of a home crowd at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Lady Cats stand at 5-14 overall and 2-4 in league play.

After racing to a 7-2 lead, K-State fell silent from the floor, allowing league-leading KU to take over.

Lady Cat coach Susan Yow cited the 26 KU points scored off a whopping 21 offensive rebounds as being the deciding factor in the game.

During the two losses, the Lady Cats shot way under their average.

During those first four games, K-State shot 44.5 percent from the field. In contrast, the past two games saw the Lady Cats shoot 36.2 percent.

Colorado's Big Eight fortunes are the reverse of K-State.

Currently, the Lady Buffs (11-8, 3-3) are on a three-game winning streak after losing their first three conference endeavors.

In the series, the Lady Cats hold a 13-10 edge, winning the last three meetings. But in Boulder, Colorado holds a 5-4 advantage.

Despite the recent losses, K-State continues on a trend of improvement over the first half of the season.

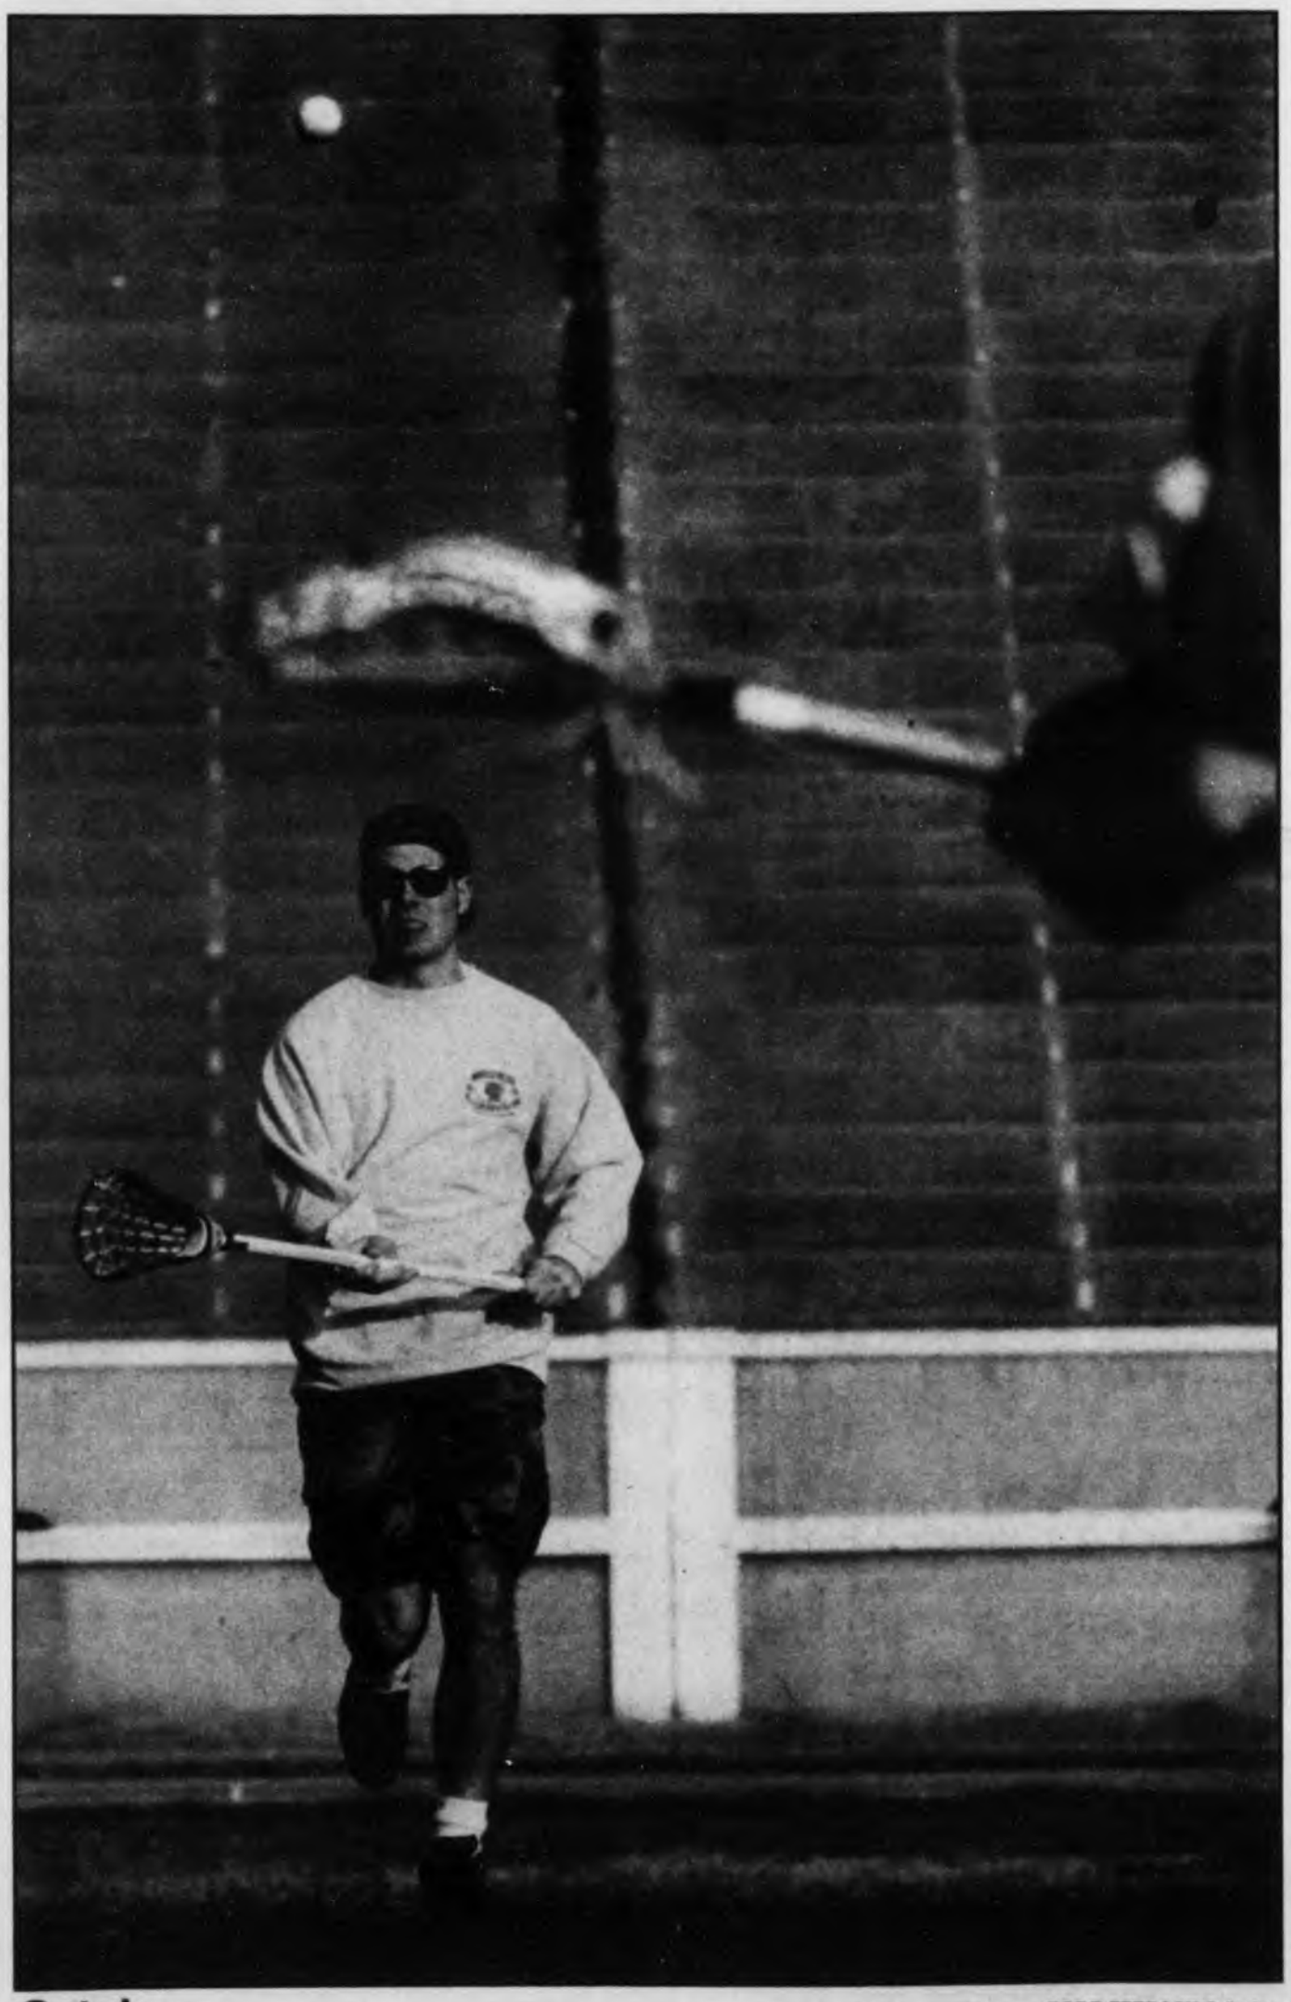
Coming into the conference schedule, the Lady Cats were averaging 58.8 points a game. In conference action, that number has increased to 71.5.

Individually, senior guard Mary Jo Miller will most likely become the 15th player in K-State history to score 1,000 career points.

Going into tonight's game, Miller is just three points shy of that. She is averaging 20.2 points per game in conference play.

Last week, Miller climbed into third place on the all-time school steal chart with 262. She continues to add to her career assists record with each game.

In addition to Miller's exploits, junior forward Leah Honeycutt is having her best season as a Lady Cat.



With at least nine games left in the season, Honeycutt has already surpassed her season high for points with 196 and rebounds with 152.

After disappearing earlier in the season, junior guard Kelly Moylan has stepped up her play against the Big Eight schedule.

Since the beginning of the conference season, Moylan is second on the team in scoring at 11.2 and is shooting 48.6 percent from 3-point range coming off the bench.

Colorado is led by freshman guard Shelley Sheetz, who comes into the game averaging 13.3 points a game. Six-foot-two Sherrice King leads the Lady Buffs with 6.1 rebounds a contest.

After Colorado, the Lady Cats will travel to Nebraska for a 2 p.m. tilt Saturday. Their next home game will be Feb. 12 against Missouri.

CLUB SPORTS

K-State's other volleyball team is ...

Gettin' set to spike

Men's volleyball team is ready to begin playing

BETSY BERKLEY
Collegian

Bump, set, spike.

These three words are long overdue for the men of K-State who have been working to establish a volleyball club for the past few months.

Brent Demmitt, senior in psychology and vice president of the K-State Men's Volleyball Club, said he has been playing volleyball for two years and thought it would be fun to start a club.

"I talked to some guys from KU after a women's volleyball match, and they were wondering why we didn't have a club," Demmitt said.

Two months later, he and Kenny Martin, senior in architecture and president of the club, started a team.

"There were enough guys around here who liked to play seriously and wanted to play at a higher level than intramurals," Martin said.

The majority of the members started their volleyball career at K-State by taking the University's volleyball classes.

Before they could start the club, they had to get the Student Governing Association's approval. Once they were voted in, they had to get a faculty adviser and sign a constitution stating the club's purpose.

Miriam Satern, assistant professor of Kinesiology, agreed to be the adviser.

"We want to promote good sportsmanship, further our volleyball skills, and follow tournament rules," Martin said. The constitution also stated the club had to be open to women.

"Everybody is welcome to try out and come to our practices," Demmitt said.

Organizing the club has taken longer than the 12 male members expected, Martin said.

"It's taking all of my time," Martin said. "There is so much red tape. We have to get tournament information, money, and we've had to deal with the University."

"At the beginning, the organization was moving along at a snail's pace," Demmitt said. "It was a difficult time to create the team in mid-November. We had Thanksgiving break, finals and then Christmas break, but now, the organization is going smoother."

The volleyball club is trying to garner some publicity by making fliers and T-shirts. The T-shirts will be sold through today at the K-State Union.

The club is trying to organize a weekend tournament in Manhattan to create additional public awareness. If it is successful, the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce will donate money.

The club has been practicing three times a week since November. They practice Tuesdays, Thursdays and once on weekends. The practices usually run two to three hours in Ahearn Field House and the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

At the moment, though, the spikers don't have a coach.

"We are looking for someone now to help us out," Martin said.

The club will need a coach to successfully compete in the Big Eight, he said.

"All of the Big Eight schools, with the exception of Oklahoma State, have volleyball clubs, so it will give us many teams to compete against," Demmitt said.

The club is trying to arrange a schedule for next fall that will go hand-in-hand with the K-State women's volleyball program.

"We would like to play our matches before or after the women do, at home and away matches," Demmitt said. "The club won't actually travel with the team. The only thing in common is we will be traveling to the same destination.

"We won't be traveling long destinations, mainly we want to compete within the Big Eight," he said. "If Colorado had a tournament and asked us to play, it is a long drive, but I'd still want to go."

One of the first things the men spikers did after receiving permission from the SGA was to gather tournament information on the United States Volleyball Association.

The majority of the team members are also members of USVBA.

Anyone above the age of 14, male or female, is eligible to be a member of USVBA, after paying a$50 fee, with $21 going to USVBA, Ben Luckett, senior in management and treasurer of the club said.

Once membership is gained, teams are classified into different divisions: B, BB, A, AA and Open.

The B division has the easiest competition with "Open" being for professional teams. At the beginning of their tournaments, the club will start out in division BB, Demmitt said. As the season progresses, the team will move up to a higher division.

The USVBA tournaments began last month, but for the men spikers, they will begin this month. The tournaments are played in Lawrence, Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri, Manhattan, and the Kansas City area, with both men and women participating, though not on the same teams.

Even though the club's semester has been rough to organize, Martin is pleased the job is almost completed.

"I hope this semester we'll be able to set up for the future, and it will run smoother in the years to come," Martin said.

TENNIS

Inconsistent play dooms netters in season opener against BYU

Riniker's wins provides only points in 7-2 loss nationally ranked team

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

It was a rough first lesson the K-State tennis team received from nationally-ranked Brigham Young, starting the spring season with a 7-2 loss Tuesday at the Wood Valley courts in Topeka.

Sophomore Michèle Riniker captured the only win in the singles competition, and matched up with Neili Wilcox to record K-State's second win in the No. 2 doubles.

Netter coach Steve Bietau said the final result was indicative of BYU's play. Brigham Young had already won four previous matches by 5-4 scores this spring.

"I think it wasn't closer than it said on the paper. BYU probably has a stronger team, they were much sharper," he said. "I'm not satisfied, but it showed that it was our first match. It was a start, not a particularly good one, but also not a really bad one."

Bietau said he saw a couple of positive efforts, particularly those made by Riniker and freshman Martine Shrubsole, who played No. 6 singles.

"Michèle showed good effort," he said. "She had one of the better performances of the team. She was competitive in the match and improved with the game."

Bietau said Riniker played with a lot more confidence and feeling in the second set during her 6-4 and 6-1 win against Cherie Kaneshiro.

Shrubsole fought pretty hard, Bietau said, even she lost clearly in two sets to Susana Labrador.

"I think she kept pretty close in the game and came back into the doubles to perform pretty well."

In the top match between two Yugoslavian natives, Erica Koljanin (BYU) came to a 7-6 (7-3), 6-2 two-set win against K-State's Karin Lusnic.

Unlike in her win against Koljanin last fall, Lusnic couldn't find to her game at all this time according to Bietau.

"Karin was never in the match. Mentally, she didn't look well in the game," Bietau said. "Koljanin is a very good player, who is back to the form she was in last year."

In the lower seeds, BYU came to three clearcut wins, losing just six games in six sets.

Bietau said before the duals he expected BYU to have better depth than his team.

"The results are not a big surprise," he said. "The lower positions were the strongest they had."

In the doubles competition, Bietau said he observed the same things he saw in the singles.

"We were playing inconsistent during the whole match," he said. "We played good tennis for a while, and then not for a while."

Overall, Bietau said he wasn't upset about the team's first appearance of the season since the players were competitive.

"However, it's too early in the season to make some good evaluations of the team," he said, looking forward to the upcoming games against Miami, Ohio, Notre Dame and Drake at South Bend, Ind. "The true measure will be that weekend."

Alumni

working on the Alumni Class Reunion scheduled for April.

The program includes the 40-, 45- and 50-year graduates, as well as the Golden Key Club, which includes alumni who graduated more than 50 years ago.

"This is a neat program, because it involves a partnership between our office and campus," Klingler said.

"They will have an opportunity to socialize with each other and to renew friendships and acquaintances."

The association has 73 alumni clubs, 48 of which are located in Kansas. About 75 activities are performed through these clubs each year.

One of the most important club activities is working with the University in student recruitment. Prospective students are invited to club activities where a speaker talks to them about K-State.

"Most of the clubs are now providing scholarships," Thibodeau said. "The scholarships are given as part of their financial aid packet once the student registers.

"The Alumni Association needs to have a better focus on what it wants to do. We can't do everything. Instead, we have to set up priorities and work on those programs."

Thibodeau said he is pleased with the work the Alumni Association has done.

"I have the best job in the country. I love this place," he said.

"I believe K-Staters are the best people in the world. They love K-State, and I bleed purple."

Community Health Education

CPR for Adults

The American Heart Association Course A includes adult CPR and first aid for choking. This 5-hour class is scheduled about once a month, usually on a Saturday. The fee is $15 and the class is limited to 15 people. Call 587-4264 or 776-3300.

Diabetes Education Program

This is a 4-session, comprehensive course which is offered every month. Topics to be covered include diabetes overview and prevention of complications, diet and exercise, medication and self-monitoring and self-management. The fee is $125 and a parent or significant other will be allowed to attend with the participant at no extra charge. To register call Wini Schaedel, RN, at 587-4275.

Freedom From Smoking

This is a 7-week program that combines behavior modification, education and group support to help participants kick the habit. Classes are offered two to three times a year, and the fee is $60. Call the public relations department at 587-4228 for more information.

Eating For A Healthy Heart

This series of four classes is led by a registered dietitian. Topics include how to cut out fat and cholesterol without cutting essential nutrients needed for health, how to choose low-fat foods in the grocery store without spending a fortune and how to choose sensible foods when eating out. The fee is $35 per individual or $40 per couple. Call the nutrition clinic at 587-4266 for more information.

Lifesteps®: Weight Management

This is an 8-week program directed by a registered dietitian and is offered four times a year for a $99 fee. It is designed to help participants achieve safe, permanent weight loss and take control of their eating habits in a gradual, stepwise fashion without strict diets, forbidden foods, pills or powders. The fee also includes an initial body fat estimate. Call the nutrition clinic at 587-4266 for more information.

Speakers Bureau

Memorial Hospital provides speakers to civic, school or church groups at no charge. A variety of health care topics are available, and speakers are scheduled through the public relations department. Call 587-4228 for more information.

Parent-Child Education

To register for any parent-child class, contact Wini Schaedel, RN, parent-child clinical nurse specialist, at 587-4275.

Prenatal and Parent Preparation Classes

These classes focus on concerns of expectant parents including lifestyle changes during pregnancy, preparation for baby, newborn care and emotional preparation for parenthood.

Childbirth Preparation Classes

Expectant parents are prepared for baby's arrival and given information on the labor and delivery process, including comfort measures, relaxation exercises and breathing techniques. Refresher courses are also available.

Prenatal/Postpartum Exercise

Classes provide gentle aerobics and calisthenics to help prepare your body for labor and birth, or to help regain muscle tone following birth.

Infant and Child CPR

This training session is scheduled several times each year and is particularly appropriate for parents, day care providers, baby sitters, grandparents and teachers. The course is led by certified American Heart Association instructors.

Sibling Classes

These classes help prepare children (ages 3 and up) to welcome a new brother or sister. Classes are free, and everyone who attends becomes an official member of the Ted E. Bear Cub Club! Call 776-3300, extension 330, to register.

Support Groups

Better Breathers Club

The Better Breathers Club is sponsored by Memorial Hospital in cooperation with the American Lung Association. The group is open to anyone with chronic breathing difficulties and members of their family. There is no charge. Contact Nettie Severt, RCP, director of respiratory care, at 776-3300.

Diabetes Support Group

Fourth Tuesday of the month
7-8:30 p.m.

Along with the Manhattan area chapter of the American Diabetes Association, this group provides support and practical advice to people with diabetes and their families. All ages are welcome and there is no charge. Contact Wini Schaedel, RN, at 587-4275.

Parent Support Group

Third Tuesday of the month
7-8 p.m.

This group meets to provide support, information and guidance for families with exceptional children, including those with cerebral palsy, developmental disabilities, Down Syndrome, musculo-skeletal problems and others. There is no charge. Contact Jeff Mathis, OTR, director of occupational therapy, at 587-4235.

SPA—Support for Parents of Asthmatics

Third Thursday of the month
7-9 p.m.

SPA was formed by Memorial Hospital in cooperation with the American Lung Association. There is no charge and membership is open to parents, guardians or grandparents who have children with asthma or a similar breathing problem. Contact Wini Schaedel, RN, at 587-4275.

RESEARCH

Hot rocks make clean alternative energy source

MARGO KELLER
Collegian

One professor and several engineering students are working on a federally funded project to find and perfect an alternative energy form — rocks.

Underground rocks could provide 2 percent of energy needs by 2030, said David Duchane, program manager at Los Alamos National Laboratory in Los Alamos, N.M.

The Los Alamos National Laboratory, with assistance from K-State's mechanical engineering department, is obtaining the clean and potential energy source from rocks with heat and low water content, several miles underground.

The Hot Dry Rock project, funded by the Department of Energy, has the equivalent of 11 full-time employees and works with a budget of $3.2 million, Duchane said.

Since 1987, Daniel Swenson, professor of mechanical engineering, and five engineering students have submitted yearly proposals to the Los Alamos Laboratory to help with the HDR project.

Two K-State students, Mel Beikmann, a graduate research assistant, and Robert Du Teau, senior in mechanical engineering, joined the project staff during the summer and semester breaks.

Beikmann is solving mathematical calculations using a computerized model that simulates how rock responds to the presence of water underground.

The model will help determine the number of wells, energy of the rock and the performance of the project.

"We hope to eventually progress enough that the model will show the water flow through the rock and how the water and rock interact and what energy is being produced," Beikmann said.

Obtaining the energy source from rocks is called heat mining.

An injection well pumps highly pressurized water into the rock reservoir to fracture or break up the rock. The water becomes superheated as it flows through cracks in the hot rock, according to a publication of the laboratory.

The water is cycled up a production well to the surface, and a heat exchanger extracts the heat from the water, while the remaining water is recirculated through the cycle. The heat can be used directly or converted to electricity, according to the publication.

At the site, Du Teau takes calculations and measurements from pumps measuring the water pressure.

"Hot Dry Rock could be done potentially anywhere," Du Teau said. "The concept is unique. The people who patented the idea are the first to extract energy from hot dry rock. They were the first to consider injecting water into it."

The project began in 1977 with the first hot dry rock reservoir located in the mountains west of Los Alamos at Fenton Hill, N.M.

A nine-month run used pressurized water at 275 degrees Fahrenheit to produce enough heat from the rocks to generate electricity at a small power plant.

While drilling into the rock is similar to drilling for oil, the granite rock wears down the drills more quickly than normal underground drilling techniques, Du Teau said.

COUNTY COMMISSION

Recycling in question

May be cheaper to put newspapers in landfill, not stables

TAD MUSSELWHITE
Collegian

The dropping market for newspapers has caused the Riley County Commission to re-evaluate some aspects of its recycling program.

The county previously recycled old newspapers and shredded them for livestock bedding.

Wilton Thomas, Riley County Commission chairman, said the commission will look into the differential costs between recycling and sending the paper to a landfill.

"We are reluctant to discontinue any recycling," he said. "However, we cannot afford to continue to recycle at some point, and this evaluation is designed to look at exactly what that point is.

"We are willing to pay a little more money to continue to recycle, but if there is a great difference in cost between that and sending it to a landfill, we will send the old paper to the landfill.

"We are hoping that eventually, technology will catch up with this problem, and it will be cheaper to recycle so there will be no problem."

Thomas said the procedure will show how the costs are running and will offer a comparison to the costs of recycling.

Craig Miller, Howie's Recycling employee, said the county owns the bailer and shredder Howie's uses to recycle the paper.

"We shred and bale the paper, then the county ships the bales to where they are needed and receives the money for the bales," he said. "Then the county pays us for our service of running the machines."

The market for shredded paper bales is seasonal, Miller said.

"In the summer and warmer months, farmers don't need the bedding, and we have to ship the bales elsewhere," he said.

cies are structured fairly, but they unfairly overlook some students who should qualify.

"Students that work in-state, pay state taxes and support local businesses should get a break," he said.

Riolo has been paying non-resident tuition and fees for two years, since he came to Kansas from New Jersey.

However, Riolo said although he feels he should be able to pay resident tuition, he still thinks a K-State education is worth the money.

"Compared to other universities, K-State's non-resident fees are reasonable," Riolo said.

Tuition and fees at Oklahoma State University and Iowa State University are comparable to K-State's. Residents at Iowa State pay $976, while the non-residents pay $3,203.

Oklahoma State charges by the hour. Residents there pay $54 per hour for lower-division classes and $57 per hour for upper-division classes. Non-residents pay $154 per hour for lower-level classes and $169 per hour for upper-level.

Other students, such as California native Cindy Burris, junior in marketing, don't agree with the policies.

"I think the policies are too strict," Burris said. "They treat nearly all the cases the same, instead of individually."

Burris was turned down on residence status, even after appealing to the Kansas Board of Regents.

Burris said she works in Manhattan, pays local taxes and is now a permanent resident of Kansas.

She said she is not sure why she was turned down, except that the board said she did not meet its qualification of a resident.

Thomas Schellhardt, associate vice president for administration and finance, said the extra money paid by non-residents is needed.

"Residents pay about 25 percent of what it costs for their education, but since non-resident students' parents have not paid state taxes to Kansas, there is a difference that needs to be made up," Schellhardt said.

He said the state's tax revenue makes up the remainder of the resident tuition.

Cynthia Carpenter, junior in elementary education, said she does not like paying more.

"It's ridiculous," she said.

don't know much about black history," she said

Individuals must understand themselves before they can relate to others, McGowan said. And, she said, being aware of culture is the basis for this understanding.

"You can't know others until you know yourself. It gives you a sense of identity — that sense of knowing who you are," she said.

McGowan said K-State is beginning to accept the responsibility of offering multicultural education.

Karen Hester, admissions representative, said McGowan is an accessible resource for students.

"She is so receptive to students, and they all seem to know they can go to her," she said.

McGowan lead a workshop called "The Leadership Challenge: African American Socialization" Monday night. The cover of the worksheets she used read, "When spider webs unite, they can tie up a lion."

"Obtaining research grants is fairly common, but going to Los Alamos is very special," Swenson said. "It keeps us technically up-to-date by having these research projects by providing both hardware to do this work and educate graduate students."

Both Du Teau and Beikmann worked as graduate research assistants at the laboratory and were given travel allowances.

"Being at Los Alamos helped me come back to school and do applications for a lot of my classes," Du Teau said. "The laboratory does research on other alternative energy projects. It's amazing to see how many projects they have."

Famous for developing the first atomic bomb in July 1945, the Los Alamos Laboratory is working on several alternative energy projects despite the decline of yearly individual project finances.

"There are several geothermal energy projects, but this is the only one of any magnitude," Duchane said.

CITY COMMISSION

Low-income housing approved

BETSY BERKLEY
Collegian

A housing addition for low-income families was approved during a Manhattan City Commission meeting Tuesday night.

Jai Atkinson, housing officer for Manhattan housing and urban development, said there has been a need for more affordable housing for low-income people.

"Right now, there is a waiting list of 100 applicants, 50 of whom are paying more than 50 percent of their income," she said.

In addition to a need for more low-income housing, Atkinson said, a drug policy needs to be instated for the housing addition and in Manhattan.

A motion was passed to establish a city drug policy.

"Drugs are a very serious problem," Atkinson said. "Manhattan doesn't have a drug problem now, but in the future, we need to be prepared."

Atkinson said there have been drug awareness, educational and support programs to let the public know the seriousness of drug abuse.

In other action, an ordinance was passed to authorize staff and a financial adviser to proceed with preliminary steps to refinance the callable portions of certain Manhattan general obligation bonds.

Commissioners said lower market-interest rates offer Manhattan the opportunity to refinance a portion of Manhattan's outstanding general-obligation debt.

Manhattan could save about $200,000 in interest costs during the next 19 years by refinancing.

Additionally, it was approved to accept the committee recommendation and authorize staff to negotiate a contract for engineering services on the Waste Water Treatment Plant Expansion project.

For informational purposes, Richard Coleman, professor of marketing and president of the Manhattan Public Library board, spoke to the commission.

Last fall, one of Coleman's marketing research teams conducted a survey on the public attitudes about the Manhattan library. He explained some of the results.

OGDEN

BUY GUNS; NO WAITING

TAD MUSSELWHITE
Collegian

If you need a handgun fast, go to Ogden.

The process a gun buyer would face in Manhattan involves a two-day waiting period. There is a similar waiting period in Junction City.

The town of Ogden, however, only seven miles from Manhattan, has no waiting period for the purchase of a handgun.

"Kansas law only requires a buyer to be 21 years old and a resident of Kansas or in the military," said Don Morton, owner of Don Morton Sports in Manhattan.

"It is a city ordinance that requires a two-day waiting period to obtain a handgun."

A long gun such as a shotgun or rifle does not require the waiting period, and the buyer must be only 18 years old, Morton said.

Buyers would have to pay for the handgun, then fill out a form that contains information about themselves — such as age, height, weight and race.

It also asks questions about any criminal record and citizenship. Then in 48 hours, the buyer can return to pick the gun up, he said.

The form goes to the Riley County Police Department.

The police then have 24 hours to notify the seller if the buyer is not allowed to purchase a gun, Morton said. The RCPD also files the form as a sort of registration for the gun.

John Hubbard, owner of John and Dan's Guns & Ammunition in Junction City, said Junction City also has a minimum waiting period of at least two days.

The buyer pays for the gun and fills out the federal form required by law and must go to the police department to fill out more forms.

The police take the information from the buyer and run a background check through a computer.

Hubbard said after the process is completed at the police department, the buyer obtains a form from the police, which gives the dealer information about whether the buyer will be permitted to receive the gun.

"I think the waiting period is very good idea," Hubbard said. "Don't get me wrong, I'm all for gun owners' rights, but I think a nationwide registration period would be a good idea.

"Personally, when I sell a gun, it makes me feel a heck of a lot better in my own mind knowing the buyer is not a criminal."

As far as the towns surrounding Junction City not having the waiting period, Hubbard said he does not believe it hurts his business much.

"I have sold a lot more guns this past year than ever before," he said. "People are beginning to buy guns for self-defense, and there are a growing number of target shooters and gun collectors.

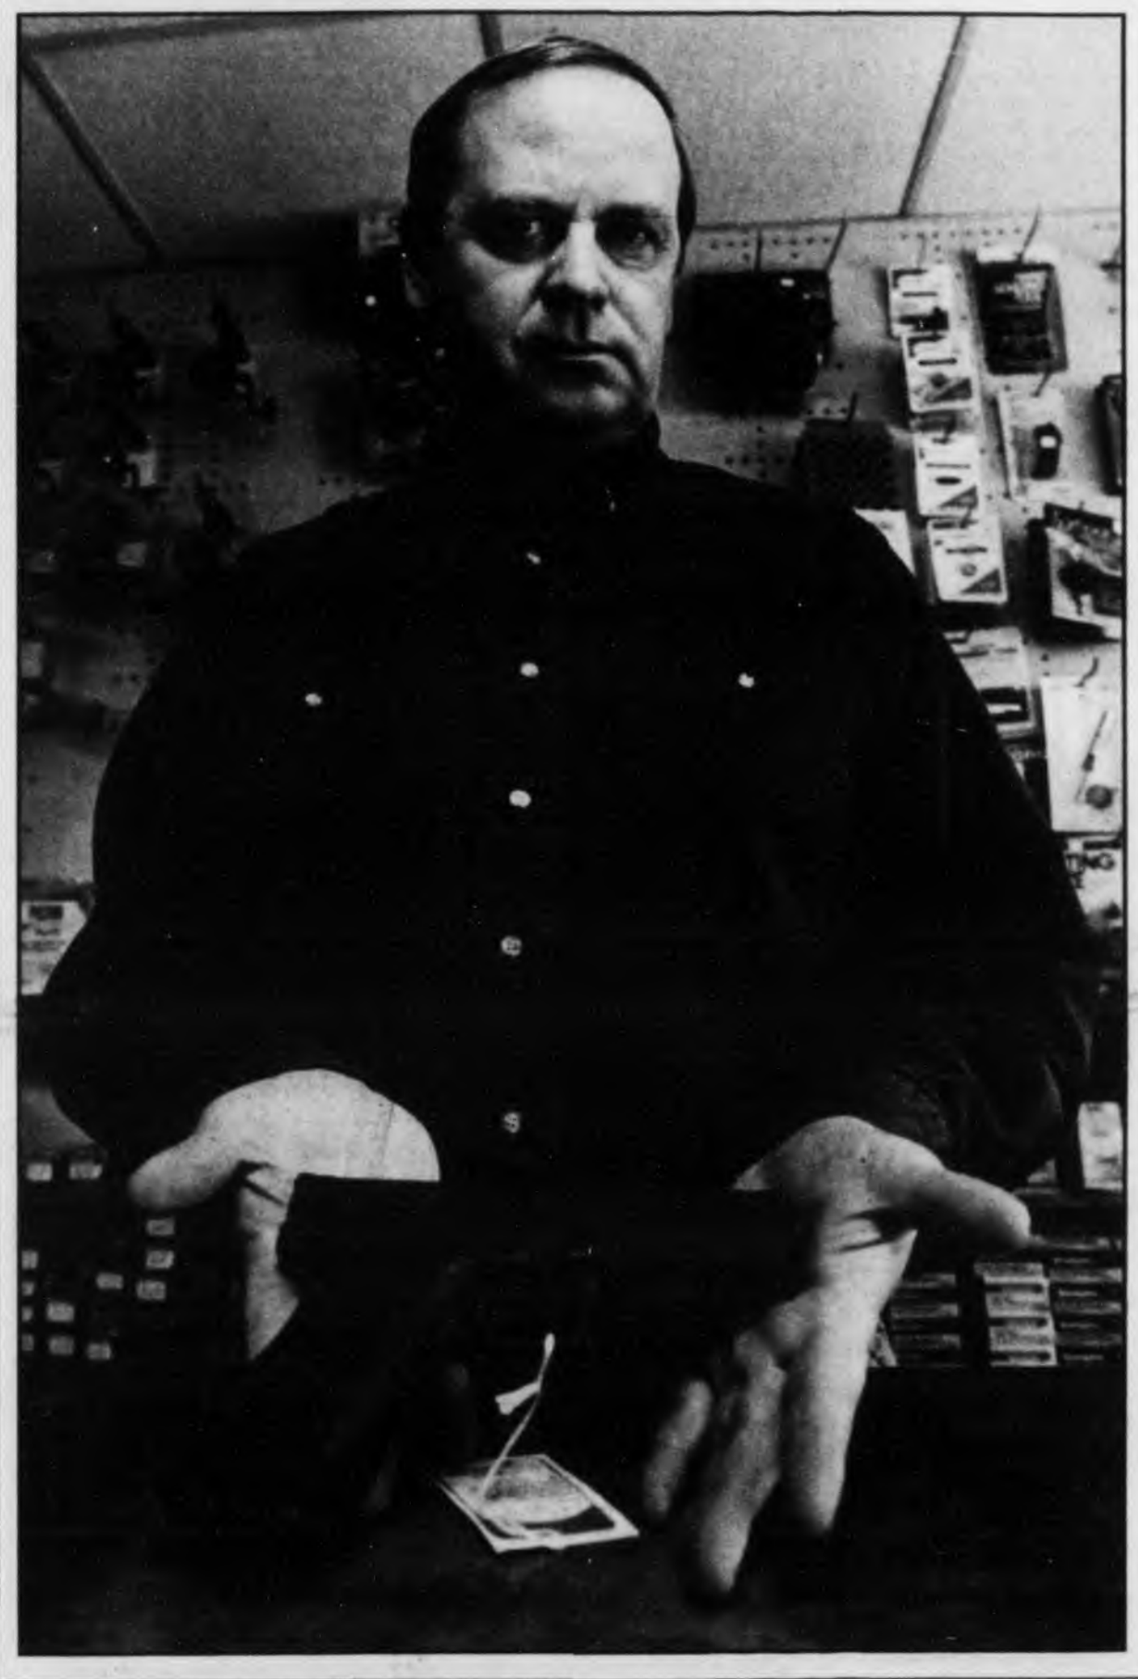
"I have no problem selling these types of guns. However, I don't like to sell small handguns that are easily concealed in a pocket."

Hubbard also said he has never had a customer turned down for purchasing a gun because of the waiting period.

The thing that hurts his business the most, he said, are the gun shows that come to surrounding areas.

Hubbard said any resident of Junction City who purchases a gun elsewhere is still legally required to report it the police department in accordance with the city ordinance.

The city ordinance calling for a waiting period is isolated mainly to these two cities in Kansas. Neither Kansas City nor Wichita have any ordinances other than the state laws on handgun sales.



"The waiting periods are just a city-imposed ordinance they (Manhattan and Junction City) have dreamed up," said Pat, the owner of Pat's Pawn and Gun in Ogden, who wished to be referred to by first name only.

"The state has voted down the idea of mandatory waiting periods several times.

"The places that have the ordinances on registration of handguns and waiting periods are only isolated spots throughout the state.

"Topeka, Salina, Abilene — none of them have a waiting period. I don't have any kind of an unfair advantage in the gun business."

Contracts awarded for Phase II construction

JOE VADER
Collegian

The majority of bids for the Phase II completion of Throckmorton Hall have been disclosed, and contractors are ready to begin construction.

Ferrell Construction Co. of Topeka submitted the lowest base bid of the general contractors — $6,840,000.

Central Mechanical Construction, a Manhattan contractor, will be awarded the mechanical contract with the low bid of $4,223,800.

B&W Electrical of Salina bid $1,740,100 to do the electrical work in Throckmorton.

Other fixed equipment, laboratories and growth chambers will be installed by out-of-state contractors for an estimated $4,330,000.

The expansion of Throckmorton will triple the building's size and house the departments of agronomy, horticulture, forestry and plant pathology.

However, federal funding for the completion of the Phase II expansion has recently been put in jeopardy by President Bush's 1993 budget proposal.

Bush has recommended several projects, including Throckmorton, be cut from the budget.

Lawmakers, including Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., don't think the president's budget will go through. Dole said he is confident the funding will continue.

K-State officials aren't worried, either.

"The project will go on," Vincent Cool, associate director of facilities planning, said.

He said even if the final federal dollars do not come this year, it will not affect any contracts the University has entered into.

"This project has been in the works for several years," Cool said.

"We have had a number of federal grants already made. Those funds have been appropriated and are essentially in the bank.

"The funds that are still remaining to come from the federal side would not have been expected until October anyway," he said.

"And since this is a continuing grant, we don't think those would be jeopardized. Even if they do, we are not encumbering any dollars we do not have yet."

Half of the $25.2-million project is being funded by the federal government. The state provides the other half.

K-State has been asked to raise $5 million of the state's share of the funding.

Conference promotes pride

Satellite program presents forum for discussion

THOMAS LISTER
Collegian

Black pride, education and the appointment of Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas were among the topics discussed in "Beyond the Dream IV," a video conference presented at noon Wednesday in Bluemont Hall 16.

The conference, sponsored by the College of Education, took place in Washington, D.C., and was transmitted live via satellite throughout the nation.

Among the speakers were Alex Haley, author of "Roots" and "The Autobiography of Malcolm X," and Chuck Stone, professor of journalism at the University of North Carolina.

Barbara Reynolds, columnist for USA Today, and Henry Hampton, creator and producer of the television documentary "Eyes On The Prize" also spoke.

The conference started with an excerpt from the movie "Roots."

"The overriding thing is pride," Haley said. He said as a child, he remembered his mother getting angry with his grandmother for telling him slave tales and the family's African history. Without these tales, he said he would never have been able to

LEGISLATURE

Kansas faces reapportionment

Riley, Geary counties pivotal in redistricting

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian

Due to a lack of population increase in Kansas in the 1990s, the state Legislature has been struggling with the arduous task of drawing four congressional districts out of the existing five.

A task force to discuss and study the issue was designated in spring 1991 by the Legislature.

The committee, made up of three Republicans and three Democrats, is studying the issue and must have a completed recommendation to submit to the Legislative Coordinating Council by June 10.

The final decision must be approved by both the House and Senate, and then by Gov. Joan Finney.

Although redistricting Kansas has become a controversial issue, the question of which district will be placed in another area remains unanswered.

Local legislators and city officials have voiced concerns about each county receiving the most beneficial plan.

"To keep its primary form of interest, Manhattan should remain in the first district," Jim Pearson, Manhattan assistant city manager, said.

Pearson expressed concerns about the effect of Riley and Geary counties separating.

Although he said the consequences of this are impossible to predict at this point, it could become an issue of conflict.

Pearson said Reno, Riley and Geary counties are the pivot points in this issue.

He said if Reno is placed with Sedgwick County, less pressure will be put on Manhattan to be reapportioned.

"Manhattan, Junction City and the Reno County area are pingpong balls. If one goes, it drags the other with it," Pearson said.

Final decisions will be made by the reapportionment task force.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, and Sen. Dave Kerr, R-Hutchinson, have formulated their own proposals and are working together to present them to the committee.

Oleen's proposal suggests Riley and Geary counties remain as a whole

NEWS DIGEST

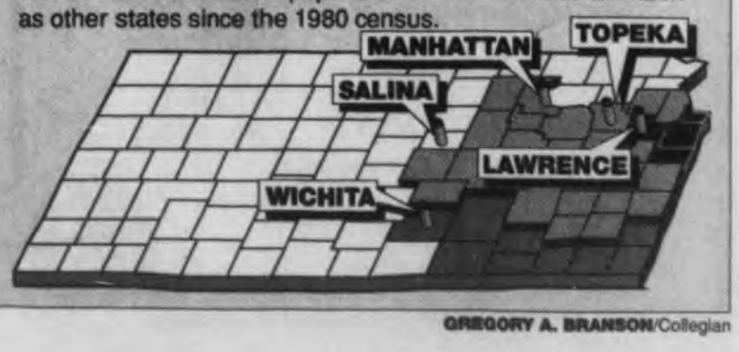
▶ OFFICERS QUESTIONED

CARACAS, Venezuela (AP) — The government questioned scores of captured rebel officers Wednesday as it tried to measure the scope of an attempted coup against President Carlos Andres Perez.

Lt. Col. Hugo Chavez and three other junior officers who led the coup planned to organize a "progressive" civilian-military junta to rid the country of corruption, it was disclosed Wednesday.

Chavez was brought before photographers Wednesday to dispel rumors that he was dead.

▶ FIRE DELAYS TYSON TRIAL



INDIANAPOLIS (AP) — A deadly fire Wednesday at the hotel where jurors in Mike Tyson's trial were sequestered forced a delay of the former heavyweight champion's trial on rape charges.

The fire at the Indianapolis Athletic Club killed two firefighters and a hotel guest. Jurors safely escaped the early morning blaze dressed in their night clothes.

Jurors are to be questioned today to determine if they discussed the trial while outside the hotel during the fire.

REDISTRICTING PROPOSAL

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, is proposing these new congressional districts. Kansas must go from five districts to four because the state's population did not increase as much as other states since the 1980 census.

Hotdog man acts out of kindness

ANDY WOODWARD
Collegian

A young man from Olathe North just wanted to make Manhattan a happier place a few wieners at a time.

On Jan. 28, Matt Schindler's Monday morning consisted of cooking hotdogs for hungry passersby near Seaton Hall and being forced to halt his impromptu barbecue later that afternoon because he didn't have a food handler's card.

Student Senate sought to commend Schindler, sophomore in English education, for his kindness, but the proposal failed after a 25-minute debate.

Schindler said he was surprised Senate even considered the measure.

"That's pretty neat," Schindler said. "I'm glad other people thought it was a good thing. That makes me feel happy."

Neil Neaderhiser, engineering senator, was co-author of the proposal.

"All we were trying to do was to commend him for being nice, but I guess you can't do that in a bureaucratic body like this," he said.

Part of the proposal was designed to criticize the K-State Union for what Neaderhiser calls "bureaucratic overbearance."

"I don't know if I like the idea of poking fun at the Union," Schindler said. "I do understand the Union is responsible for certain things.

"In my own judgment, I think rules could be bent. I can't get upset if they have different opinions."

Another plank of the Senate proposal was to commend Collegian photographer Mike Venso on the picture, which ran in Tuesday's Collegian.

This idea was also struck down by Joel Gruenke, graduate student in statistics. Gruenke maintained Venso was simply doing his job, and Senate should not commend someone for doing his job.

The picture portrays Schindler apparently being remonstrated by Diane Novak, K-State facilities special events assistant.

"The picture that was run — everybody has their own ideas of what to do," Schindler said. "I would have rather had a picture of the students standing around, enjoying their hotdogs, though.

"But it was a good picture. No doubt about that."

Schindler said the experience was a rewarding one.

"It was pretty wonderful. Two or three people would come up, I'd give them a hotdog.

"Then, a group of 15 would show up, and they'd talk among themselves. They'd make fun of me about how black the hotdogs were."

Schindler said the feedback he received has been all positive.

"I'm really glad," Schindler said. "You're walking on campus and somebody says, 'Hey, you're the hotdog king.'"

K-STATE POLICE

Video cameras installed for protection

Parking lots become safer with new system

STEPHANIE LOEPPKE
Collegian

Smile, you're on candid camera.

With the help of five 24-hour video cameras, K-State Police now watch four parking areas and one walkway, searching for unusual situations.

"The complaints were constant about not feeling at ease in certain areas of campus," Charles Beckom, campus police chief, said.

The cameras were installed to satisfy the long-term needs of the students and to enhance the security of those areas, Beckom said.

Beckom said the cameras were chosen because there wasn't enough money to hire people to monitor those areas.

Cameras are positioned on top of Haymaker Hall, Weber Hall, the Physical Plant, the K-State Union and East Stadium.

The camera on Haymaker views Lot B-2, and Weber's camera views lots B-3 and B-16.

The Physical Plant camera covers the walkway behind Seaton Hall and the K-State Union. The East Stadium camera overlooks the north and south Union parking lots.

The $125,000 system began operation in January 1991.

"We moved aggressively in a proactive way," said Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life.

"We didn't wait for a tragedy to happen."

University parking, campus police and central administration worked on the project.

The system is presently financed, and will be in the future, revenue from parking funds and permits, Beckom said.

"It was an overall capital improvement project," Beckom said.

Along with the cameras, better pavement and a new lighting system were constructed.

In addition, Beckom said the cameras are equipped for a finely tuned picture.

When the cameras were installed, the lighting was upgraded so the picture on the screen in the evening could be the same as a picture in daylight, Beckom said.

He said the lenses are specially made to adjust with the sunlight and weather conditions.

The video screen picture is produced by fiber optics, an electrical signal superimposed on a beam of light, Beckom said. The connection cable to the station is about 62.5 microns, which is thinner than pencil lead.

A year before the cameras were in place, 50 auto thefts were reported from the north parking lot, Beckom said.

One year later, the reports dropped to 22-26. He said three thefts have been caught on tape and eventually resulted in an arrest.

Beckom said cameras for the Union Bookstore and lobby areas may be in the works.

All Systems employee Jeff Pirner, Kansas City, finishes the wiring to a closed-circuit camera placed on top of the south tower of West Stadium Wednesday afternoon. All Systems is based in Kansas City. Additional cameras will be installed later this week.

TAKING A LOOK AT CAMPUS

THE CAMERA

- The camera is equipped with lenses that can zoom in close to the area and adjust to the light of night and day.
- It can swivel both horizontally and vertically.
- It also has an air conditioner for summer, a heater for winter and a windshield wiper for rain and snow.
- Five cameras are operational with more expected.

THE VIEW STATION

- Connected by fiber optics to all campus cameras.
- Controls can move cameras manually or automatically, and a VCR can record pictures.

ABORTION

Abortion ruling scheduled for review

KELLY KLAWONN
Collegian

The U.S. Supreme Court's decision to review the restrictive Pennsylvania abortion law has catapulted the issue into the political hotseat.

At stake is the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision that gave women the right to have an abortion. The Court must also determine whether or not women have a constitutional right to privacy concerning abortion.

"I would like to see Roe v. Wade remain somewhat gray. In the gray area, the power can go to the states," Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, said. "Those states that want stricter laws can do so, and those who don't will not have to," .

If the court upholds the Roe v. Wade decision, reaffirming a woman's right to have an abortion, the states are left to determine the boundaries of the law but not the legality of abortion itself. If overturned, the states are left at the mercy of the court.

The addition of Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony Kennedy, David Souter and Clarence Thomas has shifted the Court to the right. The conservative politics of the 1980s have lead to an undermining of the Roe v. Wade decision.

"In 1989 with the Webster decision, the Court essentially dropped the burden on the states. If Roe is further eroded, the abortion issue will be thrown back in the laps of the states," Hochhauser said.

Over the course of the last year, the state of Kansas has been at the heart of the abortion conflict. Kansas abortion laws have traditionally been among the most liberal in the country. The stability of this legislation will be tested in the coming months.

In front of the Kansas Legislature are two abortion bills.

One bill receiving a lot of attention would protect a woman's right to have an abortion. Also, clinics would have to provide counseling to minors on alternatives and birth-control methods. Clinics would also talk to minors about getting their parents involved.

The bill also creates stiff penalties

OPINION COLLEGIAN

ARE THEY LAZY?

"I have thought for some time that they may lack a work ethic."

— Japanese Prime Minister Kiichi Miyazawa, referring to American workers

EDITORIALS

Leaders are lazy, not workers

What if Miyazawa is right?

Japanese Prime Minister Kiichi Miyazawa said recently that American workers no longer want to succeed by the sweat of their brow.

About American workers, Miyazawa is certainly wrong. Only by the sweat of their brows are workers able to keep their heads above water in the Reagan-Bush-trickle-down economy.

But if Miyazawa had made his statement about the captains of American business and U.S. political leaders, he certainly would have been right.

For 12 years, the U.S. economy has benefited big business and the rich in the mistaken belief that wealth, like water, would find the lowest level.

It hasn't.

During the 1980s — when bigger profits were being sunk into junk bonds and golden parachutes — research and development spending, to which Japanese businesses commit a higher percentage of their earnings, lagged among U.S. businesses.

The leaders of big American companies have decried regulation and called for laissez-faire capitalism — except when they might lose, like in open competition for the U.S. market with the Japanese.

The American worker has produced some of the finest, most technologically advanced products the world has ever seen. For examples, look at the Stealth fighter and the Apollo moon lander. So, workers aren't the problem.

Those who don't want to make a profit by building a quality product and are only interested in the quarterly statement returning a bigger dividend to potentially dissatisfied stockholders are the lazy ones in this economy.

And those in Washington, D.C., who have told them for 12 years that greed is good also are lazy.

If the business and political leaders can't compete by unleashing the potential of the American worker, they should lose.

After all, that's what happens in a free market.

RTV students deserve opportunity

Radio-television students were robbed.

It was more than two years ago that the students were promised the use of Studio B in Dole Hall. Now, the studio remains empty because no one has secured grants to finance the video equipment.

As it stands, students can use Studio A when it's not in use by the Kansas Board of Regents.

The problem is that it's almost always in use.

While Carol Oukrop, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism School, is being forced to play chief fundraiser, her students are sitting idle — waiting to get into Studio A — or they are busy patching up obsolete equipment.

It isn't fair.

The students need hands-on experience so they can compete in the tight job market.

If the state won't make it a priority to properly fund the RTV department, then RTV students should take hold of the situation, and with the help of faculty and the administration, form their own electronic media corporation.

Like Student Publications Inc., which produces the Royal Purple, Collegian and the Campus Directory, the corporation would control KSDB-FM 91.9 and the University's TV station.

Not only would students get the experience they need, but they would be self sufficient. The operational costs could be covered by selling air time and producing special projects like commercials or promotional videos for others.

Maybe RTV students then could graduate from this University knowing their years invested at K-State will have value to those on the outside of academia.

Steff knows facial hair

Steff's Quote of the Month Club:

"I do not like broccoli, and I haven't liked it since I was a little kid, and my mother made me eat it. And I'm president of the United States, and I'm not going to eat any more broccoli." — President Bush

As a woman, there are a few things in this world I can honestly say I will never experience first-hand.

Let's see here ...

1. An extremely deep voice
2. Mud football with the guys
3. The U.S. presidency
4. Male pattern baldness
5. Prostate cancer
6. A stand-up pee
7. A morning erection
8. Most important — facial hair

STEFFANY CARREL

Now I suppose I could build up the gumption to go out onto the field with the macho men to throw that trusty, mud-covered pigskin around.

And it is possible I may be one of those few, unfortunate women who lose all but three hairs by age 92. But, really, it isn't likely.

Facial hair, however, is definitely out of my realm, and because of that, it becomes a part of that little-known and elusive "male mystique."

Of course, it's all in the way you approach the male facial hair.

It requires a certain understanding and appreciation. Above all, you must be able to recognize the personality types behind the outside fuzz.

We'll start at the beginning.

• No sign of growth whatsoever (softer than a baby's butt) — Man tends to be a blond and very fair. Personality type ranges between social lint and cutie-pie frat guy.

• Clean-shaven every morning precisely at eight (not a stray sprout in sight) — Man can be any variety. Personality type is invariably conservative and straight-laced, or at least would like to give that impression.

• Stubble at the chin and above the upper lip (no more than two days worth) — Man can be of any sort. Personality type leans toward the athletic breed who are disciplined, but may forget to shave if the big meet is close at hand.

• A "90210" sideburns adaptation (otherwise known as Greg-Brady-revenge sideburns) — Man can be of any format. Personality type is that of a frat guy gone bad or cool loner from North Dakota. (Also includes all those who desperately want this image.)

• Noticeable whisker development (face, however, can still be seen beneath the growth) — Man can be any kind. Personality type can stretch between grease skids with noticeable underarm stains to otherwise well-balanced men whose priorities are currently involved with potentially obsessive hobbies (namely model airplane building).

A rip-roaring-oh-my-god-it's-alive beard

• A little bug of a mustache (usually unnoticeable until one is within three feet of the individual's face) — Man can be of any extraction. Personality type can range from the very tight and emotionally constipated to the loud, brash Freddie Mercury set.

• A big, long furry mustache (can be used for dental floss if necessary) — Man can be any breed. Personality type tends toward the wild side. A Harley Davidson or a large pipe usually accompanies this fuzzy face.

• A goatee of any length (For those who are not whisker connoisseurs, this is facial hair only on the chin, above the upper lip and on the little trails on the sides of the mouth) — Man can be any brand. Personality type is that of a liberal or someone who doesn't give a flying fart. Are often mistakenly referred to as "young hippies."

• An out-and-out beard (trimmed to short perfection) — Man can be of any distinction. Personality type is that of the perfectionist, always organized and always ready with a small pair of grooming scissors in the case of any meticulous improvements on "the beard."

• A rip-roaring-oh-my-god-it's-alive beard (free-flowing and in need of a severe trimming) — Men can be of any religion or creed. Personality type is unpredictable in all cases, but is either a street bum with mind-boggling, untapped intellectual potential or a predestined college professor with mind-boggling, untapped intellectual potential.

So, the next time you're wandering about campus, thinking there's just nothing to do, remember this:

Stop and roll in the grass.
Stop and smell the flowers.
Stop and wait for someone to bump into you.

And by all means, stop and check out that spectrum of male facial hair.

LETTER

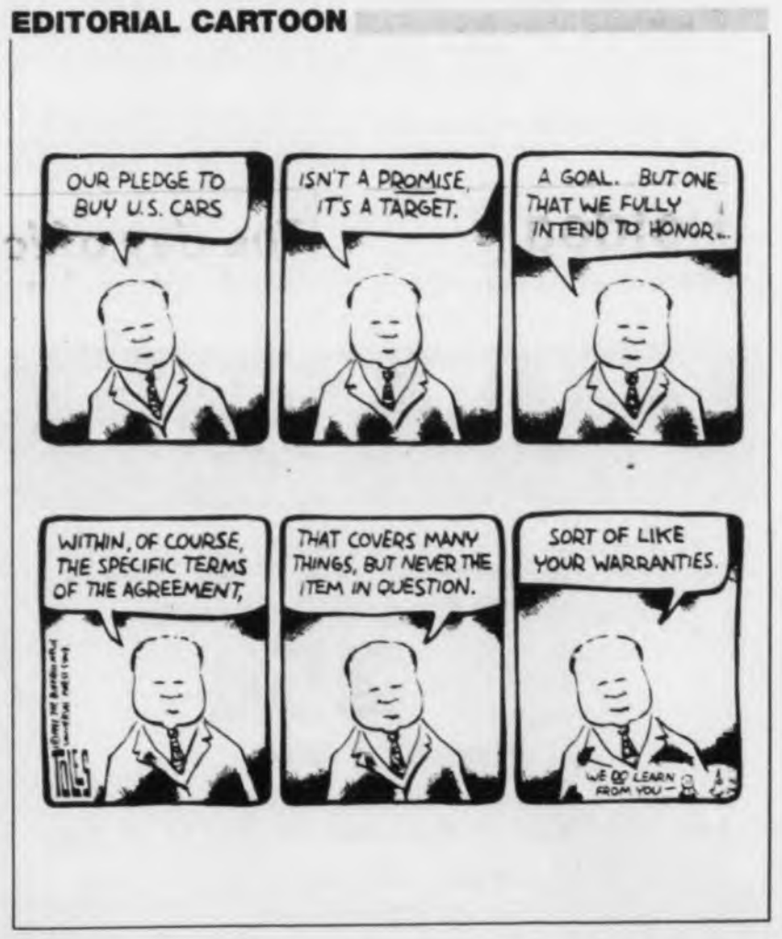
▶BLACK GREEKS ARE LIKE ANY OTHER CLUB

Editor,

I am not a member of any greek organization or even any campus organization for that matter. So, I'm not very well versed on either of these subjects. However, ignorant as I may be, something still seems amiss in Eve Wilson's column "Go Ahead, Surprise Us."

Wilson believes black fraternities and sororities should be listed along with members of the greek system in the yearbook, stating: "For far too long, black sororities and fraternities on this campus have been thought of as campus organizations."

This statement leaves me with one question. What characteristics of black sororities and fraternities separate them from other campus organizations? I really don't see a whole lot of difference, for example, between a sorority such as Alpha Kappa Alpha and one such as Tau Beta Sigma (a band sorority), or even clubs such as the Rodeo Club. All three are specialized organizations, and I am fairly certain that I wouldn't have a prayer of getting into any of the three.



As far as I know, the organizations of K-State's greek system are large diversified groups with no such limitations. Everyone is fair game. Hence, my perception of the basic difference between campus organizations and the greek system.

But on to my point.

Personally, I could care less how people or organizations are listed in the yearbook. However, it does seem only fair that if certain specialized organizations, such as black sororities and fraternities, are listed with the organizations of the greek system (complete with individual pictures and the whole works), then Tau Beta Sigma, Rodeo Club and all other specialized campus organizations should be listed that way also. Then, everyone would be happy, and since this would probably double the size of the Royal Purple, no one would ever have to worry about filling empty space again.

A chat with Joe Automan

Japan's House speaker, Yoshio Sakurauchi, recently made the comment that American workers are lazy and unproductive.

"American workers don't work hard enough," Sakurauchi was quoted as saying. "They don't work, but demand high pay."

Sakurauchi reportedly called the United States "Japan's subcontractor" and boldly stated that American workers "turn out so many defective products."

Sakurauchi has since retracted the statements, but, in the spirit of fair play with the general intent to incite a riot, I called Joe Automan, a friend of mine at an auto assembly plant only a few hours drive from here.

BRAD SEABOURN

Just as I suspected, Joe had a few things to say about Sakurauchi's less-than-flattering evaluation of American workers.

"Horse hooey."

That's it? Nothing else to say ... just, "Horse hooey?" Come on! I've got a column to write. Let's hear it. Really give it to him, pal.

"Awright. 'It's the biggest crock of Japanshita to makeshita itsa wayashita out of Tokyoshita.' How's that for puttin' it so they can understand it?"

At least it's printable.

But can you be a little more specific? We have a very curious readership here in Manhattan.

"Well, take that crack 'bout being lazy and unproductive. Now, I work a reg'lar 40-hour week just like ever'body else, an' get time 'n' a half overtime when I can get it, so ... "

So, you don't think you are lazy or unproductive?

"Well, not so's you'd notice."

What do you mean?

"I mean, don't you know anything 'bout economics? The Japs have taken a big bite outta the American car market, not to mention the recession.

"If there ain't as many Americans buyin' American, and even more of them not buyin' cause they ain't got the money, then we just don't make as many cars in a day's time.

"There's really only one way to make less cars without losing the farm and lookin' like a boob — you cut labor. And them rich rubes in management ain't about to stand in no unemployment line, so it's us workin' stiffs who get the boot.

"That's what I meant when I said, 'not so's you'd notice.'"

I'm afraid I'm not following you.

"When I'm not workin', it's almost like I am workin,' only I ain't doin' anything — work, I mean.

"Heck, between unemployment and the special provisions the UAW has worked into our contract, we get paid 95 percent of our salary when we're laid off."

You're kidding.

"The heck I am."

Ninety-five percent? How much do you get paid an hour?

"About $16 an hour."

Doing what?

"I work in Quality Control checkin' lights and switches after the cars roll off the assembly line."

You get paid $16 an hour to flip switches?

"Somebody's got to do it."

Why can't they use a robot?

"That boots me outta a job. Might be cheaper for the factory, but if I ain't got a job, I can't buy a car.

Robots are nice, but I ain't seen one yet that could buy a car."

Good point. So, how long were you laid off last year?

"Six months, give or take a few weeks."

Six months! What the heck did you do for six months?

"Man, it was great. I laid around and watched some TV, drank a few beers, went to the horse races ... you know. It was like Saturday every day for six months."

Let me get this straight. You flipped switches six months out of last year at full salary — which is well more than $30,000 a year. And then for the rest of the year, you got paid 95 percent of your salary to not flip switches and check lights, during which time you just goofed off watching TV, drinking beer and playing the horses?

"Yeah ... well, not so's you'd notice."

KSU FOUNDATION

Telefund looks promising

SHANE KEYSER/Collegian

Tricia Boone, senior in home economics education, places calls to K-State alumni Tuesday evening at the Telefund Center.

Contributions up from 1991, says McMahon

BRIAN KRATZER
Collegian

Expectations for this year's Annual KSU Giving/Telefund are high.

"It looks like we will have a good year, but all the hay's not in the barn," said Russ McMahon, director of Annual Giving/KSU Foundation, concerning the pledge outlook for 1992. "Things are about even. We're slightly ahead of last year.

"It looks like a record year for the most amount of money contributed to K-State."

He said the recession has not been felt in the past seven months of the telefund.

"If there are money problems, donors are cutting their budgets in other places and continuing their philanthropy with K-State," he said.

In 1991, $757,000 was raised through 20,735 pledges.

"We always look for goals, but we don't have an official goal," McMahon said.

He said he hopes to reach $775,000 and about 21,500 pledges.

On March 15, all the pledges for the telefund will be finished.

"In the history of the College of Agriculture, pledges have gone up," John Riley, assistant director and resident instructor in the College of Agriculture said.

"Pledges have gone up during some hard times in agriculture," Riley said.

In 1990 and 1991, people donated $90,000 and $92,770, respectively, to the college.

"I hope that we can hit six figures this year," Riley said. "I won't deny that that's an optimistic goal. We'll be pleased with whatever we get. I don't think the College of Agriculture has seen as much of a recession as other colleges."

McMahon said in the past, during severe times, the amount of giving to programs has lost support.

"We're not panicked here at all. K-State is in the middle of an extreme growth period," he said.

McMahon said people will not use the recession as a reason to not contribute.

LEGISLATURE

Senate votes to kill primary

House committee will likely defeat measure, Majority Leader Sawyer says

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The Senate passed, 26-12, on Wednesday a bill that would kill the April 7 presidential preference primary election.

The action sent the measure to the House, where it is expected to get a chilly reception.

House Majority Leader Tom Sawyer, D-Wichita, said the measure will be referred to the House Elections Committee, where he predicted it would die.

"We plan to have a primary," Sawyer said. "We plan to fund it."

The Legislature passed a bill last year that created the primary.

However, lawmakers did not provide funding for it, which could force counties to pay the cost.

The Senate bill originally would have appropriated $1.5 million to cover the primary.

Opponents, led by Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, amended the measure during debate Tuesday to remove the money, then further amended it to repeal the law that created the primary.

Eighteen Republicans and six Democrats voted for the measure on final roll call Wednesday.

Sawyer said the House will pass a funding bill for the election later in the session. If the Senate does not pass that measure, then the counties will have to pay for the election, he said.

for any person who interferes with a person's ability to enter a clinic. Interference under the proposed bill can be physically blocking the entrance or verbal threats.

"It is moving the fastest and receiving the most attention. I think it has a good chance of passing because it appeals to a broad range of Legislators," Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said.

The Committee on Federal and State Affairs started hearings on the bill Wednesday and they will continue today.

The timeliness of the Court's review has helped fuel an already heated issue.

"Any Supreme Court decision that has the potential to overturn Roe v. Wade is going to elevate the abortion discussion," Glasscock said.

Schindler, because he was shut down early, has a surplus of hotdogs.

"I've made beanie wienies, pork and beans, pigs in a blanket. I'm sick of them. There's really nothing you can do with a hotdog," he said.

The future for complimentary on-campus vending is hazy for Schindler.

"I went to SGA to see what it would take. I don't like to say they don't know what they're talking about, but they made it seem impossible," he said.

SPORTS DIGEST

NBA: Good boy Mike has GONE BAD

PHOENIX (AP) — Michael Jordan, suspended for the first time in his NBA career, wished his teammates well Wednesday and then left for the All-Star weekend.

Earlier in the day, the NBA fined Jordan $5,000 and suspended him for one game for bumping a referee in Chicago's triple-overtime loss Monday night to the Jazz at Utah.

The Bulls, minus Jordan, played the Phoenix Suns here Wednesday night.

Jordan, who played golf Tuesday at the Phoenix Country Club, was not available for comment.

However, Jordan arranged before the six-game road trip to have his private jet fly him from Phoenix to Orlando, Fla., site of the All-Star Game on Sunday, team spokesman Tim Hallam said.

Scottie Pippen, the team's other top player, said Jordan visited most of the players in their rooms after he got the news.

"He basically said, 'See you after the All-Star break,'" said Pippen, who also will play for the East team and coach Phil Jackson on Sunday.

FOOTBALL: Ex-Cats drafted by WLAF

In its second annual draft, the World League of American Football selected two former K-State Wildcats.

Linebacker Maurice Henry, who also had a short stint with the Kansas City Chiefs, was selected in the sixth round by San Antonio, while wide receiver Pat Jackson was taken by New York-New Jersey in the 10th round.

At K-State, Jackson played primarily at running back. His 156 yards rushing against New Mexico State in 1990 stands as the 15th best ground performance in school history.

For the year, Jackson rushed for 721 yards, good for 6th place on the school's all-time single season rushing chart.

He also collected 102 yards against Northern Illinois earlier that same year.

As a defensive end, Henry represented K-State in the 1989 Blue-Gray game.

NBA: All-Star scalpers everywhere

ORLANDO, Fla. (AP) — The price of a ticket to Sunday's NBA All-Star game has been pushed to $1,000 by scalpers and brokers, and police are trying to enforce what they say is a weak Florida law against illegal profits.

"I've never seen a ticket as hard to get as this one," said Harry Meeks, who has gone to two Super Bowls.

Scalpers and representatives for brokers are out in force, sending prices soaring and bringing out people seeking big profits on pro basketball's big game.

They've run newspaper ads, left fliers on windshields and pasted phone numbers in Orlando Arena bathrooms.

"They were giving me cards in the bathroom — people from Tampa, New Jersey, Miami," said Bill Syndor, who went to an Orlando Magic game Monday night and walked out with 12 business cards.

Florida law prohibits "scalping" tickets for more than $1 over their face value.

The Lady Cats played the best team in the Big Eight Wednesday night, according to head coach Susan Yow.

Yow made the statement after a hot Colorado handed the Lady Cats their 15th loss of the year, 69-56.

Yow

"I think Colorado can win the Big Eight," Yow said confidently. "In fact, I think they're a better team than (No. 20) Kansas. Now there's a bold statement, huh."

For a while, it looked as if the Yow-proclaimed best team in the league was going to be upset. For the first six minutes of the contest, the Lady Cats shot a searing 70 percent from the field.

But, as in their previous games against Missouri and Kansas, the Lady Cats fell silent from the floor, allowing the Lady Buffs to take a 31-23 halftime lead.

In the second half, Colorado increased its lead to as many as 18 points (67-49), after thwarting two Lady Cat comeback bids.

Yow cited Colorado's game plan as the key to the game. With routine substitutions, the Lady Buffs were able to put as many as three 6-foot-2 players on the floor at any given time, which exploited the Lady Cats inside on offense and neutralized the rebounding of Leah Honeycutt and Jennifer Grebing on defense.

Freshman Shelley Sheetz guided the Lady Buffs' offensive attack, scoring a game-high 18 points while directing a smart inside offensive attack.

"They are much more disciplined than any team we've played," Yow said. "We got to within 10 twice, and we could not capitalize. And a lot of the credit for that goes to the Colorado players' enormous self-discipline at both ends of the floor."

The Lady Cats employed a full-court press in order to force turnovers, but the Lady Buffs were able to neutralize the defense almost routinely.

"We just couldn't get any steals the way they spread the court on us," Yow said.

Yow said she told her players they had to shoot at least 45 percent to win against Colorado. They shot 43 percent.

"We shot 39 percent in the first half and 52 percent in the second half," Yow said. "The difference was that we had too many inconsistent spurts, and when I say spurts, I mean as in bad ones.

"We might be shooting good, but then we'd go eight possessions without scoring while Colorado would maybe score on four of those eight."

Those missed opportunities on the offensive end might have translated to the Lady Cat defense, Yow said.

"I think after they couldn't convert on one, two or three trips down the court, they tended to lose their intensity on defense and worry about what was wrong on offense."

Still, Yow touted the Lady Cat defensive performance as one of the best efforts of the Big Eight season.

"I was really, really pleased with our effort," Yow said. "The girls played really hard even when we fell way behind, which I think is absolutely outstanding."

Mary Jo Miller once again led the Lady Cats with 14 points. Lynn Holzman added 12 and Pam Stoltz came off the bench with 10 points.

The loss dropped the Lady Cats to 5-15 overall and 2-5 in league play. The win was Colorado's fourth league win in a row, boosting its record to 12-8 and 4-3. Next up for K-State is a road game at Nebraska Saturday.

FROM THE DUGOUT

This old field?

The Wildcats become 'handycats' when Frank Myers Field is in need of a little home improvement

STEVEN ROCK
Collegian

If Frank Myers Field, where the K-State baseball team has established five straight winning seasons, has been looking more professional lately, don't congratulate the grounds crew.

Congratulate the team.

Because of limited funds given to the baseball program, the players themselves have taken the responsibility of upgrading the stadium.

"We're trying to upgrade our facilities every year," Coach Mike Clark said.

The improvements are done primarily to keep the field as professional as possible.

"Baseball in this neck of the woods is very competitive," Clark said.

"If you don't show improvement, you're taking a step backward. We need to show that we're improving our facility."

The players, essentially the pitchers, though they said they don't care for the physical labor required, accept the task and get it done.

"It's not anything everybody really enjoys doing," Tim Churchman, right-handed pitcher, said.

"It's not anything everybody really enjoys doing, but if the team wants it done, we have to do it ourselves."
— Tim Churchman, pitcher

But "if the team wants it done, we have to do it ourselves," he said.

Another Cats right-hander, Brett Bock, said he realizes the team has to take responsibility for the appearance of the field.

"Due to budget reasons with non-revenue sports," Bock said, "if we want to have a top-notch field, we're going to have to do the work, or it won't get done."

Working on the field is nothing new for the K-State baseball team.

Since Clark's debut as the Cat coach five years ago, the squad has made improvements annually.

"We put together that whole stadium. And every year, we try to do a little more to make it a better field," Clark said.

"We're just continuing a tradition we started five years ago."

The tradition lives on.

The latest chapter includes expanding a portion of the center field fence, and more importantly, building a new bullpen area.

"We're going to move our hitting cages into that new bullpen area," Clark said.

The newest addition will create more efficient practices, putting batting practices in a more convenient location.

"We worked on the field. Going out and winning on it makes it that much better."
— Brett Bock, pitcher

"Before, we had to go behind the stands," he said. "Now, we're going to have everything right there on-sight."

Clark said he estimates the team is two-thirds done with the expansion, and the squad has been working on it for only about a week.

By doing the expansion work themselves, the baseball team makes the most out of an unfortunate situation.

"I'm disappointed that I can't do more for Mike and the baseball program," said Athletic Director Milt Richards, referring to the amount of income the baseball team is afforded.

The efforts of Clark, whose team's expenditures have never been over budget, have not gone unnoticed.

"I think Mike Clark typifies what's good about KSU," Richards said. "He is just a terrific coach.

"He just goes out and gets it done."

For Bock, it's more than just a necessity; there's a reputation at stake.

"It's a sense of pride," Bock said. "It kind of indirectly reflects on the team."

And, in doing the work, success is that much sweeter.

"We worked on the field," Bock said. "Going out and winning on it makes it that much better."

COLUMN

C'mon Dana, put Henson in the game

Get the future of the K-State basketball team off the bench.

Brian Henson needs to play.

As a freshman on a team consisting largely of highly acclaimed community college transfers, Henson has been averaging just less than 12 minutes a game.

Sure, he has more PT than the other three Cat freshmen combined. And I realize he has played just 74 fewer minutes than senior John Rettiger.

I don't care.

The on-court troubles of the Wildcats, despite Saturday's victory over Colorado, are, unfortunately, very similar to the economic troubles facing our nation — the potential for complete recovery is there, but nobody is willing to fill the seemingly vacant leadership role.

STEVEN ROCK

Let No. 12 give it a shot. It wouldn't be the first time.

The K-State Wildcat basketball program has a rich history of successful freshmen.

In fact, one need not look any further than Brian's own next of kin, Steve, who is a legend in these parts. And, realizing how truly unfair it is to constantly compare Brian to his big brother, I've chosen to take a different approach: comparing other coaches' utilization of freshmen to that of Dana Altman's.

Way back in the 1974-75 season, under the leadership of Jack Hartman, the winningest coach in K-State history, freshman Mike Evans averaged 17 points a game.

Evans did little more than become the all-time leading scorer in K-State's rich history, finishing his career with a total of 2,115 points.

Then, in the 1977-78 season, perhaps the biggest name in K-State basketball made his debut. Freshman Rolando Blackman, a 6-foot 5-inch forward, averaged 10.9 points a game. Before Blackman was finished, he would become the No. 2 scorer in Cat basketball, behind only Evans, with 1,844 points.

There's more.

The year after Blackman's debut was the debut of another Wildcat legend: Ed Nealy.

Nealy scored more than 10 points a game during his freshman year and finished with 1,304. Nealy also pulled more rebounds in his career than any other Wildcat, after averaging 8.2 his inaugural year, a record for freshmen.

On a more recent note, the aforementioned Steve Henson.

No. 12 was given the opportunity to play in his freshman year — 1986. He responded by averaging 7.5 points a game. Henson also drilled 40.6 percent of his 3-point shots, a total of 26, which set the standard for K-State freshmen.

And finally, the 1989-90 season brought the debut of Askia Jones. Jones averaged 7.9 points a game for a team that went to the NCAA tournament.

Need I say more?

Brian's numbers, skimpy as they may be, are impressive.

Henson has averaged more than 6 points a game. He has also drilled 15 3-pointers for the season, putting himself in the position at least to challenge the freshmen record set by the elder Henson.

But perhaps the most impressive of Brian's stats is his number of steals.

Through 146 minutes of play this season, Henson has swiped the ball 11 times.

On the average, Henson has a steal for every 13 minutes he plays. Compare that to some of the other Cats: Vincent Jackson, one every 23 minutes; Trasel Rone, one every 23.5 minutes; Askia Jones, one every 27 minutes; Gaylon Nickerson, one every 19 minutes; and Marcus Ziegler, one every 24 minutes.

Sure, I realize it's not easy to give PT to a freshman on a team of highly acclaimed upperclassmen, especially now that both Nickerson and Rone are playing so confidently.

And I understand that, this being the thick of the conference race, an unestablished player isn't the go-to guy.

But something needs to be done.

Brian Henson simply needs the same thing his predecessors were given — a chance. A chance to prove he can shoot hoops with the big boys, a chance to hush those who insist on pitting Brian against his brother.

And more importantly, a chance to fill the role of leader.

State-run sports system will survive

ASSOCIATED PRESS
Collegian

NOVOGORSK, Russia — Bureaucrat-turned-businessman Vladimir Osipovich waves reverently at his shrine — four display cases of sports medals and a wall of framed photographs of Soviet Olympic heroes.

"We call this the 'hall of glory,'" sighs white-haired Osipovich, 52, director of the now profit-based Novogorsk sports complex just outside Moscow that is home to most of the former Soviet Union's Olympic teams.

"Even if the state-run sports system collapses, our sports will survive."

As athletes of the former Soviet Union arrive this week in Albertville to compete for Olympic gold, Osipovich is one of dozens of former sports officials who are meeting a different challenge — to survive the commercialization of what was once the Soviet sports machine.

It is sink or swim for these novice businessmen, who are fighting to keep athletic schools, clubs and training camps alive amid deep cuts in government subsidies following the Soviet Union's collapse.

For Osipovich, whose sprawling sports center is nestled in snow-covered hills, the changes require creative approaches to woo sponsors and turn profits.

Last month, Novogorsk for the first time hosted diplomats from the British, Turkish and Hungarian embassies who paid the equivalent of $10 a day to use the center's pools, saunas, jacuzzis, basketball courts and world-class ice rink.

Novogorsk, completed by the Soviet government in time for the 1980 Moscow Olympics, is considered Russian government property, according to Osipovich.

STUDENT SENATE

Minors program to be considered

ANDY WOODWARD
Collegian

Student Senate approval of an academic minors program and disapproval for Aggieville noise restrictions will probably become reality at tonight's Student Senate meeting.

"Faculty Senate just wanted a statement from Student Senate to show support for the minors program," said Becky Bryan, senator in business administration.

"It's the same as the resolutions that passed three or four times. I think it will pass unanimously," she said.

If passed, Student Senate will officially request Faculty Senate to establish an academic minors program.

According to the resolution, "many students would benefit from obtaining a minor degree ... there is no formal recognition of a student's academic achievement outside his or her major, and the addition of a minors degree program would better present a student's academic background to prospective employers of graduate schools."

A second resolution facing Student Senate is one voicing the student body's disapproval of the late-night, outdoor-noise ordinance before the Manhattan City Commission.

"There weren't a whole lot of changes to the first reading. There wasn't any opposition," said Steve Patton, senator in business administration and author of the resolution.

"It's detrimental to the Aggieville businesses and to the K-State students to have a law like that," he said.

CAMPUS

40 classes cut from schedule

K-State budget woes put a crunch on the College of Arts and Sciences

MEGAN MULLIKIN
Collegian

About 40 classes in the College of Arts and Sciences were taken off the line schedule this semester because funding to pay instructors was not available.

William Feyerharm, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said it is best to get classes listed on the line schedule and lay out all possibilities.

He said this puts the class in the computer and reserves a room.

"Things weren't eliminated, but they were put on the schedule at capacity zero. If the funds came in, we were able to open the class," Feyerharm said.

University Registrar Don Foster said it's typical practice to set up extra sections, especially in the math department. The department may never intend to teach them.

"Some departments include classes on the line schedule that it knows are not going to open unless extra funding comes along," Foster said.

Even though the line schedule is already being set up for fall 1992, the exact amount of funding available is undetermined until summer. This means revisions or shifting might be necessary to meet budget.

"There are two problems," Feyerharm said.

"We have to guess about numbers for enrollment, and we may not realize the budget until May or June, which causes us to cut classes to balance the variables."

After the budget is set, departmental heads and academic deans meet to discuss cuts or additions to the class schedule.

"They try and decide where the funding is going to go, and then what cuts they make that will do the least amount of damage," Foster said.

There are more than 2,000 freshmen enrolled in the freshman writing program, and there are only 53 instructors.

ENROLLMENT

Students crowded in introductory classes

Decrease in faculty, lack of funds results in full or over-capacity courses

DOUGLAS GRUSH
Collegian

There are about 60 fewer students enrolled this semester than in spring 1991, but many classes are more crowded than ever.

As of Jan. 15, there were 17,168 students enrolled, compared to 17,225 this time last year.

Excluding the Graduate School and the College of Veterinary Medicine, there are 81 fewer undergraduates than last spring.

Many classes, primarily introductory courses such as biology, chemistry, Introduction to Personal Computing and English Composition 1 are 100-percent full.

Others such as English Composition 2, most literature classes, and history and geography courses are from 95- to 100-percent full.

Some classes such as General Microbiology are at more than 110 percent.

Classes are closer to capacity or over capacity because the number of faculty have decreased, said William Feyerharm, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

"It's not that we have fired faculty, but we have not been replacing all who have left," he said.

"In the last five years, the University has grown by 4,000-5,000, but there is no more money."

He said the state has cut funding to K-State in last couple of years, and enrollment has increased.

Arts and sciences, Feyerharm said, had to cut nearly $1 million from a $20-million budget since last year.

Bradley Shaw, head of the Department of Modern Languages, said the cuts come at a bad time.

Since he took his job in 1988, Shaw said, he has had to expand from eight to 15 sections in introductory Spanish courses alone.

Because foreign languages require a lot of two-way communication between the teacher and the pupil, he has been unable to enlarge the classes much.

BOOK REVIEW

Bernhardt's novel offers legal reality, but too much fantasy

ROGER STEINBROCK
Collegian

William Bernhardt's first novel, "Primary Justice," shows the tenacity of corporate law, but the storyline fails due to the lack of realistic characters.

Bernhardt, who is an attorney practicing in Tulsa, Okla., gives a good description of the legal industry.

Main character Ben Kincaid is a lawyer who leaves his position at the Oklahoma City District Attorney's office to become part of Tulsa's most prestigious law firm, Raven, Tucker & Tubb.

With his first case — a simple adoption proceeding — Kincaid's troubles start to mount when his client, Jonathan Adams, is murdered. Adams was working for the firm's largest client, Sanguine Enterprises, which owns a national chain of fast-food restaurants called Egg 'N' Stuff.

Throughout the book, Kincaid blunders about getting himself into several awkward situations.

For instance, he finds himself lured into a janitor's closet by sex-kitten Mona Raven, the wife of his law firm's president. She later helps him escape from a tough, rugged biker bar, the Red Parrot.

Bernhardt's characterization of Mona is unrealistic. No million-dollar executive's wife would be found hanging out with a bunch of leather-clad bikers.

Kincaid is constantly fighting off emotions about his late father, but he comes to term with them in the end.

Another area where Bernhardt lacks credibility is in Kincaid's determination to find the murderer.

Kincaid acts like a police officer instead of a lawyer. He even breaks into Sanguine Enterprises to retrieve some documents from Adams' office when it was supposed to be sealed by police. A lawyer would find breaking into a corporation's offices unethical, but it doesn't matter to Kincaid.

Bernhardt continually states Kincaid is a lawyer because "he wants to do good," but Kincaid doesn't want to consider the best interests of his client. Instead, he reveals his knowledge of Sanguine Enterprises extorting money.

Kincaid is then asked to join Sanguine Enterprises in a liaison role between the law firm and the corporation.

A nice twist Bernhardt includes is the child, who was supposed to be adopted by Adams, becoming a viable part of the story. But Bernhardt makes two minor characters the center of two murders.

Bernhardt tries to shock the reader with his ending, but the reader is left agitated and disgruntled.

Bernhardt should stick to law — it would be the best justice for all.

Rollerblades popular

Users of in-line skates face same campus restrictions as skateboarders

COLLEGIAN STAFF

In-line skates, or roller blades,which were first popularized several years ago in California, have steadily been catching on in the heart of the country.

"I first saw them on MTV about a year ago, and I've wanted a pair ever since," Brenda Ross, senior in apparel and textile marketing, said.

"I finally got my first pair this Christmas, and I and my friends have been on them as often as possible this semester."

Ross said it is the unique cross between ice- and roller-skating, along with the outdoor element, that she really enjoys.

"It is a great way to relieve stress or to just get away and enjoy this great weather we've been having," she said.

"I've been practicing on campus and in parking lots around town. However, campus has been the most popular place to skate this semester," she said.

Charles Beckom, K-State Police chief, said there are no specific restrictions for rollerblades.

"We're using the same restrictions we have placed on skateboards," he said. "Our main concerns center around protecting the decorative material around campus.

"Skating on the pyramids in front of Durland, on stone facings and items like the Vietnam Veterans Memorial cause damage to the stone facing, and these happen to be popular for stunts and tricks.

"Most people use rollerblades as an alternative form of transportation, and the bike paths are the most efficient areas to use them," he said.

A copy of the regulations concerning skateboards can be picked up at the campus police station in East Stadium.

With cold weather still ahead, outdoors is not the only place people can use rollerblades.

The Skate Plaza Roller Rink offers an indoor area for skating.

"People with their own roller blades are allowed to use them on the rink, but they must be cleaned of gravel and oil first," Everett Stilley, Skate Plaza owner, said. "We also have several pairs to rent."

The roller rink is working to put together an indoor-hockey game sometime around spring break. But, the game is for children only, and Stilley said they aren't planning anything like this for adults at this moment.

Stilley said this isn't the first time he has offered in-line skates for rent.

"We had these skates about 28 years ago. The first patent for the in-line skate was in about 1862, and the Roller Skating Museum of History in Nebraska has about 30 pairs of the skates," he said.

Within this time, rollerblades have adapted to several different types of people and uses.

Conference aims at awareness

Several campus offices are sponsoring a teleconference today in an effort to help the K-State community understand the needs of gay, lesbian and bisexual students.

The teleconference will be from 12:30 to 2:30 p.m. today in Bluemont 016.

There also will be a panel-led discussion from 2:30 to 3:30 p.m.

The program includes a video conference sponsored by the National Association of Student Personnel Administrators and the National University Teleconference Network.

The video conference will be presented live, via-satellite, from Washington, D.C.

The teleconference is sponsored by Department of Housing and Dining Services, University Counseling Services, Lafene Health Center, the Dean of Student Life Office, Women's Resource Center, Task Force to Study the Concerns of Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Students, faculty and staff, and the President's Human Rights Education Committee.

The program will help campuses deal with homophobia, anti-gay prejudice and harassment, and also provide a supportive campus environment for gay, lesbian and bisexual students.

"The purpose of the teleconference is that the K-State campus wants to learn from other campuses about their experiences and struggles for improving the gay, lesbian and bisexual climate," Judy Davis, Educational Personal Program director, said.

The program agenda is broken down into three segments. The first is awareness and knowledge of gay, lesbian and bisexual students and who these students are.

The second deals with the problems and issues of today's college campuses.

Sgt. K.W. Padgett of the RCPD said he thinks most cities of any size in Kansas would have a city ordinance on a waiting period.

"The reason Ogden does not is because the town has its own city council, even though we provide police patrol since they are in Riley County," he said.

There are 24 states in the United States that have a waiting period or a permit system, which is a lot like a waiting period, said Bill McIntyre, spokesman for the National Rifle Association.

The permit system requires a buyer to obtain a permit to purchase and own a handgun, which requires a waiting period to get the permit, he said.

"The NRA opposes any waiting period prior to the purchase of firearms," McIntyre said. "They only act as prior restraint on individual rights of law-abiding citizens.

"They do nothing to curtail criminal access to firearms, and in the two dozen states where they exist, they have failed to reduce crime as promised.

"In fact," he said, "in states where waiting periods exist, murder rates and violent crime rates have increased, and, in many cases, accelerated faster than the national average.

"The FBI Uniform Crime Reports, in a study of violent crime from 1986 to 1990, show that 22 of the 24 states' violent crime rates have increased," McIntyre said.

"Fifteen of those 22 have increased faster than the national average."

in the northeast district, and Kerr is proposing to move Reno County to the first district. Currently, Reno County is a part of the fourth district.

Oleen said she thinks her proposal keeps the blend of existing districts, and that it is mandatory to keep both districts together.

"My mission is to keep Riley and Geary counties together," Oleen said. "My surveys show that this is the most important move to make."

Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said the plan has a long road ahead. But he said he is delighted with the efforts of Oleen and Kerr and will back anything that keeps Riley and Geary counties coupled.

"I will do everything I can on the house side to make sure their proposal is the final map," Glasscock said.

trace his family's ancestry and write "Roots." He said stories and traditions that have trickled down from generation to generation are becoming less familiar to young blacks.

"The strength of the family is declining," Haley said.

Reynolds said the media and the educational system also break down black pride. She said although 80 percent of drug users are white, news footage of drug abuse focuses on blacks.

She also said connotations of words like minority and underclass had bad effects on young blacks.

In addition, Hampton mentioned classroom situations in which issues such as affirmative action and racism have been discussed.

"People just need to be able to talk to each other," Hampton said. He said many teachers, black and white, have difficulty discussing race issues in the classroom. He said this was a stage that was necessary for teachers to go through and overcome.

Reynolds said in the past Jesse Jackson would say, "Send me a black reporter." However, she said today black students can't say, "Send me a black professor."

Stone said some blacks misrepresent the black cause. He said some blacks who wear Malcolm X hats and T-shirts sell drugs and commit rape, and he said black youth aren't as united as they have been in the past.

"We have to be able to stand up like Malcolm and bring blacks to accountability," Stone said.

The appointment of Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas was also discussed.

"Is Clarence Thomas black?" Renee Poussaint, the moderator, asked.

Reynolds said with the Clarence Thomas trials, "you had the invention of a Negro."

"Amens" came from the audience, both on television and in Bluemont.

Following the transmission, K-State viewers had an open discussion.

One member of the audience disagreed with the Clarence Thomas argument.

"We're all black, and we all have our differences," said the person, who asked not to be identified.

LEGISLATURE

Senators hear arguments on admissions

Requirements may be implemented for high school students entering college

KELLY KLAWONN
Collegian

Although the issue of implementing a restricted admissions policy has been addressed in Topeka the past few sessions, some school officials say it may actually pass this year.

"Times are different now, the world is different now, Kansas is different now. The time has come for qualified admissions," said John Burke, Superintendent of the Manhattan-Ogden school district.

The Senate Education Committee began hearings Wednesday on the proposed qualified admissions bill for Board of Regents schools. Wednesday's hearings were devoted to proponents.

If passed, Kansas high school students would be required to achieve a 2.0 grade point average on a 4.0 scale, score a minimum of 23 on the ACT or rank in the top one-third of their graduating class.

The Board of Regents may also authorize a regents institution to adopt stricter admissions policies.

Currently, any Kansas high school student who has graduated from an accredited state high school can attend a regents school.

Proponents of the bill have said the current open admissions policies have created students who are ill-prepared for college courses, which creates a strain on state institutions that are having to spend more money on remedial classes.

Opponents of the bill, however, have said equal opportunity in education will not exist if the state adopts a selective admissions standard.

Burke said in his testimony to the committee that the smartest students in the state are leaving to go to college.

"The state's top scorer on the ACT, 33, left to attend college at Grinnell in Iowa," Burke said.

Along with admission requirements, students would also have to enroll in a pre-college curriculum determined by the regents.

At minimum, students would be required to take four units of English, three units of math, three units of social studies, three units of natural science and two units of foreign language.

"The way things are now, high school students select classes like they are going through a salad bar. Selecting those classes that offer the least resistance," Burke said.

In order for the bill to go to the Senate floor, six of the 11 committee members must vote in favor.

The hearings continue today. Opponents of the bill are scheduled to testify.

Investment spending, education among solutions to recession

STACY WATERS
Collegian

Increased investment spending and increased spending for education are what many think it will take to get this country back on its feet again.

"The economy right now, basically, is sluggish," Jarvin Emerson, professor of economics said.

As of right now, America is in a recession that's part of the business cycle, Lloyd Thomas, professor of economics said.

"We've always had these business cycles, these ups and downs," he said. "I don't think the cycle can be defeated."

However sluggish the economy is, we are not in an official recession, Emerson said.

A recession is two quarters of negative economic growth, he said.

The last two quarters of 1991 showed positive economic growth.

The United States' productivity growth is 0-1 percent a year, Thomas said. Japan is still growing, and the United States is in danger of no longer being considered a strong country, he said.

"What we've got is more of a stagnant economy than one that is declining," Emerson said.

Economists don't agree on the primary cause of the declining economy, Thomas said. Several theories are a slowdown in technology, a slowdown in the rate of investment and a natural tendency for an economy to reach a peak and drop off.

"There is no one thing that you can say 'This did it,'" Thomas said.

He said he believes the problems with the economy started around 1972 or 1973.

Emerson said more attention has been called to this recession because most of the unemployment is in the white-collar sector. Restructuring of companies has caused professional workers to be laid-off, and they probably will not be recalled, he said.

The huge increase in federal and consumer debt of the 1980s contributed to the inability to move out of the Military plane crashes; 16 dead

ASSOCIATED PRESS

EVANSVILLE, Ind. — A military transport plane plunged nose-first into the ground Thursday and smashed into a motel and restaurant, spewing blazing fuel and killing at least 16 people, authorities and witnesses said.

"It looked like Pearl Harbor," said Mark Whitehead, who lives nearby and rushed to the scene.

The Lockheed C-130 four-engine turboprop plane crashed into the rear of a JoJo's restaurant and the north side of the Drury Inn motel shortly before 11 a.m. EST.

Burning fuel was sprayed hundreds of feet, sending flames 60 feet into the air and creating a tower of black smoke that was visible for miles.

At midafternoon, the fire was out except for some smoldering spots. Firefighters soaked debris with foam to prevent any reignition of fuel-soaked areas.

Five of the dead were members of the Kentucky Air National Guard's 123rd Tactical Airlift Wing. They were on a pilot proficiency training mission, Guard spokesman David Altom said.

Nine people died in the motel and two others were found dead in the restaurant, Rick Woods, chief deputy coroner for Vanderburgh County, said.

No additional victims were expected to be found, Woods said.

At least 19 people were injured.

Sandy Appler, director of marketing and public relations for Evansville Regional Airport, about a mile from the restaurant and motel, said the plane's crew was using the airport to practice landings.

"They were doing exercises known as touch-and-gos, where they touch down and fly out immediately," Altom said. "They did two touch-and-gos. And they asked permission for a low approach and were taking off when they fell into the ... hotel."

"It dropped out of the air and into the Drury Inn's pool, and a wing came off and careened into the back of the JoJo's," Whitehead said.

Fred Pratt of Bozeman, Mont., said he saw the plane drop vertically, "then all of a sudden there was this humongous fireball, and it went down behind the buildings."

JoJo's manager Dennis Serio said the plane came through the window.

Plane crash

- A C-130, practicing touch-and-gos, crashed into a hotel and a restaurant Thursday morning.
- At least 16 people were killed, including the five-person crew.
- The C-130 is one of the largest aircraft in the world.
- This is the second military plane crash in Indiana in 4 1/2 years and the second major plane crash in Evansville in 15 years.

GREGORY A. BRANSON/Collegian

"I got up and everyone was running toward the door," Serio said. "Walls were falling in, steel was all over the place. One cook was knocked down, tried to get up to get back to the dish washer and just couldn't."

Serio said 15 to 20 people were in the building when the plane crashed.

LEARNING to TEACH

Education students experience first-hand the demands of a classroom

HOLLY CAMPBELL
Collegian

The beginning of the semester means new experiences for every student at K-State, but for seniors in education who head into the real world of teaching, those experiences can be scary.

Student teaching causes some students to feel apprehension, nervousness and excitement.

Kim Kice, senior in elementary education, said her first day didn't really cause her to be nervous, but she did feel a great deal of excitement.

"It is a totally different experience," she said.

Although Kice has spent the past three summers working as an assistant during summer school, she said it felt different to be a student teacher.

Susan Wilson is Kice's cooperation teacher in the third grade at Woodrow Wilson School. On the first day, Wilson told Kice to take a deep breath and become a teacher.

Kice said it was hard to become an authority figure.

"You really need to gain respect as an adult," she said.

Teachers can't be their students' buddies, she said.

Right now Kice only teaches part of the morning. Michael Perl, coordinator for laboratory experiences for the College of Education, said the idea is to move the students into teaching gradually.

As the semester progresses, student teachers will begin teaching more and more until they teach the entire day, he said.

Wilson said taking over the classroom is the hardest part of student teaching. She said the student teacher must plan lessons, teach and do everything without missing a beat.

Kice said she stays at the grade school in the morning and takes classes at K-State in the afternoon. Because she is only teaching part time, Kice said she feels like she is in a transitional phase.

After six weeks, Kice will be in the classroom full time and able to get into the full routine.

"I will be able to be the teacher," she said.

Part of the process is for the student teachers to learn themselves, Kice said.

"I'm just as much of a student as they are," she said.

The College of Education tries to prepare the students with as much practical experience as possible, Perl said.

"The goal of student teaching is to become as much like a full-fledged teacher as possible," he said.

Wilson said she feels like the student teachers she has had have been well prepared. The best way to help them learn, she said, is to ask the student teachers questions. She asks them why they did what they did and what they will do differently next time.

Wilson said she tries to get them to try new things and develop their own style. Student teaching is a perfect time to try new things, she said.

Kice said she wants to be able to pick up Wilson's good points and develop them into her style.

"Above all else, we want them to become knowledgeable, caring decision makers," Perl said. "A good teacher makes good decisions."

Professional growth is something Kice says she hopes to gain gradually over the semester through making mistakes.

"When it comes right down to it, you have to do what comes naturally," Kice said.

There are good days and bad days, Kice said, but the good far outweigh the bad.

Committee hears abortion testimony

KELLY KLAWONN
Collegian

"A government that is powerful enough to prohibit abortion is also a government that is powerful enough to force abortion," Pat Ranson of Republicans for Choice said.

Opinions, emotions, fiscal policy and the budget crisis were among the views expressed Wednesday at the House Committee on Federal and State Affairs hearing on a proposed abortion bill.

The bill would prevent the state from interfering with a woman's right to have an abortion and impose stiff penalties on demonstrators who interfere with access to a facility. The final provision of the proposed bill is that counseling services must be provided to patients.

After being moved to a larger location because of the large turnout, a room of concerned onlookers and media listened to the opening day of testimony from proponents of legalized abortions.

A woman who called herself Sylvia came to the hearings to testify about an abortion she had.

Sylvia said her baby couldn't survive without an immediate heart transplant and told the committee what her trip to Wichita was like last summer.

Holding back the tears, she explained how she was prevented from getting an abortion for two days, as the police tried to arrest demonstrators.

SEE RELATED STORY

"We were met by hundreds of protesters. While we waited outside the clinic in 109 degree temperatures, we were flashed pictures of dead baby parts, while the police protected the protesters' rights," Sylvia said.

Wichita City Council member Stan Reeser said he supported the proposed bill because it would create stiffer penalties for disruptive protesters.

"The city lost huge amounts of money last summer trying to police the massive number of demonstrators," Reeser said.

DeSoto Mayor Jim Beatle echoed the sentiments of Reeser, explaining that in smaller towns there are not the resources to police or litigate.

The bill being discussed would make demonstrators unable to demonstrate on the property of abortion clinics or health-care facilities.

STUDENT FINANCES

Publishers regulate textbook prices

Royalties, paper, marketing increase costs for students

DAN GRAFEL
Collegian

Textbook prices are soaring, but the bookstores aren't making more money from textbook sales.

Textbook costs are governed by publishers, and each year brings more expensive paper, higher royalties and more marketing costs, Kay Farley, K-State Union Bookstore manager said.

The increase is then passed on by the publisher to the bookstores and their customers.

And if a book flops, the publishers have to make up for that with other book sales, she said.

A textbook may not pay off if the author writes at a level above or below what is required for that specific book, said Ken Rust of D.C. Heath, a college textbook publishing company.

A quality book may also fail if the market for it is not adequate, or the company fails to market it properly, he said.

Jon Levin, Varney's Book Store manager, said textbook prices go up consistently every year, but the publishers set the price. The mark-up varies, depending on the type of book, he said.

"Most bookstores and some publishers are concerned about the increasing prices," he said.

Levin said he saw a high return rate of new books to publishers last year, because students refused to buy the high-priced books.

Farley, who is also a member of the National Association of College Bookstores Textbook Committee, said the Union's ultimate goal is to break even on all textbook sales.

She said the Union marks up a book on a 25-percent margin. A book that costs the Union $7.50, for example, would sell for $10, Farley said.

"I understand how it seems," she said, "but we're not trying to rip people off. We want to provide the necessary items at the lowest possible price."

Rust said D.C. Heath's pricing varies according to its competitors' prices on similar books.

The costs involved in producing a textbook include author searches, editing, marketing, design and actual production, Rust said.

The author's share of the profits, Rust said, varies from 5-18 percent, with the average falling around 8 percent.

He credits the steady rise in textbook prices to inflation in general and said they are a small percentage of college expenses.

"I don't think the rise of textbook prices is greater than that of anything else, including tuition, living expenses or even clothing," he said.

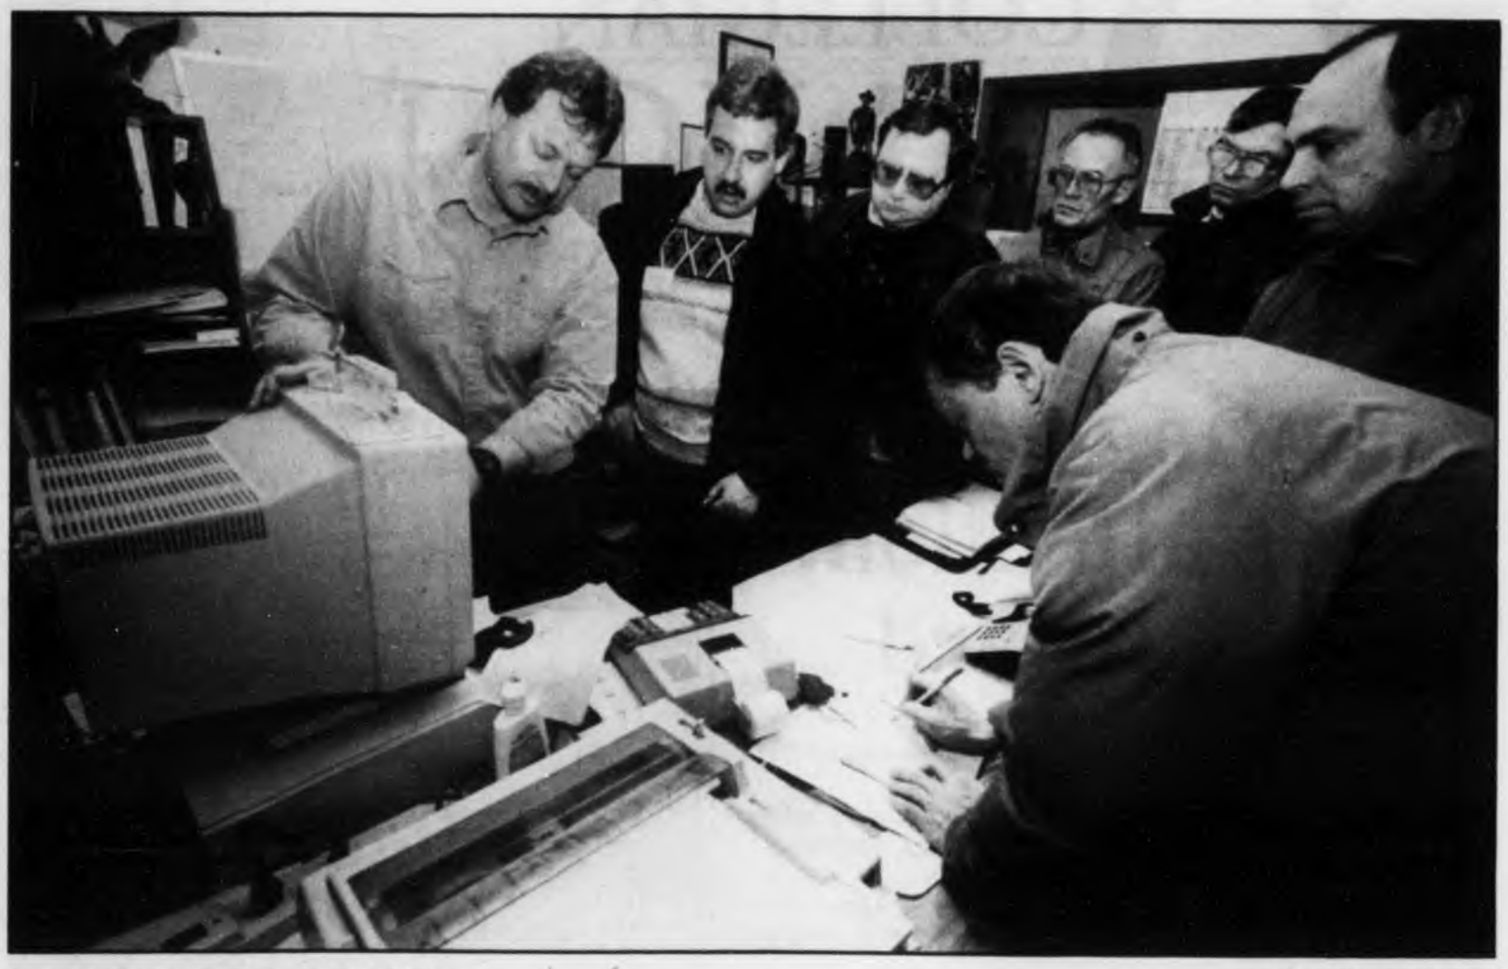
Farley said more profit is made on books bought back from students, since the Union saves 3-5 percent on shipping costs.

Students are the Union's No. 1 source for books, and it sells more used than new books, Farley said.

Varney's also sells more used books, Levin said. There is more gross profit, but also more expense in handling them, he said.

Most publishers give Varney's 30 to 60 days to pay for shipped items. But the students require cash. So the store must borrow money for book buy-back.

Frank Condello, director of marketing for Nebraska Book Co., said his company bases its wholesale prices on the book's usability, including its edition, wide or narrow use and the number of that book the company already has on hand.



A book that is still widely used and is a late edition can bring as much as one-third its new value, Condello said.

Books that are not in short supply or are no longer is use may be worth only $1-$5, he said, or may have no value at all.

A great deal of speculation is involved in the wholesaling of books, as the company may have money in a book for six months before it is resold, if it is sold at all. Unsellable books are then recycled, he said.

All books the Nebraska Book Co. sells to bookstores are sold at 50 percent of the book's new price.

Both Varney's and the Union pay students 50 percent of the new price for textbooks that are sold back and used again. The Union pays 60 percent when the money is put on Wildcat Card accounts.

No noticeable change in sales, Lafene staff says

JILL HINSHAW

Despite the availability and inexpensiveness of condoms on campus, a fluctuation in sales is hard to detect.

"It's hard to detect a change in condom sales at Lafene, because the pharmacy may order a certain number of condoms, but that number isn't an accurate number of exactly how many condoms are sold," said Cindy Burke, staff assistant for student health at Lafene Health Center.

The pharmacy orders the condoms for Lafene.

"There hasn't been any increase in condom sales, but there hasn't been a decrease either," Bill Salero, chief pharmacist at Lafene, said.

Condoms can be purchased from the Women's Clinic, the pharmacy and the Health Education Department at Lafene.

The sales numbers are difficult to monitor because of the various distributors, Burke said.

Charlotte Girard, office assistant in student health at Lafene, agreed the sales have remained constant.

Condoms are now available to students through the use of vending machines on campus. These machines give students the chance to purchase condoms without anyone knowing.

"The vending machine is a new item, so it's hard to distinguish whether

Boyd Hall residents may find something new today in their vending machines.

Boyd will be one of six residence halls on campus that provides condoms to residents through K-State vending services, said Bill Wisdom, K-State Union vending services manager.

In a referendum conducted at Boyd Jan. 21-22, 62 percent of the 92 residents who voted preferred that condoms be available in the building, said Brenda Moeder, a graduate student in student counseling/personal services and assistant director of the Strong Complex.

"The HGB took input from the Boyd Hall residents and decided to make the condoms available," Moeder said.

The Boyd Hall Governing Board decided to conduct a survey of the 183 hall residents after receiving a suggestion from the Office of Institutional Advancement that the Boyd HGB consider providing condoms for sale, Moeder said.

"I think it's a good idea," said Jennifer Unrein, Boyd resident and freshman in pre-nursing. "In our world we need to start thinking about safe sex and encouraging it."

Growing deficit needs attention, not disregard

We are witnessing the end of America.

Historically, countries that were not able to balance their budgets saw their reign end.

Great Britain, Spain, Holland and untold empires before them collapsed not long after they weren't able to pay the bills.

President Bush's chief economic adviser, Michael Boskin, said in so many words that the Bush Administration has stopped thinking about serious deficit reduction efforts. Boskin says Bush wants to tell it like it is.

In some parts, honesty is the best policy. The laughable budget reduction plans the Bush and Reagan administrations have put forth in the past 12 years simply have been full of lies and have given voters and the American public the idea that something was being done. Some parts of Capitol Hill are saying it's a triumph to stop fantasizing about a balanced budget.

And so the truth comes out.

If only Americans were able to do the same thing when the bank calls Monday morning wondering where the funds are for the check they wrote to the liquor store on Saturday night. "Uh, sorry Mr. Banker," we could say. "I won't be able to pay that money. It's just inconceivable at this point."

The deficit is predicted to hit a record $399.4 billion in fiscal 1992. It may never completely get paid off.

Bush should be working to find at least one of his points of light in our dark and dreary financial future instead of fiddling while America burns.

Condom availability promotes safety

Recently, residents of Boyd Hall voted in favor of selling condoms in vending machines located in the all-female dormitory.

Although selling condoms next to a Baby Ruth candy bar is not the best marketing ploy, sales will occur. And that can make a big difference in many people's lives.

On a college campus, it's unrealistic to think that the majority of students will abstain from sexual activity. Likewise, it would be foolish to assume that masses of students would run down to the drugstore and purchase a big box or two of condoms — just in case.

By providing condoms in a discreet location where they can be available at any given moment will help emphasize the importance of safe sex in a world faced with AIDS and increasing numbers of unwanted pregnancies.

Thankfully, condoms are being made available in residence halls and other campus buildings. The students are grateful, and the University and its housing department should be proud.

By keeping safe sex only a couple of quarters away, this campus, as well as a generation of students, will be more aware and more careful with their bodies.

"Henry & June" attracts much attention

Much to the chagrin of Campus Crusade for Christ, I thoroughly enjoyed Wednesday's showing of "Henry & June" at the K-State Union Forum Hall.

Indeed, I relished in its refreshingly unique cinematography, the development of its main characters as they interacted with each other, and its attempt to portray people as sensual creatures instead of sexual animals.

But after the movie, when I left that supposed quagmire of sloth, that insipid cesspool feeding the pornographic demons that stalked inside, I did not feel my soul had been lost to the devil. No, being a consenting adult and in full control of my faculties, especially my sexual ones, I knew that I would not shortly grow fangs and lure six-year-olds into my basement to fulfill my masochistic fantasies.

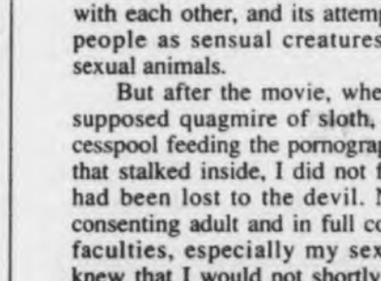
Besides, Satan would be much better off leaving someone so utterly disrespectful as myself alone. I'd give him too much grief.

I digress. "Henry & June," a biographical piece on the life of writer Anaïs Nin and her love affair with author Henry Miller and and his wife June, has provoked controversy on a par with "The Last Temptation of Christ." It is quite sexually suggestive, and as a result has received the Motion Picture Association of America's rating of NC-17, meaning no one under the age of 17 is allowed in, period. Films receiving such a rating are usually doomed to walk the esoteric boundaries of movie-making as pornographic in nature.

So, of course, some Campus Crusade for Christ members have taken it as their mission to keep such movies from further polluting our poor souls by trying to have them banned from campus.

JARED GREGOIRE

It's a strange thing. For I have seen a number of movies showing considerably more nudity and sexual situations in their first five minutes than "Henry & June" showed in its entirety, and they only received the "R" rating for their efforts. One of my all-time favorites, "A Boy and His Dog," was shown last October at the K-State Union, complete with full frontal nudity and enough sex to send any good Christian running for the hills. Nary a whisper of possible banishment was heard from the Crusaders.



Why is this so? Because "Henry & June" is controversial, and anything controversial can be construed into a bloody shirt that self-righteous people can rally around. If you want to get noticed, make a lot of noise about something people will listen about.

Kudos are in order for the UPC Kaleidoscope Films Committee, who presented the film as an alternative to the usual fare of gore and violence. Treating their selection of movies as a business, they've managed to provide the greatest diversity of films to the largest majority of viewers.

And for those who feel distressed because they're supporting such films as "Henry & June" by buying tickets to less controversial ones, the money made on tickets bought by the viewers of "Henry & June" goes to support the ones you watch. Philip Kaufman (the director) films support the Walt Disney films that support the Steven Spielberg films, etc. It's a self-supporting circle, and it is an efficient one.

Although it's obvious that I do not agree with the uniformed stance of the protester, I suppose I can understand it. It must be difficult to eliminate the desire to dictate morals on a seemingly godless society, especially when God has deemed it to be so. But by the grace of the same God, K-State will remain a center of cultural diversity, even if it means showing movies like "Henry & June," that stick in the ol' craw.

Marijuana has its place

TOM LISTER

"I'm free,
I'm free
And I'm waiting for you
To follow me!" — The Who

"When is that damn kid gonna get a job?" — my Aunt Shirley

Marijuana used to be everywhere. It grew like a weed. Hell, it was a weed. It still is a weed.

One day the weed disappeared. Lost souls walked through the desert looking for the missing oasis. Reality beat down like a flaming sun. Without their cloud, they had no ozone layer.

It had all started with the price hikes. They were like a cruel lesson in arithmetic: 25-30-35-40-45-50-55-60. Then networks designed shows like "Cops" that strike paranoia in the minds of anyone who watches late-night television.

Some of us had had enough. Those who said "screw it" walked out of the desert to go buy a bottle of gin. It was quite legal, and there were ration stations on nearly every corner.

But others couldn't change their nature. They still salivated like Pavlov's dogs when they smelled the smoke that drifted from the one door at the party that was closed. They still hung on the anthems of the past like an old coat that they couldn't toss in the garbage. There was too much sentimental value.

And they still had that one bastard to blame everything on— the establishment. He lurked in the shadows of every unfair decision, every controversy.

With each generation, we see new faces emerging from the desert into this new frontier, reality. With each generation, we see a group that makes the same futile effort to legalize marijuana. As the '60s generation reaches public office, we might expect to see legalization within the next few years. But probably not.

"Why does a dog lick his balls?
He can." — old redneck proverb

Each attempt at legalization fails. The National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws has been rallying for 20 years for the legalization of marijuana with minimal results.

In the meantime, jerk-offs like Abbie Hoffman paraded in the media telling us how to retaliate against the big-bully establishment. More jerk-offs founded magazines like High Times with centerfolds of big green buds. Teenagers pinned up pictures of the drug-overdosed martyr Jim Morrison.

Somewhere outside of the smoke cloud, other things were happening. Whereas marijuana could be perceived as expanding a person's horizons, cocaine destroyed the spirit. More teenagers read about what a hero Jim Morrison was and strived to be like him. Abbie Hoffman died of a drug overdose.

The government used our money in an attempt to eliminate drugs. They hired policemen as mean and ignorant as trailer court pit bulls to nab drug fiends. In the end, they only nipped at the problem. They made sure marijuana was difficult to reach, but the need was still there. LSD rose into popularity again, and people started chowing hits like M & Ms. White trash dishwashers snorted crank and talked about the phone cops.

And the war goes on. That's what it is— a stupid war with casualties in between the pseudo-intellectuals who lead sheep with a promise of freedom and dumb-ass pigs who know more about last week's episode of "The Simpsons" than the U.S. Constitution.

I remember the day when people got high and talked about rivers, trees, peace and how they could change the world. Today we're caught up in a war over the right to disguise it.

Sad, isn't it?

I'm sure glad I've got that airplane glue at home.

Kershaw shows crowd good time

BRIAN KRATZER/Collegian

Country vocalist Sammy Kershaw talks during an interview in his bus before performing the first of two concerts at TW Longhorn's Thursday night. Kershaw's performance was preceded by Spike Blake and his band. The performances were at 9 and 11 p.m.

Country music performer displays Cadillac style, despite little sleep

Sammy Kershaw is George Jones, Bugs Bunny and himself all rolled up into one.

He's said he's always been influenced by Jones, whom he met when he was 14, and he likes Bugs because he's looney and has a good time.

Kershaw showed a packed TW Longhorn's Thursday night how to have a good time. He also proved he's in country music to stay.

Although Kershaw said before the show that nothing seemed to go right all day — he had little sleep and he had to wear the same shirt he wore for a performance Wednesday — he took the stage with confidence, his casual sense of humor and his musical talent.

After a crowd-stimulating version of the honky-tonk title song from his album, "Don't Go Near the Water," Kershaw played "Yard Sale," a song about people sorting through what's left of a relationship.

"Yard Sale," Kershaw said, was supposed to be the next single off the album.

"But," he said, "they figured it was so close after Christmas — ya know, everybody got all them bills to pay, and they're all down and all that stuff.

"We didn't want the suicide rate to go up, ya know," he said. "It's a sad song; it really is. The title, 'Yard Sale,' sounds like it should be funny ... but it ain't funny at all. I've lived this thing, and it's real sad."

"Don't Go Near the Water" is honky-tonk country music meant for dancing, and "Yard Sale" is a laudable example of Kershaw's ability to bring out the traditional country-classic sound in every ballad he sings.

But the ballads are only half of it.

Kershaw and the skillful guitarists who accompanied him stepped into a different shoe in a matter of seconds with "Cadillac Style," a top-three success on the country music charts.

Classified Senate finalizes nominations for awards ceremony

Outstanding employees to be recognized

JOHN SCHARTZER
Collegian

Classified Senate discussed plans for its annual recognition ceremony during a monthly meeting Wednesday.

Formerly, classified employees were represented by a committee, but in September 1991, the committee became a senate.

Classified Senate is analogous to Faculty Senate or Student Senate. It consists of classified employees who serve as a body to represent the concerns of all other classified employees.

A main concern during this meeting dealt with finalizing the nominations for the employees of the year, and coordinating the April 9 ceremony.

Suzie Wisdom, office/clerical senator, said the ceremony is usually in May every year, but due to a prior commitment, McCain Auditorium is not available.

Categories for this award are the three types of classified employees: office/clerical, service/skilled crafts and technical/professional.

Three representatives have been nominated from each department and Senate tallied the final votes Wednesday to uncover a winner from each category. Senate will release the names of the winners after they have been notified.

Winners in each of the three categories will win such items as a check for $100, a parking space, a set of basketball or football tickets and plaques.

The ceremony will also recognize 21 employees for 25 years and six employees with 35 years of classified employment. These honorees will receive pins that signify their accomplishment.

Debra McClain-Williams, Classified Senate president, said they were planning on having Gov. Joan Finney as the guest speaker. However, Finney will not be available.

Senate decided to allow Wisdom, who is in charge of finding a speaker, two weeks to nominate a candidate.

"We want a suitable substitution from the Statehouse, not someone who doesn't care or know anything about us," she said.

If a suitable speaker is not found within the time limit, Senate concluded an outside speaker would not be present at the ceremony. Instead, the assigned speakers, announcing the names, would give a brief history of the recipients.

Joe Younger, from Human Resource Services, said that may cause a problem.

"The time frame is going to limit the amount of information we can say about everyone, especially since there are so many," he said.

A budget must be maintained as well. Senate does not have a set budget allotted to them yet, but they are still in charge of their expenses.

"We are $500 on the good side at the moment," Younger said.

In other business, senators discussed the current problems with insurance policies concerning dental care.

Classified employees do have access to a plan with Prudential, however, they are having trouble finding an adequate number of dentists in Manhattan to handle the policy. The company only has a one-year contract, and senators said the manner of recruiting Prudential is using will be looked into further.

Abortion bill stirs emotional pleas

Proposal would prevent state interference

KELLY KLAWONN
Collegian

There were pleas to the moral, emotional and legal conscience of committee members during Thursday's hearings of a House abortion bill.

For the second day in a row, the House Committee on Federal and State Affairs listened to testimony on the proposed abortion bill.

The bill would prevent the state from interfering with a woman's right to have an abortion and impose stiff penalties on demonstrators who interfere with access to a facility. The final provision of the proposed bill would require that counseling services be provided to patients.

Proponents of the bill testified Wednesday, and opponents of the bill got their say Thursday.

The hearing room was bursting at the seams Thursday with onlookers, cameras and activists. Almost 200 people stood in the rotunda and the overflow room listening to the testimony of 34 conferees.

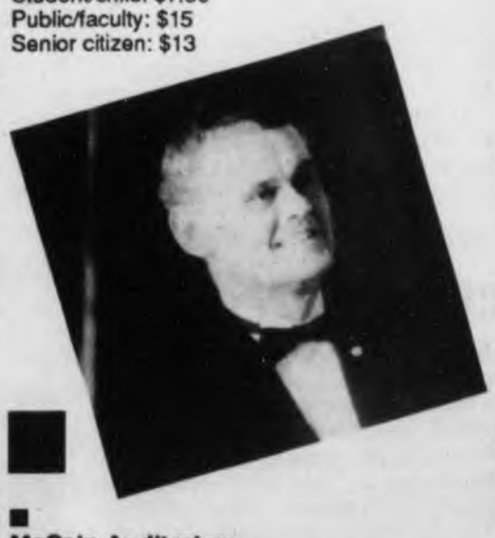
Wichita lung specialist Dr. Mike Peil questioned the definition of viability and the ability of anyone to accurately determine which fetus is viable and which is not.

Viable refers to the likelihood of a fetus to survive outside the womb.

"Most of the patients I see on a day-to-day basis are not viable according to the definition of viability in House Bill 2778," Peil said.

Dr. Paul Davis of Wichita said he has performed abortions before but changed his mind after being involved in the abortion of a 22-week-old. He added that he feels the State of Kansas should change its mind too.

"Once we give doctors a license to kill, they think they have a duty to kill," Davis said, as the crowd responded with enthusiastic applause.



Pat Adair, a self-proclaimed "sidewalk counselor" in Overland Park, said the bill prevents people from presenting alternatives. She added that if people were made aware of other options, they would not be so apt to have an abortion.

"One person I counseled who was going to have an abortion said that when she saw her baby bouncing, laughing and waving to her on the sonogram, she changed her mind," she said.

Snyder signs 12 to national letters of intent

Coach predicts all 92 scholarships may be used for upcoming season

PATRICK OBLEY
Collegian

Wildcat football coach Bill Snyder said Thursday that, for the first time during his three-year tenure, K-State will be near the 92 scholarship limit set by the National Collegiate Athletic Association.

That announcement came after Snyder disclosed the names of 20 players who have accepted scholarships to play football for K-State.

The group includes 12 high school seniors who have signed letters of intent, one transfer from a four-year school and seven players who are on what Snyder dubbed K-State's "scout team."

Snyder said his staff made a conscious effort to step up recruiting on the national level in order to move K-State's program into the echelon of football powerhouses.

"We were going against the Floridas and Miamis of collegiate football," Snyder said. "We are making an effort to recruit visible athletes."

But Snyder admitted going against the traditional recruiting powers has a drawback.

"When you come in second on that level, sometimes you actually do worse than if you had come in second on a lower level," Snyder said.

To say he had been recruiting on a national level exclusively would be inaccurate, Snyder said.

"I feel that there was not a football program in the country that has worked harder at scouting Kansas than us," Snyder said.

Still, Snyder said his staff only went after five high school players actively, signing two, Nylie Wiren and Curt Turner. The 6-foot-2, 220 pound Wiren, a Wichita Northwest product, is projected as a fullback, while Scott City's Turner (6-5, 210), will be cast as a tight end or defensive end.

Of the other three, only one went to Kansas.

Snyder said the reason no one will see more Kansas players on the list is due in part to a lackluster year for Kansas football.

"In the short time that I have been here, I have seen better," Snyder said.

Snyder said those who were on the scout squad that were given scholarships were at K-State this year, but had agreed to pay their own way and walk on.

Impact players from that group include quarterback Brian Kavanagh, former Kansas high school player of the year fullback Jeff Simoneau and running back Leon Edwards.

Of the 12 incoming freshman, along with Wiren and Turner, defensive back Will Skeans and linebackers Darren Holmes and Paul Magana will be looked to for contribution.

The position that stands for the greatest improvement, amazingly, may be at wide receiver, despite the loss of seniors Michael Smith and Frank Hernandez.

'92 SCHOLARSHIP PLAYERS

Here is the list of players who will be on scholarship this year for the K-State football team. Of the 20 players, 12 are high-school seniors, one is a four-year college transfer, and the rest are current K-State football players.

PLAYER	POS.	YR.	HT.	WT.	HOMETOWN (College/High School)
Leon Edwards	RB	So.	5-6	161	Wichita (Southeast)

Paul Magana	LB	Fr.	6-2	225	El Centro, Calif. (Central)
Chad May	QB	Jr.	6-2	210	Laverne, Calif. (Fullerton St./Damien)
Brian O'Neil	OL	Fr.	6-3	255	Littleton, Colo. (Littleton)
Jeff Simoneau	FB/NG	Sr.	6-0	280	Smith Center (Smith Center)
Will Skeans	DB/LB	Fr.	6-0	195	Ozark, Mo. (Ozark)
Henry Smalls	WR	Fr.	6-1	175	Bradenton, Fla. (Manatee)
Luke Todryk	NG	So.	6-3	260	Milwaukee, Wis. (Marquette High)
Curt Turner	TE/DE	Fr.	6-5	210	Scott City (Scott City)
Brent Venables	LB	Sr.	6-1	230	Salina (Garden City CC/South)
Nyle Wiren	FB	Fr.	6-2	220	Wichita (Northwest)

GREGORY A. BRANSON/Collegian

Filling that void will be Florida all-stater Henry Smalls, who has run the 100 meters in 10.5 seconds and Oklahoma all-stater Kevin Lockett, who had 118 receptions in his final two seasons.

Replacing Russ Campbell at tight end will be Turner, if he opts to play on the offense, and Missouri all-stater Jason Johnson.

"Johnson and Turner are among the finest recruits in the nation," Snyder said.

With the 20 signings, the total scholarship number at K-State is now 87, Snyder said. The remaining four scholarships K-State has to offer will be used for bringing in players who are still involved in the recruiting process, and one will be reserved for a walk-on.

Snyder said he hadn't expected to be so near the scholarship limit, citing past recruiting problems at K-State.

"I think I'm pleased and a little bit surprised by this," Snyder said. "I honestly didn't feel we could get to this level at this time."

According to Snyder, the high number can be attributed to low attrition, which is a product of a winning football team.

"We've had virtually no one leave the program," Snyder said. "Because of that, we have been able to attract people to our program.

"It's a little easier this year to recruit than past years," Snyder said. "But from now on, it will be harder, as our program becomes more successful."

Though seemingly sounding pleased with this year's crop, Snyder dampened the optimistic outlook.

"I wouldn't say this year's recruiting was any better than last year. Rather, I would say it was about the same as last year in regards to the level of talent we've recruited in."

As for how K-State did against the bigger schools, Snyder said there was room for improvement.

"I would have liked to escalate to the level of the Floridas and Florida States, but as far as talking about high profile players, we are in the vicinity of what we had last year," Snyder said. "We need a better batting average when it comes to recruiting the visible talents in order to reach that level."

Hot Nebraska next for reeling squad

Altman says NU provide Cats with a battle in the paint

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

And the beat — with an NCAA tournament-caliber opponent front and center nearly every game — goes on for the K-State men's basketball team.

Such is life in the Big Eight, Wildcat coach Dana Altman said. It's life in college basketball's best conference.

The Cats' foe Saturday — Nebraska — put a rather sizable notch in the handle of its gun Wednesday, knocking off No. 2-ranked Oklahoma State by 16, 85-69, in Lincoln, Neb.

The win by the 'Huskers, now 15-4 overall and 3-3 in the conference, drew a strong statement from Altman regarding the caliber of basketball played in the Big Eight.

"I think there are six teams right now that are virtual locks for the NCAA tournament," Altman said at his weekly meeting with the media Thursday afternoon in Bramlage Coliseum.

And Nebraska is one of those teams, Altman said, for a variety of reasons.

The first is 'Husker sophomore swingman Eric Piatkowski, who earned the K-State coach's praise as a player who is equally adept inside and outside.

"He's probably best when he shoots the ball from the perimeter," Altman said, "but he takes the ball inside with authority."

A second reason Altman likes the Nebraska team so much is its variety of offensive weapons.

"In their case, on any given night, one of those guys (the starting five) can score 20," he said.

Nebraska has also shown the ability to play both zone and man-to-man defenses, and use both successfully, Altman said.

In thoroughly frustrating the previously-unbeaten Cowboys, Nebraska showed Altman a new wrinkle.

"They'd been switching back and forth in the games I'd seen them play between zone and man," Altman said. "But their zone was the key against Oklahoma State."

K-State, 11-7 and 1-4, also unveiled a few new wrinkles of its own in a loss against Kansas Monday night, and Altman said at least one will be seen again before the year's out — and possibly on a regular basis.

The three-guard lineup employed at times against KU — with starters Marcus Zeigler and Gaylon Nickerson being joined by reserve Vincent Jackson — is a crew Altman likes having on the floor all at once.

"That's something you may see more of," Altman said. "Though it doesn't give us much size, it didn't seem to hurt our rebounding at all."

In fact, Nickerson and Jackson had six rebounds each, with starting forward Aaron Collier shutout on the glass and reserve center John Rettiger pulling down just three rebounds.

> "I think there are six teams (in the Big Eight) right now that are virtual locks for the NCAA Tournament."
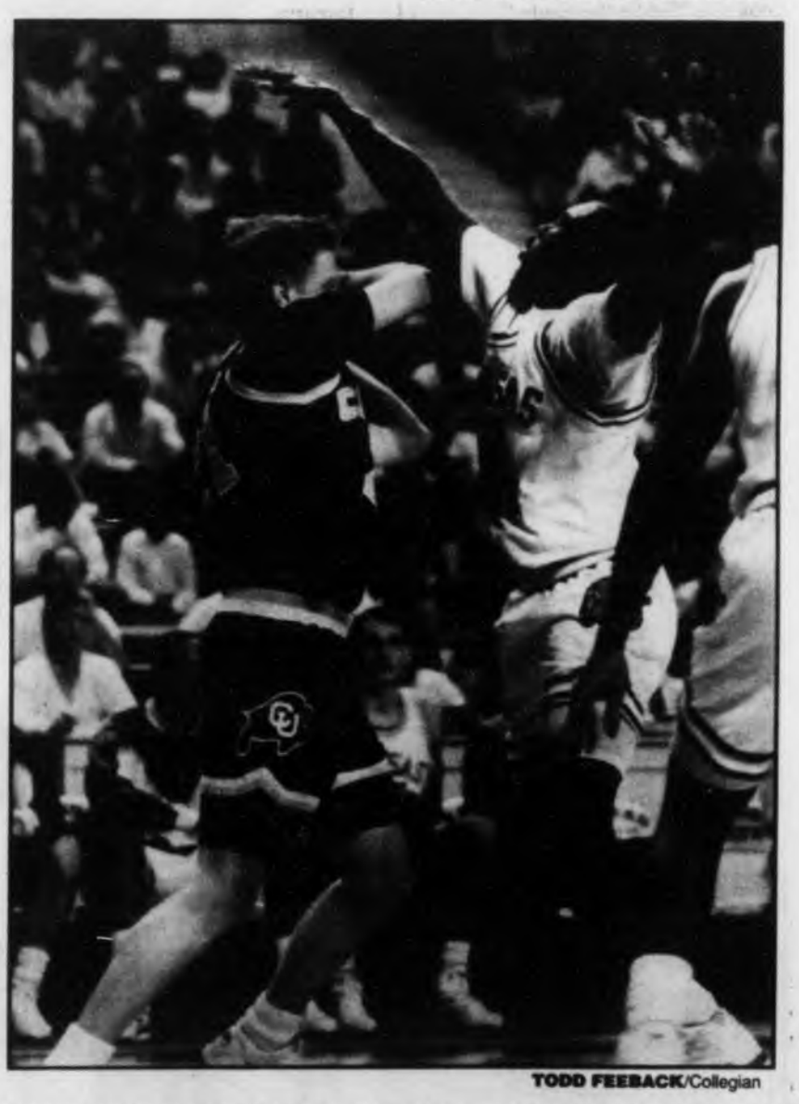
> — Dana Altman

In addition to the additional quickness and overall athleticism the lineup provides, Altman said having the trio on the floor might also give a needed offensive respite to Askia Jones, who has struggled to a 31.9 percent performance from the floor in Big Eight games.

"When a couple of other players are scoring, it definitely does help Ski," Altman said. "With Vince's penetration, you have to respect that and can't come off him to cover Ski."

Altman remains convinced that his team — and Jones and Nickerson especially — can shoot the basketball, regardless of what the statistics might relate.



"Askia Jones can shoot the basketball. Gaylon Nickerson can shoot the basketball," Altman said. "Right now, they're tight and not shooting it well, but they will."

K-State will need the outside touch of the trio of guards and small forward Jones, Altman said, with the 'Huskers having a pair of potent inside weapons in Derrick Chandler and Dapreis Owens.

Chandler leads the conference in blocked shots and averages 12.6 points an outing, while Owens averages 11.7 points per game. Chandler, Altman said, may be the top junior-college transfer in the loop, based on his play to this point.

In addition, Nebraska has seemingly lived and died with guard Jamar Johnson, who had 25 points in the win over OSU Wednesday night.

"In the games that Nebraska has played well and won, he's been a big part of it," Altman said of Johnson, who averages 11.3 points a game and has handed out a team-high 98 assists thus far.

Hockey splits season opener at SDSU

The K-State hockey team returned from its season opener Saturday and Sunday against South Dakota State with a two-game split, winning the second game Sunday, 6-4.

In the first match Saturday, the hosting Jacks scored a dominating 11-1 victory in front of a crowd of over 1,000 against the Wildcats, who did more sitting on the penalty bench than skating on the ice.

Team captain Tony DiCola said the team was happy with their debut as a CCHA-Midwest Division II team.

"We're extremely satisfied," he said. "We introduced ourselves to the conference in a hard hitting manner. In the first game we were physically dominating. It was unbelievable."

DiCola said South Dakota State, the winner of last year's Northern division, was the hardest hitting team last year. But K-State held their own against them.

"They said we were the hardest hitting team they've ever played," DiCola said. "After the first game, they were complaining about us."

However, some of the skaters' checks were a little bit too rough, placing K-State players on the penalty bench for a total of 42 minutes.

Less than 24 hours later, South Dakota State faced a totally different Wildcat team.

Jake Kisel brought the change down to few simple factors.

"The keys to our win were laying in a better team effort this time," he said. "We stayed out of the penalty box, the intimidation of each other was in our favor, and we got the lines working together."

With the combination of these efforts, K-State took leads of 1-0 and 2-1 in the first period. But the advantage of the goals by Steve Stroud and Doug Wallis was eliminated both times by the Jacks, who knotted the game at 2-2 by the end of the first period.

In the middle period, K-Sate took the lead back through a goal by Rick Seckinger with eight minutes showing.

Unlike the previous day's game, K-State kept their players on the ice, having just 10 penalty minutes.

DiCola and Namba (assist Pat Steiner) knocked in back-to-back goals within 30 seconds to put the Cats back on the winning road with 3:51 remaining.

Next up for the skaters is a two-day confrontation with the Missouri Tigers this weekend at Jefferson City's War Memorial Arena.

The two teams were originally set to meet between Jan. 18 and 19.

Cohen to quit Wichita State today

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — Mike Cohen, third-year head coach of the struggling Wichita State basketball team, is expected to resign today.

University sources told Associated Press on Thursday Cohen would announce his resignation at a news conference called by WSU President Warren Armstrong.

However, Cohen denied that he intended to resign when questioned by reporters.

Armstrong also is expected to announce the appointment of a 20- to 30-member blue ribbon panel to thoroughly examine the school's athletic department.

Cohen is in the third year of a four-year contract, which originally paid $70,000 annually. With supplemental radio and television fees and other payments, it is believed his current annual income is around $90,000.

His career record is 28-49, including a nine-game losing streak earlier this season. The Shockers are 4-13 this year.

The coach denied he is planning to resign. In a phone interview with AP from his home, he also said he wasn't being fired.

"The rumor has been around. They've been hanging me for two months," Cohen said.

As he started a regular practice later in the afternoon, he again was adamant.

"I definitely intend to be the coach at Wichita State University. End of interview. I've got practice now," he told a group of reporters who were waiting when he emerged from a team meeting.

Cohen refused to discuss what he had told the team. Asked why his team looked so somber, the coach said: "Maybe I dressed them down about playing better."

Cohen did not return several messages left by The Associated Press on his home telephone answering machine Thursday.

Today's news conference comes on the heels of the resignation of Wichita State Athletic Director Tom Shupe, who announced Wednesday he is leaving July 31.

People who make the Olympics fun to watch

Only four more days and the big Games begin.

Four long years we had to wait for another exciting chapter of the Winter Olympics. And they're historical ones. It's the last time that Winter and Summer Olympics will be in the same year.

About 1,500 athletes, 7,000 journalists and a 1 million spectators will stream into the little hamlet of Albertville in the French Alps this month.

Journalists around the world are speculating about the favorites in each event while tens of millions of TV spectators are looking forward to seeing who's the best and fastest "snowman."

But wait a minute. What happened to the original Olympic spirit? Remember, "winning isn't all what counts?"

OK, it's a little bit out of whack when steroids and marketing sport events are more important than the true athleticism of the good ole' Greek times.

But that doesn't mean that those athletes with all the medals hanging around their necks are the only stars of the Olympics.

Maybe you remember the Games in Calgary four years ago. The stars of the Games weren't double gold medalists Roetsch, Gustafson, or ice skaters Witt or Boitano. No, not even three-time gold winner in ski jumping Nykanen.

The big star was a at that time was a 22-year old man of Cheltenham, England — ski jumper Michael Edwards, better known as "Eddie the Eagle."

The red-headed guy with coke bottles on his nose conquered the hearts of millions, admitting honestly that he battles fear before every jump.

Consequently, a lack of confidence caused almost every jump, or should we better say fall, to turn into a crash.

The "real jumpers" were starting to make fun about him, suggesting he jump without glasses, which would protect him from seeing the danger.

But he was more popular among the journalists. Not one newspaper reporter or TV station missed an interview with new star of "Gone With the Wind."

He was also the main attraction of Calgary's night life. Every bar promoted themselves, using Eddie as the attraction of the night, dancing and singing.

It's too bad he won't jump from the ramps in Courchevel. New rules require the jumpers to qualify for the Olympics. "Eddie the Eagle" will have to stay home.

Edwards isn't the only "true athlete" who has been making the Olympics more interesting. Alpine skiers from Brazil (by the way, there are no mountains in Brazil), figure skaters from Egypt and cross-country skiers from Greece should earn as much respect as the guys standing on the medal platform.

Another sport which attracts many exotic athletes for its event is the bobsled. Teams from such non-traditional bobsled countries as Jamaica, the Virgin Islands and Monaco will participate in the races through the ice channel.

One of those bobsled drivers is also standing in the spotlight of the media. The sled Team Monaco I is steered by Prince Albert.

In Calgary, the bobsledders of Jamaica finished last, going through the finish line upside-down instead of on the runners.

At La Plagne, even more "exotic" bobsleds will run down the tube, a fact that upsets many of the top teams who argue that the dark horses somehow ruin the ice with their driving style.

Well, to heck with the top athletes, these are the Olympic Games.

Participants with the higher starting numbers have the same right as powerhouses of living the events, although they aren't to be seen on the TV screen.

Even when it becomes a little dangerous for them, they have fun, they are fun to watch, and they belong in the Olympics more than anybody else.

LADY CATS BASKETBALL

Yow hopes to avoid repeat of last NU meeting

Team record is of no consequence now, but playing consistent basketball is

PATRICK OBLEY
Collegian

The last time the Lady Cats played Nebraska, head coach Susan Yow joked about how she hoped NU's monster center Karen Jennings wouldn't come out of the locker room.

Unfortunately, Jennings did step onto the Bramlage Coliseum floor that fateful night last month. When she left, Jennings took with her 48 points and a 87-82 Nebraska win.

So, when K-State makes the return trip of the season series to Lincoln Saturday, Yow said the obvious:

"We're not going to let her do that again."

According to Yow, stopping Jennings and just beating the second-place 5-2 Lady Huskers, has become somewhat of a team mission. At least, it keeps the Lady Cats' minds off their overall 5-15 and Big Eight 2-5 records.

"We aren't even thinking about the 15 losses anymore," Yow said. "The girls are just looking forward to this game and are blocking out the records."

Jennings hasn't let up since her prolific night at K-State. In fact, with 31 points against Oklahoma and 17 against Oklahoma State, she has run her double-figure scoring string to 37 consecutive games.

In addition, the 6-foot-2 junior has scored more than 30 points in a game on four separate occasions.

Meanwhile, K-State's scoring machine, senior guard Mary Jo Miller, became the 15th woman in school history to tally 1,000 career points. She accomplished the feat with the third of her team-high 14 points in the 69-56 loss to Colorado Wednesday.

The simple fact that Miller has been the go-to player may be part of the reason for the Lady Cats' recent downswing.

"We've been scoring the majority of our points from the outside with our guards," Yow said. "In order to be successful though, we need to get the ball inside to Leah (Honeycutt)."

Against Colorado, Honeycutt was virtually cut-off from the K-State offense by the Lady Buffs' gameplan of keeping at least three 6-foot-or-above players on the court at any time.

Subsequently, when the Lady Cats had a poor shooting night from the perimeter, it showed.

"Still, we'll have to improve our shooting in order to open up the inside for Leah and Jen (Grebing)," Yow said.

The game will be broadcast tape-delayed on WIBW-AM 580 at 3:30 p.m. or following the 1 p.m. Cats-Huskers mens' game from Bramlage Coliseum Saturday.

Next up for the Lady Cats will be a home contest against Oklahoma Wednesday, Feb. 12. In Norman Jan. 18, K-State beat the Sooners 91-86.

Wrist wrestling at the rec center a hands-down success

BRIAN ANDERSON
Collegian

Two oppenents face to face, each determined to prove he or she has the muscle to conquer the other. Their right hand reaches out toward one another. They grasp at the base of each other's thumb, causing their wrists to be perpendicular. The elbows fall into the elbow containers shaped in the form of a square with the side toward the center of the table being open.

The referee places their right wrists above the center of the table. The referee hold the contestants' hands and wrists in an equal starting position. The referee is starting the wrist wrestling competition.

"Ready," exclaims the referee. Silence falls onto the crowd. A second or two later, the referee, with authority in his voice, exclaims "Go." He lets go of their hands, the crowd cheers wildly for their heroes, and the battle is on to see which person can force his oppenent's wrist, hand or forearm against his own opposite wrist or forearm.

These scenes happened for 117 men and 27 women in the 11th annual intramural wristwrestling tournament Thursday night at the Rec Complex.

"We have a lot of good competition here this year," said Steve Martini, associate director of intramurals. "There are more fraternities and women represented here than in the past. There are more Greeks because of individual points they can accumulate for their fraternity or sorority."

The wristwrestling competion consists of one single-elimination tournament per weight class, per division.

The mens' divisons consisted of fratemities, residence halls, and independents (off-campus students), while the women weren't divided.

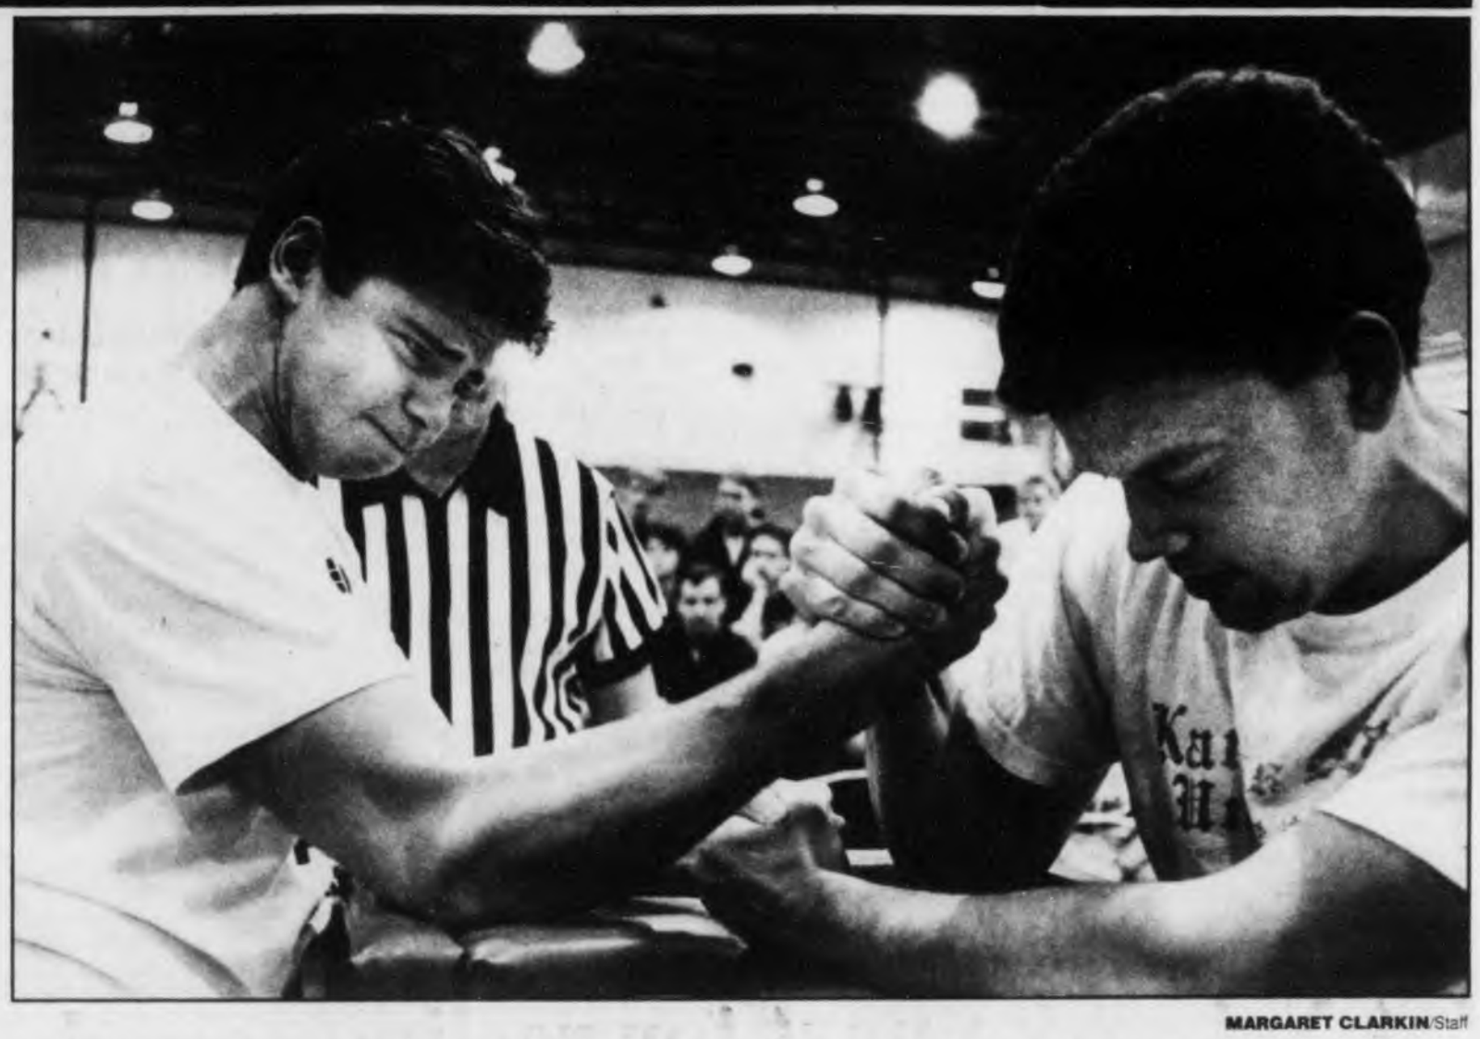
The weight classes for men were grouped into four categories. Flyweights, 150 pounds and below, are the lightest of the classes. Lightweights, are those who weigh from 151 to 175 pounds and middleweights range from 176 to 200 pounds.

Finally, anyone over 201 pounds make up the heavyweight class.

The women had two weight classes divided by who weighed above or below 135 pounds.

Michon Weingartner became a five-time All-University women's champion in the 136 and above division with a win Thursday.

"If I'm around year next year, I would do it (again)," Weingartner commented, who hopes to graduate with a degree in elementary education this year.



Another returning champion was Alpha Delta Pi member Kristen Roberts, a junior majoring in pre-med.

"I have no background in wristwrestling," she said after winning the All-University title for the 135 lbs. and under division by downing Kellie Parke, a member of Gamma Phi Beta.

Barry Park, a junior in youth ministry at Manhattan Christian College and a student at K-State, also became a repeat champion as he won the All-University title in the mens' middleweight division.

"I've been lifting weights since my freshman year in high school and have attended power lifting meets in the past year," Park said explaining how he became a two-time champion.

Other All-University winners were Frank Hembree, flyweight, over Jason Volk of Beta Thata Pi; Tom Edwards, lightweight, over Chris Custine from Marlett 3; and Kevin Graham, heavyweight, beat Chris Hadven from Marlett 5. All four of the men that won All-University titles were from the men's independent class.

MARGARET CLARKIN/Staff

B.D. Horton, sophomore in civil engineering, and Eric Sher, senior in mechanical engineering, compete against each other in the fraternity division of Intramural Wristwrestling competition at Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex Thursday night. Horton won the match.

INSIDE STUFF

Officials remain behind Altman despite woeful year

ASSOCIATED PRESS

K-State has never fired a basketball coach, and Dana Altman, taking heat in just his second year, wants no part of being a pioneer.

Some are saying let Altman be the first — and not only because of consistent losses on the court. Attendance is down dramatically at a place that once enjoyed routine sellouts, a place already burdened with the Big Eight's heaviest athletic debt and needing every dollar it can generate.

Others, including University Jon Wefald, are urging patience. They note K-State coaches historically get off to slow starts, Altman was left with virtually no players when Lon Kruger abandoned the program for Florida, and that it would be unfair to dump a guy at the first sign of storm clouds.

But there's one thing both pro-Altman and anti-Altman K-Staters agree on: They sure are unhappy being also-rans in a conference where they were once kings.

Not only are the Wildcats (11-7, 1-4) losing, they're being embarrassed. No. 21 Oklahoma came in last month and became the first team in K-State's history to score 100 points in Manhattan. There was also a 41-point loss at Lamar and a wretched 38-point televised drubbing at Oklahoma State, in which the Wildcats managed just 11 points the entire first half.

All this is coming off K-State's first last-place finish. Last year, Altman's first after serving as a valued assistant and No. 1 recruiter on Kruger's staff, the Wildcats finished at the basement of the Big Eight for the first time since the conference was formed in 1958-59. Before then, K-State had won or tied for the Big Eight crown 20 times but never occupied last place.

This year they're in danger of a dismal repeat. A victory over Colorado at home Saturday got them their first conference triumph and kept the Buffs winless. But that 62-56 victory was tempered by a half-empty Bramlage Coliseum and the fact the Wildcats shot less than 40 percent and committed 21 turnovers.

"I don't care if you're in politics or communications or coaching, I believe you've got to give people a chance."
— Jon Wefald

Altman, 33, gave an honest answer when asked how many Big Eight victories such a performance could expect to bring.

"I would say it would be hard to win very many at all," he said.

Monday night's 22-point loss at No. 3 Kansas did more than give the Jayhawks a 50-game lead in their 85-year series with the Wildcats.

It also moved the Jayhawks ahead of the Wildcats for the most victories in Big Eight competition. Kansas is now first with a 297-170 conference mark to K-State's second-best 296-171.

It's enough to make a K-Stater's blood boil. It's also enough to simply keep K-Staters away.

Ahearn Field House was almost always filled to its 11,220-capacity during its heyday in the '60s and '70s when a K-State ticket was just about the toughest ticket in the Big Eight to get.

But already twice this season, fewer than 6,000 fans have showed up at Bramlage, which opened amid great expectations in 1989. Bramlage seats 13,500, and attendance this year is averaging about 7,800.

Altman's record after 46 games is 24-22, better than Jack Hartman's and almost as good as Kruger's. He's working for an athletic director, 33-year-old Milt Richards, who didn't hire him.

But Wefald doesn't sound as though he's about to make any changes, and Wefald is a hands-on president who keeps close track of what's happening in athletics.

"I don't care if you're in politics or communications or coaching, I believe you've got to give people a chance, and Dana's in only his second year," Wefald said. "I think most K-Staters are willing to give people a chance to show what they can do. That's an attitude I share."

INDOOR TRACK

Capriotti splits team for single purpose

STEVEN ROCK
Collegian

The K-State track team will be split into units and compete in two separate meets over the weekend, said coach John Capriotti.

And Capriotti has high hopes the experience will be worthwhile.

"Basically, we're looking for some real big performances this week," he said.

The meets, one in Lincoln, Neb., and the other in Ames, Iowa, will pit the Wildcats against tough opponents.

"Both units," Capriotti said, "will face a lot of good competition."

And Capriotti, as well as the other track coaches, will try to face that competition with the right people at the right meet.

"Basically, what we're going to do is take most of the field-event people to the 'Husker meet up in Lincoln, and we'll take most of the running-event people to the Iowa State meet," Capriotti said.

The track at the Iowa State meet is a large 300-meter indoor track, ideal for runners. For this reason, most of the runners will head to Ames, but not all of them.

The short sprinters that will head to Lincoln rather than Ames include Gerald Benton, Thomas Randolph and J.J. Smith. They will run the 55-meter dash at the Husker meet.

Going along with the short sprinters to Lincoln will be most of the other high-jumpers, shotputters and long-jumpers, Capriotti said.

Included in the list of high-jumpers is R.D. Cogswell who sat out last week's meet with a sore ankle.

"We rested him, so he should be ready to go," Capriotti said.

Gwen Wentland and Connie Teaberry will represent the women's high-jumpers, and Dee Dee Tribue will, once again, triple-jump. Tribue has won her event in each of her last two meets.

Capriotti looks at the Nebraska meet, which will be represented by over 70 teams, as a highly-competitive one.

"The Husker meet might be one of the best meets in the country," he said.

Heading to Ames for the Iowa State Invitational, and facing competition from more than 40 universities, will be most of the other runners, including the women sprinters and the men long-sprinters, to try and take advantage of the 300-meter track.

Capriotti has a mission.

"We're going up there to try to qualify," Capriotti said. "That's our goal — to qualify for the NCAAs."

Folk artist performs in Station

TODD FEEBACK/Collegian

Folk singer Julie Schrader plays the keyboards while singing an original song Thursday in Union Station. Schrader performed as part of Eclectic Revue, an entertainment series sponsored by UPC.

Schrader likes singing to college audiences about people, relationships

DAN GRAFEL
Collegian

Julie Schrader said she's been into music since she can remember.

Schrader is the first professional musician to play in the Union Program Council's Eclectic Entertainment Series in Union Station.

Schrader, who classifies herself as a new folk artist, and her music as alternative, said she prefers playing the college circuit.

The audiences are more receptive to new and original music as opposed to the bar and hotel scene, where the crowd is usually only receptive to popular cover songs, she said.

However, her songs don't have a strong political message, but instead are mostly about people and their relationships, she said.

Her music background began with her parents, who were both musicians, although they did not pursue it as a profession.

"We always had music in the house, and my brother and sister used to yell at my parents to 'Turn on the radio to shut her up' when I cried," she said.

Schrader has just released her first solo album with an independent company. She was turned down by major labels because they told her that her music encompasses too many styles.

Although recent dates have found her in the northern United States, Schrader has previously toured Holland, France, Germany and the Spanish Azores as lead singer for the American Showcase band.

The band, which played for Army and Air Force bases, was sponsored by Bob Hope, but Schrader said she never met Hope during her stint with the band.

Schrader said she feels happiest on the road, unlike other traveling artists.

Long drives aren't a problem, she said.

"Performing on the road is really uplifting, because it reminds me that there are a lot of nice people out there."

She said that eating well and her light-hearted personality are all it takes to keep her from burning out while on tour.

"You hear a lot of things, like Kansas is flat, but that's really not true. There are a lot of beautiful things to see as you drive northwest," she said of traveling around

FARRELL LIBRARY

Donations goal of gala

Special guests to witness presentation of $2-million donation at annual fundraiser

ROB DE CORTIE
Collegian

Railroad times will be revived at the 1992 Library Gala as the second and third floors of Farrell Library will be filled with train passengers, cowboys, gamblers, cancan dancers and railroad barons.

Friends of the Libraries of Kansas State University will be host to 225 guests at their fifth annual fund raising party at 6:30 p.m. Saturday, Feb. 8.

The gala will raise money for Farrell.

The Friends of the Librarie' fundraising gala centers around a different theme every year. Earlier themes have been Mother Goose, Renaissance, murder-mystery and Italy.

Karen McCulloh, assistant to the dean of the library, functions as the liaison between the gala committee and Farrell.

"The Friends of the Libraries wanted to promote the library and everything that the library needs," McCulloh said.

"This is one way to bring people from across campus into the library. Not only for an evening of entertainment and dining, but also to point out some of the problems we have in the library. To encourage people to get to the library, you first have to call their attention," she said.

A part of the program is the announcement of a $2-million donor, McCulloh said.

"But of course there are other people invited that we hope will give the library gifts. When you are trying to create a support group for something, sometimes you have to do things first. It's an investment."

McCulloh said the galas have been a great success so far.

"The evening itself has been a success," McCulloh said. "And I think it has done what its purpose was — to raise money for the library and to make the library a focal point. It's a great chance to show that the library needs assistance."

People coming to the gala pay between $50 and $100 for a ticket. In the past, Friends of the Libraries has used the money, along with money received from book sales, membership drives and donations, to purchase the major equipment needs of the library.

"We ask the library what they want," McCulloh said, "and when the library doesn't have funds for something that is needed, we try to help them out."

Donna Rooks, chairman of the committee that organizes the gala and K-State alumna, said she and her husband enjoy the library very much. That is the reason why she became involved in the organization of the gala, she said.

"We started preparations for the gala five months ago," Rooks said. "The main thing at the gala is the dinner. But the program includes a lot of different things, like a camera shop, a Harvey House and a saloon. There will be a lot of entertainment."

Vonachen circulates book fliers

'Fight the power' refers to bookstore buybacks, purchases

KEITH LEFF
Collegian

Fliers are circulating around campus that read "Fight the power."

The flier goes on to read: "Don't buy or sell your books just yet. I've got a few to sell and buy for much cheaper than any bookstore."

John Vonachen, junior in philosophy, got the idea for creating the flier from his father.

Vonachen said his father suggested designing some sort of advertisement for the books he needed to buy and sell.

He said he used the words "Fight the power" to catch people's attention, but the words also refer to fighting the book buyback and purchasing systems at bookstores.

"A lot of people think it's unfair that the books required for certain classes are changed every year," Vonachen said.

He said that was understandable for some classes, like computer classes, which require frequent updating. But to continuously update books on subjects that do not need it, he said, just causes students to lose money on old books and spend more on new ones.

He said he hopes his idea of this do-it-yourself-and-save type of system can help students save money.

Vonachen said so far this year he has sold two and bought two books through the flier.

He said he designed the flier on the spur of the moment using a Macintosh computer in Dickens Hall.

Vonachen said it didn't cost anything to design, and the cost of the copies was around $1. He said by spending $1 he managed to save $100.00.

"I have given serious thought to the concept. It might be a pretty good idea," Vonachen said.

Vonachen said he is too busy this semester to fully market the idea of this book selling and trading service. He said next semester he might be able to do some more work on it.

Vonachen said he could develop a computer database of peoples' books they need to buy and/or sell, and the prices they are willing to pay and/or charge.

However, he said the effort would be very time consuming since it would involve a lot of phone work.

STUDENT SENATE

Base budget is first priority

ANDY WOODWARD
Collegian

Student Senate prioritized legislative demands and voted to oppose Manhattan's proposed noise ordinance.

First on the K-State student body's priority list for the Kansas Legislature is full funding of the base budget with a 4-percent increase in overall operating expenses.

Following this on the priority list is an increase in faculty salaries, a GTA fee waiver, a show of support for Farrell Library expansion and enrollment adjustments matching Board of Regents requests for fiscal year 1993.

"We're continually fifth or sixth out of six peer institutions as far as faculty salaries go. Since 1984, we've been eighth out of Big Eight schools as far as faculty salaries go," Jeff Bottenberg, a member of Jackie McClaskey's cabinet said.

Faculty representative Phil Anderson suggested numerous methods of payment for the costly legislative priorities.

"I want to freeze all administrators' salaries above $60,000 for one year. I want to take the money this parlays and pay for GTA waivers, faculty salaries, and so forth," he said.

Anderson said this move would probably be symbolic. "I have no illusions. I don't think it will have any effect whatsoever. It (the salary freeze) is simply to say the administration is disproportionately paid when compared to the faculty."

Anderson proceeded to point out the average faculty member's salary

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

COLLEGIAN
IN FOCUS

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1992 KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A member of the Golden Dragons (ABOVE) comically balances eight spinning plates. Performing the Chinese Diablo, a dancer slings a spinning top into the air with a rope and catches it.

Night of the Acrobats

The show was over. Hands held the papier-mâché dragon steady while someone in the backed-in U-Haul truck guided it in. The dragon's head bobbled, and its mouth wagged like it had on the stage hours ago with the performers inside. Next stop – Maryville, Mo.

One of the stage managers had fanagled Jennifer Wang into talking to the press. She spoke English the best of anyone, the stagehand had said. The rest of the performers spoke sketchy English at best. Wang spoke sketchy Chinese. Somehow they were able to communicate.

She was from Holyoke, Mass., actually. She met one of the Chinese Golden Dragons while she was touring with another production company in Las Vegas. Two weeks later, she married him on Nov. 3, 1991. She's been touring with the Dragons since.

The troupe stopped at Bramlage Coliseum last Friday evening during its five-month, 60-city tour of the United States. Wang was the only American performer in the troupe. There were other Americans doing sound and lights and heavy lifting, but the performers were mostly from China and Taiwan.

"We don't get to see a lot of America," she said of touring. "It's mostly get into town, unload, practice, perform, load up and go to the next town."

Most of the performers were older and lighter and shorter than 21-year-old, 105-pound, 5-foot-4-inch Wang. But she held her own.

Shadows of figures ran to position just before the lights came up. "Ladies and gentlemen ... the Chinese Golden Dragon Acrobats and Magicians," the speaker said as the spotlights opened up. The figures danced and flipped for the opening ceremony. The papier-mâché dragons ran floating across the stage, twisting and turning their 30-foot bodies with the Oriental music piped in over the stage.

Before the show had started, children ran pell-mell around the floor with balloons or toys in hand, but now they sat in their seats and laughed and watched the men in ninja costumes run, flip and jump through a hoop with knives pointing toward the center. One of the ninjas held back, feigning fear. The kids loved it. Finally, the other performers blindfolded him, set the hoop on fire and backed him up away from it. He jumped through it without scratch or burn.

The show wasn't all daredevil feats. A group of women came out after the ring of fire and danced with beautiful feathered fans and angelic headpieces. Then they each twirled a ribbon of a different color and danced around like a spring fire.

Then came the comedians. Two of the performers dressed like chefs twirled one, two, then nine plates on sticks on a table. Each time it looked like the end plate would fall, one of the chefs would run down in a panic and spin it around again.

But this was the biggest feat of the night: A small man with two helpers set a table on the floor in front of the stage. Then they set four wine bottles on the four corners of the table. Then they set a chair on top of the bottle mouths. Then they set another chair on top of that chair. Then another. And another. And another, until finally he had 10 chairs stacked on top of the four bottles and he stood on both hands, then one hand, towering 50 feet above the crowd.

"He's fallen once," Wang said as the stagehands closed the U-Haul truck door. "It was outside and really windy. He didn't get hurt. We're taught how to fall so we won't get hurt — unlike someone off the street."

Most of the performers have other jobs aside from touring with the Dragons, she said. Some of the others will keep touring with another production company when the Dragons stop in June or July.

Jennifer will probably go to China with her new husband and spend more time getting to know her new family. She only spent a week there after she got married. But last Friday, she was preparing to stay in Manhattan for the weekend and celebrate the Chinese New Year here.

"When these guys party, they party," she said. "Straight vodka, straight whiskey, straight everything. And they eat and eat and eat. I don't know how they stay as little as they do."

MENTAL HEALTH

Professor researches bereavement effects

Group meetings ease grief, teach students to cope

KRISTIN SCHMIDT
Collegian

The preliminary results of a K-State research project on bereavement show that time alone does not fill the void the death of a loved one leaves.

David Balk, associate professor in human development and family studies, said the bereavement study, which started in fall 1990 and ended in December 1991, involved several elements, such as how grieving college students cope with death and how their attitudes toward death change over time.

The study was led by Balk and funded by the National Institute of Mental Health. It examined 179 students in three groups, Balk said.

Students in one group had experienced the death of a friend or family member in the past year and participated in a social support group that met twice a week for four weeks.

Students in the second group also experienced the death of a person, but they did not participate in a support group.

The third group consisted of students who had not experienced the death of a person in the past year and were used as a control group, Balk said.

Students who participated in the social support groups had much lower depression than those who had experienced a death but had not participated in the groups, Balk said.

Similar studies show that with time alone, some emotions lessen, but others become more evident, he said.

The students who sorted through their feelings on death and talked about it were better able to deal with it, he said.

Mary May, junior in journalism-mass communications, participated in a social support group in fall of 1991, after a close friend of hers was murdered in late July.

She said the group was a relief because Wednesday at 7 p.m. she would be able to think about her friend Abby.

Because of the unexpected and violent nature of her friend's death, May said she did not have time to grieve.

It was not until she entered the group that she said she was able to think and talk about the death.

LAFENE

Doctors join staff

SARA JAAX
Collegian

The physician staff at Lafene Health Center gained two full-time doctors last semester.

The number of full-time physicians increased from six to eight when Dr. Gene Nelson joined the staff in August, and Dr. Kris Neuhaus joined the staff Oct. 1.

Neuhaus, a 1980 K-State graduate, said she has been pleased with returning to an upbeat university environment.

"The atmosphere is really great," she said. "Most of the people work here because they really like it."

Neuhaus, who will be treating students in the general care clinic, has practiced at Westmoreland Clinic and internal and general medicine at Truman Medical Center in Kansas City. Her focus is preventive medicine.

"College students are relatively easy to work with," she said. "They're at a point where they can make a difference in their health."

Nelson, who was a family practitioner in Fort Scott for 18 years, said he and his wife Eleanor came to Manhattan because he thought practicing university medicine would give them more free time.

slump we are currently in, he said.

The Oct. 21, 1991, edition of U.S. News and World Report stated: "Tools customarily used to spur economic growth, like big tax cuts, seem out of the question amid the preoccupation with record federal budget deficits."

Deficits help consumer spending but hurt investment spending, which is what the country needs, Thomas said.

"The country's gotten into big problems because of Bush's and Reagan's big tax cuts," he said.

Cutting taxes for the middle class has proved to be the popular thing to do, Thomas said. People only want their taxes cut. They are either not aware of the long-term negative effects of cutting taxes, or they do not care about the future, he said.

Taxes should not be raised when the economy is down, Thomas said. Taxes actually should have been raised in the mid-'80s when the economy was strong.

"Reagan's policies weren't geared towards long-term spending," he said. "Bush's focus is on a short-term — 'What do we do between now and the next election' — type of thinking," he said. "Our political structure is not set up for the long term."

Thomas said politicians aren't worried about the future. To solve the long-term productivity problem we need education, long-term investment spending and technology, he said.

Incomes must go up before the economy will improve, Emerson said.

"More investment spending would increase productivity also," he said.

The short-term recession and the long-term budget deficit are two separate problems.

"First, you need to discriminate between a recession and a long-term problem," Thomas said.

America's long-term problem started in the early 1970s with a sharp slowdown in productivity growth. The number of output the average worker produced began dropping rapidly, Thomas said.

In 1972, productivity was growing at more than 3 percent a year, he said. The standard of living was doubling every generation. A lot of people will be worse off now than their parents ever were, he said.

"We need to target mass upgrading of educational skills," Thomas said. "That's what has helped in the past."

is about $36,000, and the average administrator's salary is about $90,000. Anderson's proposal for a salary freeze did not succeed.

The entire resolution's prioritization for the Legislature did.

Student Senate also voted to show disapproval to the Manhattan City Commission for the proposed noise ordinance.

The resolution overwhelmingly passed.

Jim Spencer, business senator, approves of the noise ordinance.

"Have you considered the effects this loud music has on those who can't sleep? I'm in the College of Business Administration, and I think I could round up 300 students who would agree with me," he said.

Phil Anderson is the only other opposing voice against the resolution.

"If you don't vote, you have no voice. We're in the position of being political eunuchs. Why should they (Manhattan City Commission) listen to you?"

the country from her home in Nashville.

In fact, the only bad experience she remembers from being on the road is almost getting killed in a snowstorm.

Shrader, who was in charge of hiring talent while she attended college, used that job as a stepping stone.

In fact, she once hired herself to play.

"I've seen both sides of the business, so I know what makes for good and bad promo," she said.

Schrader said Union Station was a really nice place to play, since she runs across many less-than-ideal stages, including halls and cafeterias.

She also said that many of today's popular acts started out on the college circuit, including Amy Grant, Simon and Garfunkel, Richard Marx and the Police.

Jennifer Bennett, senior in music education and math education, opened for Schrader by playing the marimba. She said she found it difficult to decide what to play for her audience outside of the McCain scene.

"I wanted to pick some things that the audience would recognize," she said.

"In the music department it's how you play, but here it's what you play."

Bennett wants to teach both math and band as a high school educator.

or not condom sales have increased or decreased," said Bill Wisdom, manager of vending services on campus.

"For the customer, the vending machines should provide discreet purchases, which for many people, is easier than buying them over the counter from a clerk," Wisdom said.

Condom vending machines, which were brought to K-State the first half of December, are located in four residence halls and six campus buildings.

In order for condom vending machines to be installed, the building must request the machine, Wisdom said.

"Cadillac Style" with country radio disc jockeys and country music TV stations is inferior compared to a live version of the song.

This rockin' tune was an accurate sample of the high-intensity performances Kershaw and his band members deliver with each and every song —ballads and honky-tonk tunes alike.

After watching these musicians on the stage, it's easy to see why Kershaw said he sees himself as both a "ham" and a "ballad-singing fool."

And after a concert that came straight from the heart — and the funnybone — Kershaw rising to new heights in country music would come as no surprise.

Gay and lesbian issues discussed in satellite conference

JILL HINSHAW
Collegian

Campuses across the nation should cater to all groups of people, including those who are gay, lesbian or bisexual.

This was the theme of a video conference concerning the understanding of gay, lesbian and bisexual students which took place Thursday in Bluemont Hall.

Approximately 80 students and faculty and staff attended the conference, which was presented live, via satellite, from Washington, D.C.

"We as a campus have a responsibility to look at our systems on campus and make sure that they're safe for individuals to open up and be themselves," said Rosalind Andreas, vice president of student affairs at the University of Vermont.

Andreas was one of the five keynote speakers at the conference.

"The college atmosphere is one place, above all others, that should practice and celebrate diversity," Andreas said.

Campuses must be places to encourage students to be who they are without feeling uncomfortable, she said. The campus should provide a sense of security and safety for all individuals.

The speakers encouraged communication throughout college campuses.

"Once a knowledge and understanding is shared among people, they can see one another for who they really are," said keynote speaker L. Lee Knefelkamp, professor and chairman of the Department of Adult and Higher Education at Columbia University.

"As people whose lives are complex enough, we want to love and be loved, and this love means being able to share with others and be accepted in a fullness without being afraid," Knefelkamp said.

Educational programming for students, parents, faculty, staff and community needs to take place in the classroom in order to understand and respect individual diversity, Andreas said. A classroom should be a place where questions are asked and answered without the added hate speech and inappropriate comments from peers or faculty members.

"What we're doing on college campuses is having a profound effect on the society in which we live," said Kevin Berrill, director of the Campus and Anti-Violence Projects of the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force.

Horsemen from western Kansas will gather Feb. 8 in Dodge City for the Western Kansas Horseman's Conference.

The conference is organized by the K-State Cooperative Extension Service in the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry.

Mark Arns, assistant professor of animal science and industry, is in charge of the conference.

"This program is for anyone who has an interest in horses," Arns said. "It's a basic type of program. This is for both youth and adults."

Arns said he is expecting 150 to 200 people.

"That's smaller than I'd like it to be," Arns said.

There will be three main speeches directed toward all members of the audience, followed by research presentations by students from K-State's College of Agriculture.

Rethinking ROE v. WADE

ERIN PERRY
Collegian

Editor's Note: Due to the controversial nature of abortion, Kathy's name has been changed to protect her true identity.

When the people at the pregnancy testing center told her abortion was against God, Kathy replied that God wouldn't want life to come into the world through rape.

On Feb. 1, 26-year-old Kathy terminated a pregnancy that began when a "former friend," as she called him, forced her to have sex during Christmas break.

She said she knew almost immediately she was pregnant. She said she knew almost immediately she didn't want to carry it to term.

"When I thought about this fetus in my body, I started to think about that man and how I struggled and how I was controlled," she said, the telephone hiding her face, but not her tone of pleading for understanding.

Once Kathy's pregnancy test came back positive, she said her life was upside down. Eating and sleeping were difficult; studying was out of the question.

Though she said she had already decided not to have the child, she didn't know where to go for an abortion, much less did she have the money to pay for one.

Thoughts of ways she could cause a miscarriage went through her mind for weeks, until one morning Kathy picked up a Collegian with a front-page story about a pro-choice memorial rally for the anniversary of Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion.

People in the accompanying photo had tears in their eyes; they looked like they could help her, Kathy said.

"I called (someone) from the story. (That person) promised to help me right away, not only emotionally, but financially," she said.

Within days, the person made an appointment for Kathy at a clinic and generated enough donations to make up the full fee — about $400 — needed for the procedure. Days later, she went to the clinic, and that evening she came back no longer pregnant.

While the abortion was by no means enjoyable, Kathy said, it was relatively painless and easy. And she said she still thinks other

Local economy changing

KANSAS UNEMPLOYMENT IMPROVES

Unemployment figures for Manhattan, Riley County and Kansas have declined, even though most of the rest of the nation has increasing unemployment. Manhattan has faired even better than the state average.

Business owners disagree on effects of recession

MEGAN MULLIKIN
Collegian

It is business as usual for most local store owners, even though the rest of the country is facing a recession.

Manhattan, like the rest of Kansas, has not suffered from the economic slump as much as the rest of the nation, said Dale Stinson, director of the economic department at the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

"Nationally, people are laid off, but not locally or even statewide," he said. "We've been somewhat isolated from the national recession."

Manhattan's economy is heavily dependent on two major employers: K-State and Fort Riley.

Lorene Oppy, manager of human resources and unemployment in Manhattan, said these employers are what keep the economy stable and unemployment low.

"We were hurting worse a year ago. People weren't spending the money because the soldiers were not here, and some families went home," Oppy said.

The Kansas unemployment figures fell from 4.2 percent in November to 3.9 percent in December 1991, according to a Kansas Employment Report released Jan. 31, 1992.

The Manhattan unemployment rate compared to last year is also down from 3.5 in December 1990 to 2.7 in December 1991.

Manhattan is unaffected, Stinson

NEWS DIGEST

▶ SOLDIER ACCEPTS PLEA BARGAIN IN SLAYING OF K-STATE STUDENT

A Fort Riley soldier charged in the slaying of sophomore Catherine Heintze pleaded guilty to a lesser charge in Geary County Court Friday morning.

Nathaniel W. Ellibee, 19, was originally charged with aiding and abetting first-degree murder and kidnapping.

Contingent upon cooperation with the prosecutor in the case, Ellibee's charge was reduced to aiding and abetting second-degree murder.

Ellibee was also charged with attempted aggravated robbery and conspiracy to commit aggravated robbery.

Ellibee, whose trial was scheduled to begin Feb. 27, will instead be sentenced March 23.

A spokeswoman with the Geary County Sheriff's office did not know of the reduced charges until the county attorney called Thursday.

Another Fort Riley soldier, Jason L. Turner, 21, pleaded no contest and was found guilty of felony murder and kidnapping for the slaying, which occurred during a robbery attempt of Pate's Convenience Store, where Heintze was a clerk.

HEALTH

Manhattan children hit hard by respiratory virus

RSV threatens lives of infants and small children

AMY COX
Collegian

The Respiratory Syncytial Virus is not new, but it has recently made its presence known in large numbers of cases in Manhattan-area infants and children.

"It has been around for some time. However, this is the highest rate of occurrence we have seen in probably 16 years," said Dr. Graham Rose of Pediatrics Associates.

For school-age children and adults, it usually manifests itself as a minor chest cold.

For infants and small children, however, it can develop into a serious upper-respiratory tract infection and may result in bronchitis or pneumonia. It can be life-threatening.

A mucus test can identify the virus within 30 minutes in the doctor's office.

But recognizing that the test needs to be done is not always obvious. RSV starts out like a cold or the usual flu. Symptoms include a runny nose, coughing, wheezing and little or no fever.

The wheezing cough that does not respond to normal treatment is usually the give-away symptom, Rose said.

Critical cases are sent to the University of Kansas Medical Center for Ribavirin treatment, which involves a respirator, because it is the nearest Level III center available that can do the expensive treatment.

Most hospital cases involve infants less than 2 months old.

The Pediatrics Associates clinic has sent six infants to the hospital for RSV since January and has diagnosed 20-25 children with it.

Dr. Laura Sanson, Manhattan Family Practice, said her office has diagnosed six to 10 children with RSV since January. That is up from no cases last year, she said.

The virus is highly communicable through sneezing and coughing. Rose said the only real prevention is for infants and children to avoid contact with other infants and children to reduce the chance of being exposed.

After exposure, there is a two-to-eight day incubation period, during which the infant or child is contagious.

There is "no real good thing to do" to prevent the virus if your children must be around other children, such as in a day-care center, he said, although frequent hand washing and wiping of noses may help.

There is no vaccine for the virus, and it is treated by symptomatic treatment.

Beth Hartenstein-Tolentino, editor of K-Stater magazine and director of publications for the Alumni Office, said her son had the virus when he was only 3 months old.

Beth and her husband, Elias Tolentino, said although the virus can be frightening, it responds well to treatment.

Nicolas Tolentino, 2 years, 2 months old now, just recovered from a second bout with it.

"From what I understand, once a child gets the virus once, they are more susceptible to it," Hartenstein-Tolentino said.

"It is scary for parents, because it is highly contagious," she said.

"The good thing is, though, once they intervene medically, it's amazing the things they can do."

She said they suspected RSV when Nicolas was not responding to treatment for what they thought was the croup. He became dehydrated and needed an I.V. treatment at the hospital, after which he recovered.

Hartenstein-Tolentino said the virus does seem to be in almost epidemic proportions in Manhattan.

Farrell gala honors donor

Students, extramural sources combine with government to fund expansion project

ROB DE CORTIE

A "railroad baron" who donated $2 million to move the Farrell Library train in the direction of expansion was among the farmers, cowboys and gamblers who made the Kansas railroad days come alive at the Friends of Farrell Gala Saturday night.

H.D. "Joe" and Joyce Hales of Overland Park have donated $2 million to help expand and renovate Farrell Library.

The Hales were introduced by University President Jon Wefald to about 250 guests and University officials during the fifth annual gala.

The donation is a gift to the University Libraries project of K-State's Essential Edge Campaign, which includes a $3-million goal to improve and renovate Farrell.

Financing for the expansion of Farrell will come from federal and private contributions, student fees and state money.

The Hales made their commitment anonymously in November, before the passing of a student referendum that committed $5 million in student funds to a proposed $27-million library expansion and renovation project.

The Hales requested their gift remain anonymous until after the student vote.

The library needs upgrading, they said.

"Dr. Wefald took us to the library last fall and explained the problems," Joe Hales said. "It's just totally crowded here.

Companies increase volunteer programs

CHRISTA CONGROVE

Corporate volunteer programs are emerging nationwide .

Because most people work during the day, there has been a decrease in what individual volunteers are able to do.

"Corporations volunteer from all sectors of the business and labor community," said Renee Zimmerman, vice president of the Wichita United Way Agency.

"For every large bank that volunteers, we have as many small bankers. There are volunteer programs in small businesses to Boeing, who is the biggest employer in the state," she said.

Last year, employees at Security Benefit Group of Companies in Topeka donated nearly 7,500 hours of their time. They participated in such projects as the March of Dimes Team Walk, and clothing and food drives. They also co-sponsored an all-day revitalization of a low-income neighborhood.

Many large corporations have established foundations that provide funding for community service programs.

The W.K. Kellogg Co. encourages service commitment among university, college and high-school students through its nationwide program, "Into the Streets."

Mindy Loughman, K-State Panhellenic Council president, said "Into the Streets" is aimed at increasing the quality and quantity of college students involved in community service and community problem solving.

"By encouraging community service, the program will help students build leadership skills and gain experience necessary to prepare them for future community leadership roles," she said.

The accounting firms of Deloitte & Touche and Arthur Andersen in Kansas City encourage their employees to serve the communities in which they live and work.

Professionals from the firms participate in the Adopt-a-School program, Junior Achievement and Boy Scouts of America.

Hill's Pet Products, a subsidiary of Colgate/Palmolive Co., decided to donate more than money to the community this year.

Jean Fecteau, personnel assistant, said they employed the Volunteer Center of Topeka to assist them in the development of corporate volunteer projects.

As a result of an employee's interest survey, they adopted three projects.

One project is delivering Meals on Wheels to homebound. Another is decorating a tree for the Festival of Trees, which is a fundraiser for Sheltered Living. The third is the Puppy Connection project.

"Employees go in teams to the Humane Society and pick up puppies to take to nursing homes for the elderly and handicapped, so they can pet and love and play with them," Fecteau said.

Blue Cross & Blue Shield is preparing for the annual Project Topeka food drive.

Rita Sutcliffe, manager of employee relations and benefits, said employees donated 43,000 cans of food last year. She said departments are already challenging each other for contributions this year.

Sutcliffe said Blue Cross does a lot of things in terms of contributions.

"We encourage employees to attend presentations by the United Way and serve on United Way committees."

She said as the company is made aware of opportunities, it publicizes them.

"We consider ourself (the personnel department) to be a resource for people who like to volunteer," she said.

"Blue Cross is very pro-volunteerism. We are a very integral part of the community. Employees come out when there's things to be done. Our job is to promote what's available. We're behind them all the way."

Debra Martin, recruitment director for the Topeka Volunteer Council, said there were more than 98 million volunteers in 1990.

With such an interest in corporate volunteers, many large cities have established Corporate Volunteer

Center's bill up for vote

Oleen says passage likely for proposal on Value Added Processing Center

JOE VADER
Collegian

Adding value to products made or grown in Kansas in order to promote economic development for the state sounded like a good idea to legislators.

Thus, the Kansas Legislature established the Kansas Value Added Processing Center in Umberger Hall in 1988.

A bill has been introduced by Senate Majority Leader Fred Kerr, R-Pratt, to continue the center's operation.

The bill is in the Senate Economic Development Committee, where it will be heard Tuesday in Topeka.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, and co-sponsor of the bill, said she doesn't foresee any problems with the passage of the bill.

"There are 24 people who wanted to sponsor the bill with me," Oleen said. "It only takes 21 to pass. I don't anticipate a rocky road."

KVAC was established to provide technical assistance to Kansas agribusiness. For that reason, it is located at K-State.

"We serve as an interface or a bridge between the University, state government and private industry," said KVAC Director Richard Hahn.

"One of our functions is to work with the University and get information, technology and assistance transferred to the private sector for the creation of jobs and new products.

"We're able to get K-State together with clients who need their services. We provide some modest amounts of funding for research and development activities," Hahn said.

"I think we're an ambassador for the University with private industry, in terms of this relationship and using University expertise and getting more cooperation between various sectors of the Kansas economy."

KVAC operates on a budget from the Economic Development Initiative Fund. That fund comes from money raised by the Kansas Lottery.

According to Hahn, this year's budget is $650,000. KVAC is seeking $622,000 from the legislature for next year.

Assessing the statewide effect of KVAC's activities has been difficult, since the center is so new, but Hahn said he is optimistic about the future and pleased with the center's results so far.

Some examples of work KVAC has done in the state :

— Providing operations and marketing funds for Great Plains Red, WaKeeney. The KVAC grant allowed GPR to plant 25,000 acres in 1990.

— Providing supplemental funding for testing 100 canola varieties at five Kansas locations.

— Providing matching funds to a Kansas company for testing a specialty beef blood plasma fraction as a protein source for piglets.

— Filing patent disclosures on a sugarless caramel corn developed through KVAC financing. A Kansas snack-food company will introduce the product as soon as patent lawyers approve it.

— Participating in the development and testing of high-quality cake formulations for a new business concept. Send-A-Cake of Topeka started in June 1991.

Bob Brennan of Send-A-Cake said the center and Hahn were of great assistance to him in starting his business.

"It would have been very difficult for us to open in a timely manner without Dick Hahn's help," Brennan said.

"He was extremely helpful in getting all our recipes together with the American Institute of Baking."

Hahn, a Lindsborg native who received his doctorate in chemistry from K-State in 1957, recently retired as vice president of research for A.E. Staley in Decatur, Ill.

"There is not enough room for the books — the books are stored in off-campus buildings. The students need to have them where they can get to them.

"The University continues to grow, and the library stays the same," he said. "So, eventually it will run out of room if nothing happens.

"We are glad to be able to do it. It's kind of fun to do something where it is really needed. And in this particular case, that is definitely true."

Joe Hales said the most gratifying thing of all was when the students voted 97 percent in favor of the referendum to help finance the library expansion.

"We were very grateful that the students showed that much interest. I think the expansion of the library will be a very successful project," he said.

Joyce Hales said she and her family is proud to participate in this project.

"It is our hope and our belief that the students will continue to support the library," she said.

In his speech to guests and officials, Wefald said Farrell represents the entire spectrum of the University.

"You cannot have a good university unless you have a good library," Wefald said.

MUSIC

Performers showcased in festival

AMY CLARK

The annual Central States Jazz Festival was more than just a chance for jazz bands to perform and compete.

It was also a chance for band members to experience the music of other bands.

Musicians participated in the all-day festival Friday in McCain Auditorium.

Manhattan High School's jazz band, the Blue Notes Jazz Ensemble, is a regular at the festival.

Blue Notes Director Rod Manges said he likes participating because the event is in Manhattan and it "gives a chance for the alumni of our group, friends and families to hear us."

He also said he likes attending because the competition is of high quality, due to the expertise of the judges.

The University of North Texas Faculty Jazz Quintet performed as the finale of the concert.

The quintet's performers have played with many artists throughout the years, including Woody Herman, Stan Kenton and Pat Metheny.

The quintet members performed, but they also judged the performances of the bands during the festival.

This wasn't the first time some of the quintet members had been to K-State.

said, because it has a stable economy with a history of rarely fluctuating in growth or depression. He said that in the mid-1980s, the economy boomed in the United States, but Manhattan only had a gradual growth.

"The Kansas economy has not boomed for 10 years. Instead, we've only had slow growth. Because of this type of economy, we tend to not notice a slow down," Stinson said.

"The positive effect of this is that it presents a stable economy."

Unemployment measures are only one aspect of the effect of a recession on Manhattan. Businesses become a galvanizing factor in the recession because they must make the cuts that cause unemployment.

"It appears that in retail sales, we had a better year in 1991 than in 1990. We've had a number of new businesses start, and there are also some good signs from the home sales," Stinson said.

Local business owners disagree about the effects of the recession. Some have had to cut back, while others are prospering.

"We have definitely been affected," said Rus Liggett, co-general manager of Carlos O'Kelly's Mexican Cafe.

"Our sales have not decreased, but our sales would have grown a lot more," he said. "We typically have a strong sales growth."

Debra Jones, manager of General Nutrition Center in Manhattan Town Center Mall, said GNC has not yet been hit by the recession.

"We closed out the year with a plus," she said. "There were a lot of the other stores that closed out negative this year — like in Kansas City."

BIG EIGHT BEST

■ The Big Eight finished with the best record against non-conference teams in the nation with a .882 winning percentage. This is the best winning percentage and the most wins in Big Eight history.

EDITORIALS

Big Eight victories hard to come by

For years, basketball teams in the Big Eight Conference have been battling for the recognition they deserve.

This season the conference is swamped with praise and high ratings. Four of the eight teams are currently ranked in the Associated Press Top-25 basketball poll, Oklahoma State and Kansas are ranked in the top three. Both Iowa State and Nebraska have been mentioned as top-25 teams as well.

The Big Eight is one of the winningest leagues in the entire country. Additionally, many of the losses for the lower-four Big Eight teams have come at the hands of conference opponents. This places the Big Eight as one of the toughest conferences in the nation.

These facts add up to a tough battle for teams like K-State who face conference foes for the remainder of the season.

Saturday's Wildcat victory over the Nebraska Cornhuskers showed that Dana Altman's team could play as a team. They could look adversity square in the eye. The Cats showed they're not down for the count.

K-State fans witnessed a big turning point in this season. The Cats are now contributing to the quality for which the Big Eight has been recognized.

Wildcat fans across the country should not only take pride in Saturday's victory but the stature of Big Eight basketball as a whole.

Breast cancer risk should not be taken lightheartedly

Women, take note.

Recent medical research has revealed that low levels of X-ray radiation cause breast cancer in some women.

Scientists say as many as one million women have an inherent gene that causes breast cancer with seemingly harmless diagnostic X-rays.

If the breasts are covered with a lead blanket, the risk is nearly dissolved.

In most of the cases, the X-rays were taken from a body region where covering the breasts would not have interfered with the picture.

Thanks to carelessness, lack of knowledge or whatever reason, the breasts weren't covered.

And women died.

Of course, we all get tired of the catch phrases — "may have," "as many as," etc. What doesn't cause cancer?

But in a nation where about 225,000 women contracted or died from breast cancer last year, any discoveries should be treated with respect.

Prevention is simple.

Don't assume you aren't one of the million.

Insist your doctor cover your breasts whenever possible. This means dental X-rays, too.

This doesn't take the place of self and medical examinations, either. It's just an additional precaution to avoid a terrible disease.

Do it. Please.

SAINT BRONSON WILL SAVE US

After the second punch, I just let the guy hit me. He'd sent enough energy into my jaw to convince me he knew how to fight. And from the way I walked right into the second jab, to my forehead, it was clear to both of us I wasn't going to hold my own in this scrap.

Scrap is probably too informal to describe the fight. How about: One Saturday night a couple years ago, a car stopped in front of Justin Hall. I was wandering around campus with a new coat and a head full of weirdness. Two guys jumped out and pounded on me until an architecture student came along. I'm not sure which was more embarrassing, getting my ass kicked or having an architect for a savior.

All this without so much as a good Kansas "Howdy." It turned out, according to K-State Investigator Richard Herrman, that the guys were from Flint, Mich. They made off with my coat and all the useless crap in it. They might as well have stolen a high-school student's locker, there was so much detritus in the pockets.

ED SKOOG

The coat cost me eight bucks the day before at Grandma's Trunk, and I had to go around the rest of the night without one. It got cold. I think I was crying by the time I got to a friend's house nearby. A bunch of people were there, and it was hard to tell them what had happened — why a hulking mass like myself would be a target for a roving game of punch-out. It's still hard to explain.

A cop came and took my name, what had happened and that stuff. Nothing odd about the situation, except the K-State Police have these strange CBs pinned to their shoulders, and I think I laughed out loud at her. She looked sharply at me. I didn't think these cops or their talking shoulders were going to find the guys or my coat, and they didn't. But I was surprised a few days later when Herrman figured out who the bastards were. Not that it did much good by then, because they had gone back north. Laid-off auto workers, I rationalized, rising up against the power structure. But it still didn't make any sense.

It didn't make sense the next time it happened, to a friend trying to recapture his keg at a party. His head was knocked against the curb. He spent months in the hospital and had to move back in with his mother. It has never made sense, but it's become unsurprising.

Senseless violence has been familiar to man since someone first picked up a rock and bounced it off an unsuspecting neighbor's noggin. This escalated to big wars, grits with guns and the bomb. Then came Bronson.

Charles Bronson — Saint Bronson, as Harry Crews has called him. The video of "Death Wish IV" calls Bronson an "action movie icon." He always plays big strong guys and averages seven lines a movie. Unlike Stallone or Schwarzenegger, however, there's nothing macho about Bronson.

Consider the Bronson pose. A permanent squint toward the horizon, a catfish moustache, catfish lips, a square frame with a pelvic center of gravity and a gun. Always a gun. Macho hunks have chiseled features, while Bronson's face looks welded. Like other action movie actors, Bronson's natural state is silence, but unlike these mediocre, strong silent types, Bronson is burly, big and just plain gnarly.

His characters live in societies where one's mere existence is ample reason to be targeted at random, just like here. In the first five minutes of any film, some goon always jumps out from behind a wall and tries to rob, rough up or otherwise offend Bronson. Bronson stands up to them, beats one up for good measure, and the silly felons scatter like crows.

I've always taken the lame way out of physical conflict, knuckling under like bread dough. But it's the wimp reaction to craziness that makes craziness easier. Despite all the cowboy boots, this is a city of soft people, to whom getting in shape means driving down to the Nautilus Fitness Center or the Rec Center every semester for a few jumping jacks. We've become weebles, wobbling whenever we're suprised.

But if we all were more like Bronson, these things wouldn't happen as often, and when they would, we'd be prepared. Short of gun-toting, we should recognize the potential for violence in everyone and be aware that weakness on one side tends to draw out the strong brute on the other.

▶INSTRUCTOR DID NOT COMPLAIN ABOUT DEBAUCHERY

Editor,

In a Jan. 31 Collegian article by Andy Woodward, I am attributed to have used the word "debauchery" in complaining of the possible consequences of a future basketball campout when the issue was raised in the previous evening's Student Senate meeting. The word debauchery is not a word I normally use. In fact, I did not use it, especially in the context reported. Furthermore, I am not a person who would complain of debauchery in myself or others, providing the debauchees are consenting adults.

My comments in relation to the basketball campout were entirely addressed to the waste of students' time, the unfairness of the way it has been run in the past, and the possibility of personal injury and University liability because of basic safety factors.

Besides, at the end of the most recent campouts, plenty of student tickets remained, causing one to wonder the purpose of the campout. If debauchery was one of the benefits, far be it from me to complain of what consenting debauchees agree to do in private, even on University property.

JFK: Let's beat a dead horse just a little more

A new generation of controversy has arisen from Oliver Stone's latest film, "JFK," a pseudo-documentary of former President John F. Kennedy's assassination. Although this is perhaps the single most scrutinized event in history and occurred almost 30 years ago, we as good Americans do not feel it is worthy of our deepest consideration until it becomes a major motion picture or TV miniseries. We tend to let pop culture write history instead of the facts. Look at the Reagan dynasty — an eight-year commercial for Velveeta politics from a B-movie actor.

While I don't agree with a number of Stone's re-created cinematic fantasies, I concur that the truth must be told. Hence I would like to offer a few theories, inconsistencies and other juicy tidbits surrounding the Kennedy assassination, or should I say, assassination "attempt" (a respectable tabloid has reported Kennedy is alive and well and has been photographed on a fishing trip with Elvis Presley and Jimmy Hoffa.)

Most of these facts have been gathered from intensive investigations by myself and interviews with respectable members of society who are unable to come forward for fear of reprisals from the GNC (Gay Nazis for Christ.) Additional information was obtained from the Dallas Coroner's Office, cereal boxtops and heavy-metal albums played backwards.

These are the facts:

1. Kennedy was shot at about 12 p.m. on 11-23-63. If you add these numbers (12+11+23+63) and divide by the number of letters in John F. Kennedy (12), you get about 9 — the shoe size of Lee Harvey Oswald. Coincidence or conspiracy? You be the judge.

2. J. Edgar Hoover and John F. Kennedy have the same number of letters in their names. Spooky or what?

3. If you take the number of letters in Jack Ruby (8) and add 4 to it, you get the same number of letters as in John F. Kennedy. Are you beginning to get the picture?

4. Recent evidence uncovered by expatriate anti-Castro Cubans indicates Oswald, Fidel Castro and Marilyn Monroe were involved in a torrid love triangle. Further investigation has found that Jack Ruby, District Attorney Jim Garrison and two members of the Warren Commission were involved in a love trapezoid. Seems like every conspiracy involves a lurid sex scandal.

CHRISTOPHER HOPKINS
GUEST

5. If you add an "1" to the end of Castro, you get Castrol — one of the major suppliers of petroleum products to the Indy 500. The big oil companies are always involved. Can't keep their hands out of politics, can they?

6. Many people, especially the Warren Commission, have perpetrated the so-called "magic bullet theory." As you know, this theory predicts that a single bullet is responsible for one wound in Kennedy and three wounds in former Texas Gov. John Connally. We propose here an alternative theory called the "17-bullet theory." Bullets one through three coming from members of the CIA; four through six from the FBI; seven and eight from anti-Castro Cubans; nine through 11 from pro-Castro Cubans; 12 and 13 from semi-pro Americans; 14 and 15 from a militant splinter faction of the Dallas PTA; 16 a stray from a local firing range; and 17 from Abu Nidal, who thought he was shooting at Oliver North. The Dallas Police Department has refused my repeated requests to test this theory by re-creation (They cite public safety.) This whole thing smacks of cover-up.

7. If you rearrange the letters of the FBI, you get FIB. That pretty much sums up the government's role in this whole mess.

8. Much has been said about the Grassy Knoll near Dealey Plaza. Many believe shots were fired from this area. My associates and I, through the use of modern forensic techniques, have established this theory is a sham. A close study of this area, using state-of-the-art laser surveying equipment and tunneling electron microscopy, reveals irrefutably this area should be reclassified as an "embankment," not a "knoll." Obviously, this fact places the entire investigation in a new light.

9. With the recent fall of communism in the Soviet Union and the release of many of the KGB's top-secret files, new information has been obtained about Oswald's "sabbatical" in Russia. Information obtained from these documents show that on more than one occasion, Oswald and Nikita Khrushchev were seen "tucking" rubles in corpulent Russian dancers at official party go-go clubs in Minsk (such clubs as the Red Light Pub, Lenin's Place and Vladimir's 2001.)

By themselves, these facts may seem slightly trivial. Taken as a whole, they are incredibly trivial. But that's not the point. The point is to seek out truth — to boldly go where only charlatans have gone before. We owe it to our children to bring this thing to justice. If someone makes a buck on the way, hey, this is America — where entertainment and personal tragedy are one and the same.

I have taken a great personal risk to bring these facts forward. However, I feel the truth must be told, even if I am protected at night by little more than an old smoke alarm with a questionable battery. I can only hope that those who read this will feel inspired to seek out the truth about Kennedy's assassination or, at least, concoct some of their own twisted theories that can eventually become the source of a future TV miniseries or movie.

"I DO"

What it takes to make a marriage work

ULRIKE DAUER
Collegian

Marriage is an adventure most people will experience at least once.

Ninety to 95 percent of Americans get married at least once in their life.

But, as divorce statistics show, half of the commitments presumably made to another person for a life don't last a lifetime.

"In 1991, a study at the University of Denver found 50 percent of marriages in the United States end in divorce," said Ruth Teschendorf, graduate student in counseling psychology and psychology intern with University Counseling Services.

Especially for teen-age marriages, the divorce rate is sky-high, said Rick Miller, assistant professor of human development and family studies.

Balances show it takes more than a "Yes" to make a marriage work.

Cia Verschelden, assistant professor of social work, said communication and flexibility are most important in making a marriage work.

"It's important to go with whatever happens and make time to communicate with one's spouse," she said.

She said communication between partners decreases when spouses spend less time together.

"I suspect the quality of communication with each other doesn't compensate for the lack of quantity," Verschelden said.

Walter Schumm, professor of family studies, said two individuals who decide to get married should expect differences and disagreements.

Young couples have to work through and negotiate more than 7,000 open decisions, he said.

"It starts with questions like who takes out the garbage and 'Are we going to have children or not, and how many,'" Schumm said.

"The major part of marriages go bad within the first three years," he said.

In fact, Teschendorf said, the first year is the most difficult.

Problems occur, Miller said, because spouses carry their own expectations in the form of a "script" into a relationship.

He said these scripts are based on each partner's family experience. And to avoid misunderstandings, people need to talk about their scripts.

"People should share their scripts and negotiate a joint script," he said.

Marital relationships have changed in the last 40 years, Miller said. Spouses expect more intimacy with their partners and try harder to have their emotional needs met.

"You are now supposed to be your partner's best friend," he said.

A big difference today is that there are more dual-career couples. Separation due to job requirements — sometimes over states — creates some problems of its own, Teschendorf said.

Verschelden said women earning their own money bring independence into the relationship, which creates a new dynamic.

Marriage also makes a difference between man and wife in terms of health and satisfaction, Teschendorf said.

"Surprisingly, unmarried women are happier and healthier than their married counterparts, whereas unmarried men are unhappier and sicker than their married fellows," she said.

She also said married women experience more stress than married men, because there is still no real sharing of household duties, even though both partners work.

"The division of labor has not kept up with the fact that 65 percent of women are in the work force," Verschelden said.

She said people who want to get married need to learn how to run a "small business," and they need to talk about their budget, how they are going to keep their money, where they are going to live and who will work. They should work something out beforehand, she said.

Verschelden said problems remain and creep up if a couple hasn't really decided about the issues. It is best, she said, to deal with problems as soon as they occur.

Teschendorf said the problem aspect is important, especially when spouses never try to befriend one another.

"If a couple didn't resolve some differences, they may crop up and create some difficulties later, especially if spouses have not become friends during their time together," she said.

One way to prepare for these differences is to expect and to face them, Miller said.

Verschelden said more people should consider their engagement time as a period that possibly, rather than definitely, ends in a marriage — a time to reconsider the own decision and also to question it.

Fiancés, she said, should use their engagement as a time to work through those issues, to communicate one's own needs to each other and to continually check how it works.

"Honest communication from the beginning is important," she

Western model is not only concept of marriage

ULRIKE DAUER
Collegian

The recipe is simple: To make a successful marriage, take two people of different sex who will offer each other eternal fideltiy. Add one ceremony in front of witnesses and a life together in a common household.

What people are not aware of is that this is primarily the Western model of marriage and married life.

"I would question whether this Western tradition is appropriate in understanding what is happening in other countries at this time," said Martin Ottenheimer, head of the department of sociology, anthropology and social work.

The form the concept of marriage takes around the world not only varies from people to people, he said, but the idea of marriage in the United States has also changed throughout history.

In earlier times, a marriage was considered successful if many children were born, he said. Love was not the primary motive for getting married, since most marriages were arranged.

"Love came afterward," Ottenheimer said.

People also married within their family 200 years ago, he said. Still today, not all states forbid a person from marrying a first cousin.

Kansas law does not allow people to marry a first cousin, but Colorado, New York and California, for instance, do permit it.

At times, Ottenheimer said, there was even polygamy in the United States.

He said the Mormons promoted polygamy, but the Supreme Court in 1862 decided to outlaw it as "uncivilized mode of behavior."

"Abraham Lincoln signed the bill," he said.

Ottenheimer said divorce is not considered something negative everywhere.

Comparative studies show that some societies, like the Jie group in East Africa, have no divorce rate, whereas others, like one tribe in northern Nigeria, have a divorce rate of 90 percent.

"But this is not considered a failure of the marriage," he said. "Instead, a divorce is almost expected.

"It is part of the wider game that children are taken care of, and people live a happy life."

Ottenheimer said because of the different ways different societies look at divorce, divorce statistics are not a good way to check if a certain marriage pattern is a success or a failure.

"Divorce is only one way to look at marriage, based on a narrow Western tradition," he said.

He said the marriage pattern in a society can only be judged in its context, and it is appropriate if it helps maintain that society. This, for instance, can be measured in the way it helps in raising children to perform as appropriate adults.

Popping the question

CHRISTOPHER ASSAF

Valentine's Day — the time of year when love fills their air with its sickening fragrance, and people plan on getting engaged to the one they love.

But the consummation of a relationship by proposing in the traditional way runs against the grain of the changing 1990s.

Why do the static — and equally boring — proposal by getting on one knee to show your submissiveness to the one you love?

Partners are equal, and there are many more interesting ways to ask the love of your life for her hand in marriage.

First off, ways not to ask the big question.

Don't delve into the depths of commitment without forethought.

Remember, you are expected to be with the one you love until the end of time. Though this is seldom adhered to, it's the thought that counts.

Getting drunk and thinking to yourself it might be fun to get married is not advisable.

The question "Will you marry me?" does not carry much weight when you slur the opening phrases after consuming a few too many frosty beverages, and it's not appropriate to the seriousness of the situation.

Asking someone to be your betrothed after experiencing heavy depression or riding emotional tidal waves of window-shattering force is questionable in itself.

The person will think you are still a little off-center and that your actions could be a last-ditch effort to ruin her life as well as your own. I'd say a good two to three weeks after breaking depression or experiencing trauma is an advisable quarantine period.

After checking to make sure you do not fall under these previous conditions, it's fairly safe to say you are of sound mind to pop the big question.

If being of sound mind, you should then buy the ring.

One tradition that has fallen to the wayside during the Reagan materialism years is buying a ring and then asking for the person's hand. The ring adds excitement and a possibility for memories.

But what if the ring gets lost, or what if the engagement is broken off? The fights about the proper owner of the rock will allow you to spin tales as long as the Great Wall of China.

It just seems silly to plan a marriage to the point where you buy the engagement ring with the bride to be. The moment loses any spontaneity, and the proposer loses a chance to show creativity in asking while using the ring as a device of sport.

In planning a proposal, one of the first things to consider is the person you are planning to ask.

Most people today are not as entrenched in the traditions of their mother and father, let alone their grandparents, so why not try something a little in left field — if not the parking lot at the stadium?

Speaking of which, if you are a big sports fan and so is your mate, why not do the asking at a sporting event? There are several tasteful ways to go about it.

One is to attend a televised game and hold a sign asking your sweetheart to marry you.

Sure, this has been done before, but when considered, you can look back and tell the grandchildren your marriage proposal was done on national television. That one's always a wower.

Maybe at the sporting event of your choice, you should buy a hotdog for your loved one, slip the ring around it and give it to her for her consumption.

If she's observant, she'll see the ring and nothing more is to be said. And there will be hugs and kisses all around. If she is not observant, after a trip to the hospital to remove the ring, memories and stories to be told at the reception will live on forever.

If you are both still in college, why not ask her in a classroom setting?

Find out her most boring class and get there early. Then write the big question on the chalkboard and cover it with a screen.

As the professor moves the screen to compose some tidbit of knowledge, your message will be seen as you wait in the back and rush up with the ring. The class will definitely be more interesting from that point on.

Perhaps you both drive to school together in the morning.

If you do, line up some of your buddies alongside the road and ask them to hold signs with the big question written on them.

After ensuring you do not wreck the car, show her the ring. Nothing more needs to be said.

Buying a billboard advertisement will also have the same effect, but it's not as personal as your friends holding signs.

If you have the dough to blow, why not buy a nifty newspaper ad (a full-page one for the full effect) with a picture of you with the ring and a simple phrase summing up the moment. That will probably catch her attention.

Maybe you could try buying a nifty cable TV ad. Make sure she's watching her favorite show, and have the VCR running. This could be an off-the-wall, true moment to cherish in the tradition of the '90s.

There are numerous unique ways to ask someone to marry you.

Talk with friends and parents for ideas. Make sure popping the question is a big event and will not be easily forgotten.

And who's to say the woman can't do the asking? In the '90s, it wouldn't be all that unusual.

ATTENDANTS

Fashions for bridesmaids similar to bridal gowns

HOLLY CAMPBELL
Collegian

Bridesmaids and the maid or matron of honor are a bride's supporting cast.

And fashions for bridesmaids in the 1990s go hand-in-hand with the style of a bride's gown.

Many styles carry over from the bride to the bridesmaids, as most brides tend to choose a style of dress similar to their own gown.

"They usually pick the same neckline they are wearing," said Cindy Ruder, manager of Christine's — The Wedding Co.

The styles and the fabrics of the dresses vary greatly, Ruder said.

"Most of the dresses are tea-length and quite a few have a high-low hemline," she said. Ballerina dresses are used more for formal weddings.

Ruder said she has seen more brides choosing suits made out of woven fabrics for their bridesmaids.

"They want their bridesmaids to be able to wear them again," she said.

The most popular new colors for spring and summer are coral and amethyst.

And Ruder said a lot of people choose velvet or iridescent fabrics that have a black thread in them for winter weddings.

Accessories for the bridesmaids are also usually similar to the bride's.

"They wear pearls and rhinestones with the accenting color for jewelry," she said.

"They are still wearing died-to-match shoes. Rarely do the bridesmaids wear something in their hair."

A common tradition is for brides to offer accessories as personal gifts to their attendants.

Among fashions for bridesmaid's gowns is this long dress with pearl ropes. The dress is by Alfred Angelo. Model: Lisa Rupp.

PLANNING

Consultants option for busy brides and grooms

ERIN PERRY
Collegian

Going to the chapel may be easier for future brides and grooms if they go to a wedding consultant first.

Consultant services can be as minimal as giving helpful hints to as complete as coordinating the entire event.

"I can plan the whole wedding or just do the parts they think they'll have trouble with," said Noreen Meis, owner of Affairs of the Heart in Topeka.

Audra Wilson, owner of Audra's Limited in Topeka, said in addition to consulting, her store offers wedding formalwear and accessories, as well as its own reception room and catering.

Brides who purchase their dresses from Audra's Limited can then use any of the services free, but this is not required.

"We can tell them everything they're going to need and be doing," Wilson said.

There are currently no consulting services available in Manhattan.

Ideally, couples who wish to hire a consultant should try to contact one about six months before the wedding. Meis said it doesn't necessarily take this long to plan every detail, but to ensure that the couple can reserve the reception room of their choice.

In Topeka, she said, this is particularly important because the city is short on reception rooms.

Meis, who operates out of her home, said she meets with couples first to find out their preferences, budget and any plans they may have already made.

She said she then gives the couple a list of merchants she thinks would be most compatible with their taste and price range.

"It cuts down on a lot of time they would spend researching everybody," Meis said.

Sometimes, she said, she can also refer them to a merchant who may not be listed in the phone book, whom they might not otherwise hear about. Often this is someone who does weddings on the side, not as their central business, and can offer lower prices.

Once the couple knows which businesses they want to use, they tell Meis their choices and she organizes the details. In the end, she said, she sometimes attends part of the wedding and reception to make sure they run smoothly.

Wilson said she also helps couples outline a budget and set priorities. If the gowns and tuxedos are the most important aspect of the wedding to a couple, she said, that's where they should spend the most money.

Some couples are surprised at first to learn how much money a wedding entails, Wilson said.

"They think all it takes is getting a dress and getting married," she said.

Hiring a consultant to coordinate a wedding tends to pay off, Meis and Wilson said, because they know where to find the bargains for each client's taste.

"I really feel like I save them a lot of time, but even more important, I save them a lot of money," Meis said.

Meis said according to the November 1991 Association of Bridal Consultants newsletter, about 40 percent of ABC members charge on a percentage basis. Of those, about 80 percent charge 10-15 percent of the total amount a couple spends on the wedding.

Meis, an ABC member, said she charges 10 percent of the couple's total wedding costs. She said she chose this method to be competitive, because many other Topeka consultants do the same.

Other consultants charge hourly, daily or flat fees, and some use a combination of these, the ABC said.

Wilson, on the other hand, said her fees depend on the kind of services she provides. Usually, she said, she charges no more than $50.

While consultants are in charge of organizing the particulars of the big day, the couple remains in charge of the choices.

Wilson said she encourages brides- and grooms-to-be to use creativity in their weddings.

"I think there should be enough freedom," Wilson said. "It varies from person to person.

"There's so much more freedom in weddings than there used to be."

Being a consultant, however, is sometimes like being a surrogate mother, she said.

"A lot of times, if the girl's mother is out of town, she wants to discuss things extensively with me," Wilson said.

HONEYMOON

Getaway locations deserve careful consideration

Honeymooners should prepare for the unexpected

PAM FRAHM
Collegian

From Disneyworld to the Caribbean and Hawaii to Europe, honeymoon possibilities are endless.

The destination chosen for a honeymoon is one remembered forever, and it is a decision that should be given careful consideration.

Recently, cruises have become the most frequent trip for newlyweds.

Because the price of a cruise includes everything from meals and entertainment to airfare and lodging, it allows the couple to know the total cost for the trip beforehand.

David Garvin, president of Creative Travel, said paying for the trip in one lump sum eliminates the "sticker shock" that can be incurred by expensive food and other necessities purchased during trips to resort locations.

Besides cruises, popular honeymoon destinations include Disneyworld, the Caribbean, Mexico and Hawaii. Travel agencies work to give couples a variety of options, according to their expectations.

Mary Gugle, travel consultant for Kansas State Travel, said though some people have a good idea where they want to go, many couples come in with no idea.

If this is the case, she said, the agency will give the couple several options.

Gugle also emphasized the need to make reservations as early as possible, especially if couples have a specific destination in mind, to guarantee they get what they want.

"I've done honeymoons from six months in advance to two days," she said, but there are benefits that can be gained from booking early.

Booking in advance may allow a couple to get early-bird discounts.

Kathy Gay, travel agent for International Tours, said many cruise lines offer a discount if booking is done more than six months in advance.

If working within a low budget, Garvin said couples should not to assume that staying within the United States is cheaper.

A seven-day trip to Cancun can be as little as $450 per person, including airfare and hotel, which will probably be cheaper than a trip of the same length to a nice resort within the United States.

Garvin also said that because a honeymoon is "something that people really save to do," they should shop around at different travel agencies.

"Just like people shop for the ring, they should shop for a honeymoon. Couples should work with an agent who is reputable and knowledgeable and is out for their best interest," he said.

Many honeymooners are opting to save money by driving somewhere nearby. Some popular and less expensive trips within driving distance include Colorado, New Orleans and the Ozarks.

"My fiancé and I have decided to be modest with our honeymoon by driving to Colorado and exploring the mountains by bicycle to save a little money for our home together," said Blain Bertrand, a recent K-State graduate who will be married in May.

Hawaii and Europe are some of the most expensive honeymoon trips, but are still popular destinations.

Hawaii may cost about $1,200 per person for a five-night trip that includes airfare, hotel and car rental.

Although few hotels have newlywed discounts, there are several that offer honeymoon packages that include champagne, flowers or special dinner offers.

Garvin said packing light is best for honeymoons, because couples will "never see these people again, and they don't need to have 10 changes for each day."

For cruises, the Caribbean, Disneyworld and the like, attire should be mostly casual shorts or slacks, but could include some more formal clothes for a nice evening out or a dinner on a cruise.

Garvin said Disneyworld has become the most complete vacation center in the world, and it is beginning to surpass cruises in honeymoon popularity.

He said most people do not realize the possibilities of the Orlando area and think of Disneyworld only as the Magic Kingdom.

Even though couples hope nothing will go wrong during the honeymoon, Garvin said, "My advice would be for any kind of trip, even honeymoons, couples should be prepared for the unexpected — ready to roll with the punches."

He said planning the trip through a travel agent is the best way to prevent most problems.

FLOWERS

Choosing a florist not 1st thing to do

GINGER BURD
Collegian

Weddings are as unique as couples who marry. And the flowers for a wedding should be just as unique.

A bride planning her wedding faces many decisions before the big day. One of these decisions might be choosing someone to do her wedding flowers.

After she has made a decision about who to go to for help, she should set up an appointment with the florist she chose.

Now that this has been taken care of, the bride sometimes thinks this area of decision-making is over, and the florist will have a package plan to make things simple. Choosing the flowers for a wedding, however, is not that simple.

Bill Patzell, manager of Manhattan Floral, said flowers are not the first thing a bride should do.

Usually, he said, the bride should already have her dress and wedding colors picked out.

"Flowers are finish work," Patzell said, and a florist uses flowers to enhance everything else.

The florist designing the wedding oftentimes sits down with the bride and first shows her examples, in order to give the bride some general ideas.

Karen Medlin, owner of Westloop Floral, said some of the more common flowers found in wedding work include roses, carnations, freesia, iris and heather.

Patzell, Medlin and Susan Doughty, designer at Steve's Floral downtown, said they don't think there is a single flower thought of as a traditional wedding flower, nor are there traditional pieces used in a wedding.

Medlin said, however, there are a few very typical pieces found in many weddings. A bridal bouquet, attendants' bouquets, boutonnieres, corsages and church decorations are among the more typical wedding pieces.

Wedding work can get as creative as the imagination allows.

Medlin said she has done flowers as unusual as for a car or as typical as for the reception.

One idea for a creative pieces might be a corsage that is part of the bridal bouquet and can be taken out and used as a going-away corsage.

If the reception or wedding takes place outside and near a swimming pool, pool pieces can be made.

Another possible idea is a small step ladder painted white and decorated with flowers for the bride to stand on when she throws her bouquet.

Even though there is not a package plan for wedding flowers or a traditional standard to go by, there are what some would call more formal or informal weddings. With different types of weddings come variations of formal or informal flowers.

Some flowers considered more formal might be roses, calla lilies, orchids and gardenias. Daisies are a more informal flower.

Carnations, Queen Anne's lace, baby's breath and various forms of ivy could be considered either.

In the past, it was thought that only certain kinds of flowers should be used in certain seasons. This is no longer true, Doughty said.

Any flower can be used any time of year if the bride is willing to pay the price, she said. Using flowers like tulips or daffodils in November or roses for a Valentine's Day wedding could be rather expensive.

Just as fashion and wedding trends change, so do wedding flowers.

UNIQUE WEDDING

All it took for the Caseys was jeans and a judge

HEATHER RESZ
Collegian

There was no long wedding gown train, no veil, no expensive invitations — just two people who loved each other, wedding vows and a judge.

"We got married in my parents living room," said Karin Casey, 32, of McCracken. "It was just me and Jim, our parents and some of our brothers and sisters.

"I still pledged to love, honor and cherish Jim. I just said it in jeans and in front of a judge."

Atmosphere was another difference at this July 21, 1979, wedding.

"Patty Swartz, my maid of honor, stood up with me, and every time I looked at her, I laughed uncontrollably," Karin said.

It wasn't really a jeans and T-shirt wedding, Karin said.

"I was wearing jeans and a button down shirt."

"My brother asked if he had to clean up for the wedding, and I told him no," she said. "He came straight from working in the field all day to the wedding. I really didn't mind. We had our wedding the way we wanted it."

Jim Casey's brother didn't even show up. He had more important things to do — like play baseball, Karin said.

Jim and Karin said they had planned to be married in October, but they decided to move it up to July — just because.

Karin said she thinks too many weddings today put traditions and the desires of friends and family members ahead of the wishes of the bride and groom.

Karin said she doesn't like to plan — not even birthday parties. And this leaves out the traditional wedding.

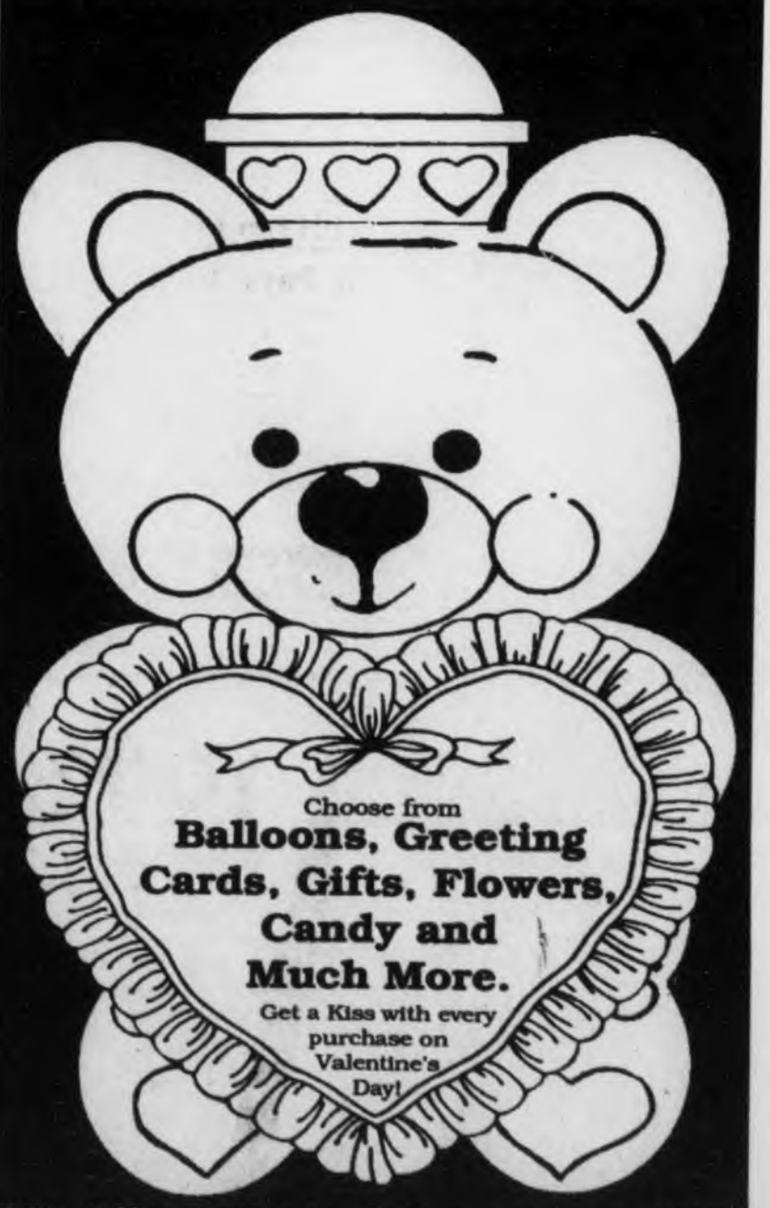
"I don't like the traditional wedding. It's not me," Karin said.

A while back, she said, she and two of her sister-in-laws were sitting around talking about their weddings.

"One of us had a large traditional wedding, one had a dressy wedding in the living room of her parent's house, and then there was us," Karin said.

"None of us said we'd change anything. My wedding was different, easy, non-traditional and us.

"I've never heard any complaints from Jim about weddings except when he has to get dressed up to go to one."



The Caseys said they would be relieved if their children choose to get married in jeans.

STYLES FOR ALL SEASONS

Valentine's Day is traditionally a time of love and romance, and occasionally it brings the sparkle of a diamond engagement ring.

With the excitement of being engaged comes all of the many hours of preparation for the special day. One of the first things a future bride thinks about is her bridal gown.

"They all want to be Cinderella," said Cindy Ruder, manager of Christine's — The Wedding Co. "The traditional white dresses are still very popular."

V-necklines also have been popular for the last couple of years, she said. Another popular neckline, Ruder said, is portrait, which is an off-the-shoulder dress.

"There is more detail work on the dresses now — a lot more beadwork," Ruder said.

Oftentimes, iridescent sequins and beads are added to the skirt along the hemline.

Most gowns are made out of bridal satin and taffeta, but there have been some new fabrics lately.

Ruder said that chiffon, which was popular 10 to 20 years ago, is now coming back into style. Another new bridal gown fabric is silk and shantung, which is synthetic silk.

"We are seeing more of the A-line style dresses of the 1970s," Ruder said. These dresses are allusion covered with chiffon for a softening effect.

In 1991 and 1992, she said, the princess line also has been popular. Princess seams are vertical seams along the bodice, and dresses with these seams have no waistline.

Even though the weather varies greatly throughout the year, Ruder said wedding gowns don't.

"Most of them want long sleeves," she said, "usually to hide their arms for the pictures."

Ruder said, however, some brides are wearing gauntlet sleeves in the summer. These sleeves can be attached to the dress for the ceremony and pictures, but they can be removed for the dance.

"Different styles of dresses are usually worn for different types of weddings," she said. "Suit-type dresses with shorter hemlines are usually worn for second weddings. They chose things they can wear again."

The style of dress also varies with the woman.

Tall women, Ruder said, tend to wear straight silhouette dresses, whereas women who are petite tend to choose ball gowns with bigger slips.

Ruder said the princess dresses flatter larger and pregnant women, because they are dresses without a waistline.

Women with a larger bust usually like dresses with high necks, she said, because they tend to downplay the chest. Mermaid gowns flatter nice-figured women.

New styles also carry over into accessories.

"Hair bows are very popular," she said. "Many of the headpieces are simple and less dramatic.

"The headbands that come across the forehead are more rounded and softer, as compared to the V-shaped ones a few years ago."

On some of the headpieces, the allusion part can be taken off after the ceremony. Ruder also said hats are not as popular as they once were.

"Soon after they have chosen their headpiece," Ruder said, "most women see their hairstylist to decided how to wear their hair.

"Usually, they like to wear their hair up for the softening effect."

Ruder said rhinestone pearl-mix jewelry is popular. Drop earrings and decorated shoes are also popular with new brides.

There are also new tuxedo accessories.

"Vests and cummerbunds made out of prints instead of plain fabrics are the new thing," she said. "A lot of people are choosing stained-glass fabric."

Stained-glass fabric is a design of black with a stained-in color. If the men in the wedding party don't wear a new fabric, Ruder said, they usually wear black or a matching cummerbund, instead of matching to the bridesmaids.

"Black is very popular for tuxedos," Ruder said. "Different textured fabric is also popular, such as firence and gray spirit."

For grooms, tails are popular, and the groomsmen are wearing regular jackets. Ruder also said peg pants that have tapered legs have also been popular.

Whatever the attire of the wedding party, the wedding day is a special day for the bride and groom.

"They will look different than they do any other day of their life," Ruder said.

VALENTINE'S DAY

A unique holiday for all ages

Students recall past celebrations, comment on today's

THOMAS LISTER
Collegian

Everyone remembers the box.

Back in grade school, each child decorated an old shoe box with tin foil or colored paper and waited for Valentine's Day. If your box was full, you could be the love of someone's life. If not, you might as well be a one-eyed leper.

"I was a dork," said Giles Kyle, senior in civil engineering.

"I was pigeon-toed. They never liked me. In grade school, I wrote this girl a really sappy love valentine, and her friend told me she hated my guts. It was really sad."

That's the way guys talk about past Valentine's Days. It's like listening to war veterans talk about a pre-dawn massacre. Wounded pride lies on a bloody battlefield, gasping its last breath.

"In the second grade, I got a Valentine's Day card from a girl I had a crush on," said Eric Benson, senior in exercise science. "Of course, I got one from everyone else in the class."

Nonetheless, Benson said, he kept the card.

Andy Crow, senior in radio-television, said he remembers Marlo, a girl in the fourth grade.

Crow said he bought her a big box of candy and was on his way to give it to her when he saw a friend.

"He told me what a stupid idea it was, then he beat me to it," Crow said.

Of course, women look back on it all with a cool distance. They can juggle rattlesnakes on Valentine's Day.

"They had a Valentine's Day box-decorating contest in the fourth grade," said Carina Givens, senior human development and family studies.

"My sister made one. I don't know if she won, but I liked it."

And then there was candy.

"When you were a little kid, you'd get candy," said Wendy Nicholson, senior in anthropology and Kyle's girlfriend.

"It was like Halloween. We'd all get sick in school."

However, Nicholson said, things have changed over the years.

"It has become more sexual," she said. "Less candy, more sex."

Kyle disagreed.

"It's kind of the same thing," he said. "My sex is candy."

Candy isn't the only thing that has changed, said Rey Silva, sophomore in animal sciences and industry.

"It has become more commercialized," he said. "The girls—they don't appreciate things as much."

The veterans unite.

"It makes me sick to my stomach," Kyle said. "It's another source of guilt for not living up as a boyfriend."

Life in college is also a little busier, and people might not have time to celebrate.

"I don't see it as a holiday, because there's no day off," Kyle said. "That's the importance of Martin Luther King Jr. Day — there's a day off to think about it."

Even though Valentine's Day will be on a Friday, Silva said he doesn't know if he will celebrate.

"It depends on your mood," he said. "You might not give a shit. You might say, 'This is just another day.'"

Everyone seems to want something, though. It's just like grade school again. Despite the pessimism that comes with age, we still put the shoe box on top of the desk and wait for someone to fill it.

Everyone has a wish.

"A rose or something would be nice," Givens said.

Both Kyle and Nicholson agree on what they would like.

Kyle said he would like "sex with my girlfriend and a nice card." Nicholson wants "a couple of hours in bed with my boyfriend."

But we can't forget the meaning behind the day.

"It's not about receiving, but giving," Silva said. "That 's the real joy of life — sharing with other people."

Marriage

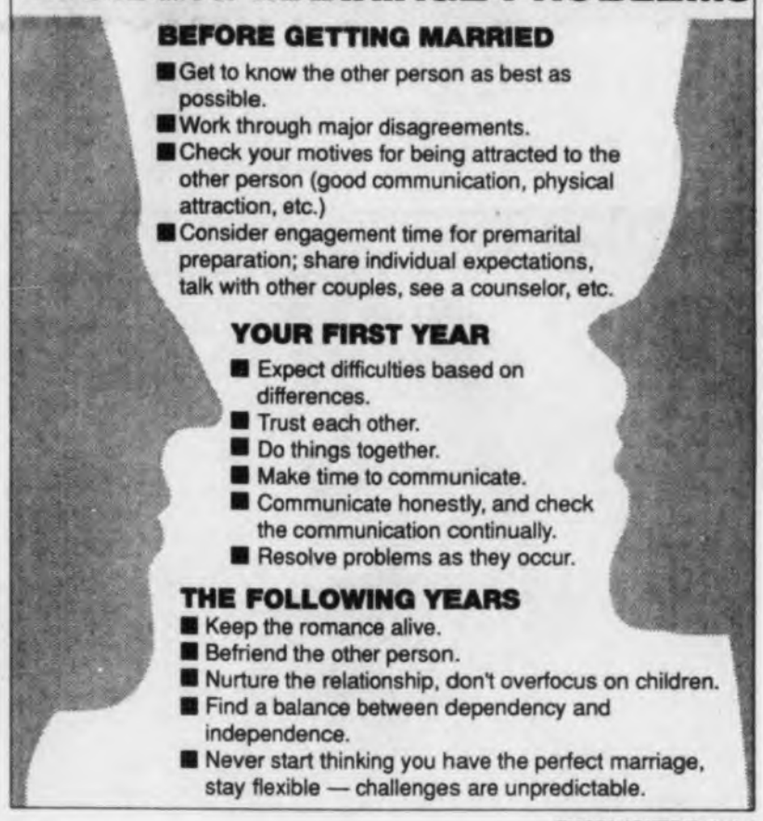
said. "It is critical to work out a pattern to communicate effectively each one's needs and feelings that everyone is happy and that can last through the years."

She said recently engaged couples would benefit from peer education. Fiancés should spend some time with another couple and ask them what they would have liked to know from each other before they got married.



In general, Verschelden said, couples should take the pre-marital work more seriously than they do. The formality of sitting down with a church person, a social worker or a counselor would be an important eye-opener, she said.

Miller said a marriage is a lifelong adventure, because a couple constantly undergoes changes, and new, unpredictable challenges always arise.

The relationship needs to be nurtured every day, he said.

"Keep the romance alive."

LEGISLATURE

Teams go to Topeka for ASK Lobby Day

PAM FRAHM
Collegian

Students representing the six Kansas Board of Regents schools will be in Topeka today to lobby legislators.

The day has been designated Associated Students of Kansas Lobby Day.

Events begin at 9 a.m. with the lobby teams talking with legislators until noon.

At 1 p.m., student body presidents will speak at a press conference. This will be followed by speeches from Gov. Joan Finney and Senate Majority Leader Fred Kerr, R-Pratt.

The teams will continue their lobbying from 2 to 4 p.m., and the day will end with a short rally.

Students attending ASK Lobby Day who are not part of the lobby teams will tour the Statehouse and Kansas Museum of History.

Student Body President Jackie McClaskey has asked that professors cooperate with the effort by excusing students attending the activities from classes.

Jim Persinger, former ASK director and McClaskey's chief of staff, said he is expecting a good turnout of K-State students.

"We have lobby teams made up of about 30 people, and we are hoping that at least 30 more will show up for the rally," he said.

Persinger said students were recruited to attend Lobby Day at an informational meeting last Monday, through word-of-mouth recruitment at campus clubs and organizations, and through contact with past Lobby Day attendees.

Students wanting a ride to Topeka to attend the press conference and rally should meet between 11:30 a.m. and noon today in the SGA office.

Promoting cultural diversity key to $56,000 move

Relocation provides visiblity for Taylor-Archer, multicultural affairs office

MITCH HIXSON
Collegian

Relocating the assistant dean of multicultural affairs office cost K-State $56,000, but officials say it was money well spent.

During the building phase, there was some student concern about the cost being spent to move one person into a brand new office in Anderson Hall in such tight times.

While budget cuts are causing a decrease in faculty, crowded classes and many classes to be cut altogether, the bottom line is whether the move was worth the money.

Pat Bosco, vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life, said it is a "very fair and important question to ask."

Bosco said he believed the money spent on the move was worth it, and it had been planned for the last six months.

The administration postponed the move in the fall, he said, causing an inconvenience to students who wanted access to Mordean Taylor-Archer, assistant dean of multicultural affairs.

During the wait, Bosco said, Taylor-Archer had no clerical support and an out-of-the-way office that was hard to find.

"That is not what we want in terms of our diversity program," he said.

Taylor-Archer said the move was both "logistical and programmatic."

"I'm trying to do my job by reporting with the provost, and I'm constantly running back and forth between buildings," she said.

The University plans to increase emphasis on cultural diversity, Bosco said. So Taylor-Archer will interact with students more and will increase her visibility on campus. This emphasis necessitated a move.

"I'm here because I want to make a difference," Taylor-Archer said.

She said it was difficult for her to do her job well in the old office because of a lack of access to faculty, students and resources.

Taylor-Archer said her old office, located on the second floor of Fairchild Hall, was difficult to find and provided very little room for any clerical staff to assist her.

"My office needs better visibility, and this move helps with that tremendously," she said. "All the people I work with every day are in Anderson Hall, so doesn't it make sense for me to be over there?"

Maybe the most important reason for the move was the K-State administration and the Kansas Board of Regents indicating that diversity needs to become one of the University's top priorities, Bosco said.

He also said the pros and cons of the move were weighed heavily. It was decided that the one-time cost of $56,000 was small when compared to the benefits Taylor-Archer and the University would gain.

"The costs are reasonable when a person thinks of all the mileage we are getting out of it," he said.

The money to move Taylor-Archer's office came from two sources, the general facilities fund and a non-state restricted fee.

"It's a very simple renovation, nothing fancy," Bosco said. "It's not elaborate by any means."

The building costs totaled $32,000, and the rest of the money went to buy space-saving furniture for the Office of Admissions, which lost space in the remodeling.

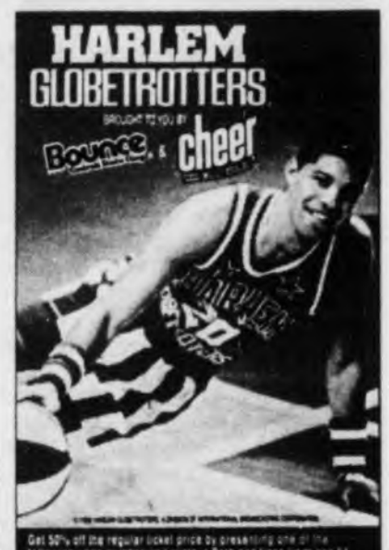
Councils.

Martin said these councils are made up of one representative from each company. The council meets on a monthly basis to discuss volunteer projects and ways to enhance volunteerism among its own employees.

"It's a good way for companies to improve staff morale, provide leadership opportunities and make things possible in the community that might not be," she said.

Fecteau, an alternate council member, said some of the biggest projects have been a toiletry drive and the Model Block project.



The companies collect soap, shampoo, razors and other toiletry items that are donated to area agencies, she said.

According to the Manhattan United Way, Manhattan businesses have not established corporate volunteer councils or volunteer programs.

The United Way Agencies in some cities sponsor a loaned executive program. Participating businesses loan an employee to be trained about the United Way Campaign.

No surrender: Cats 70, Huskers 66

Jones scores 25 in dramatic come-from-behind conference victory

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

Just when the crowd of 11,532 at Bramlage Coliseum began sensing the white flag would soon be run up the pole once more, someone altered the script.

K-State, trailing by 10 with just 6:42 left, appeared to be well on its way to surrendering in yet another Big Eight contest when something strangely different happened: the Wildcats decided to come back.

And come back the Cats did, ripping off a 16-2 run over the remainder of the contest to down Nebraska 70-66 in what became a pulsating thriller.

"I'll be the first to admit that when teams have gotten us in the hole, we haven't been very good at digging ourselves out," Cat coach Dana Altman said. "But today, because of the crowd and because a few individuals decided to step up, we got a win."

Indeed, the crowd did play a role. But the true stars this day were Askia Jones — who canned seven 3-pointers, including the game winner with 41 ticks remaining — and Wylie Howard, whose spirited inside play spurred the Cats on late.

After Nebraska took the aforementioned 64-54 lead, Howard suddenly became a man on a mission.

First there was a five-footer in the lane, then a pair of free throws. Next came a jumper from near the free-throw stripe, and finally, two more charity tosses.

Whew.

"Wylie did a good job of posting up and calling for the ball late," Altman said of Howard, who used the eight-point spurt to finish with 14. "Their zone is big and really gave us some trouble."

One man the zone didn't seem to bother much was Jones, who put on a jump-shooting clinic in the second 20 minutes.

After hitting only 4 of 11 shots in the opening stanza, Jones caught fire in the second half. He drilled four consecutive treys over a span of 5:29 and helped turn a five-point 'Husker lead into a four-point Cat edge at 46-42.

He was, to be sure, on a roll, and he knew it.

"After the first (trey) fell, I felt pretty confident so I just started looking for my next open shot," Jones said. "When the second one went, I really started looking for my shot."

And Jones' eyes were wide open when the game ticked down to the final minutes.

In fact, with the clock rapidly winding down, the score tied at 66-66, and tension so thick you could ... well, you get the picture ... Jones called out to Howard and cut hard off of a pick by point guard Marcus Zeigler.

"He was yelling 'Wylie, Wylie — get me the ball!'" Howard said. "Then he launched it and I thought, 'Oh, man!'"

The "Oh, man" wasn't all that positive, but Howard was soon dancing down the floor in the other direction.

"Aw, I knew he'd make it," Howard said, laughing off his admitted pessimism. "I know Ski well enough that when he wants the ball that badly, he's got it in his mind that he'll make it. It's like a layup to him."

Jones, who had a game-high 25 points, shared a bit of Howard's skepticism for the first fleeting moments after the shot.

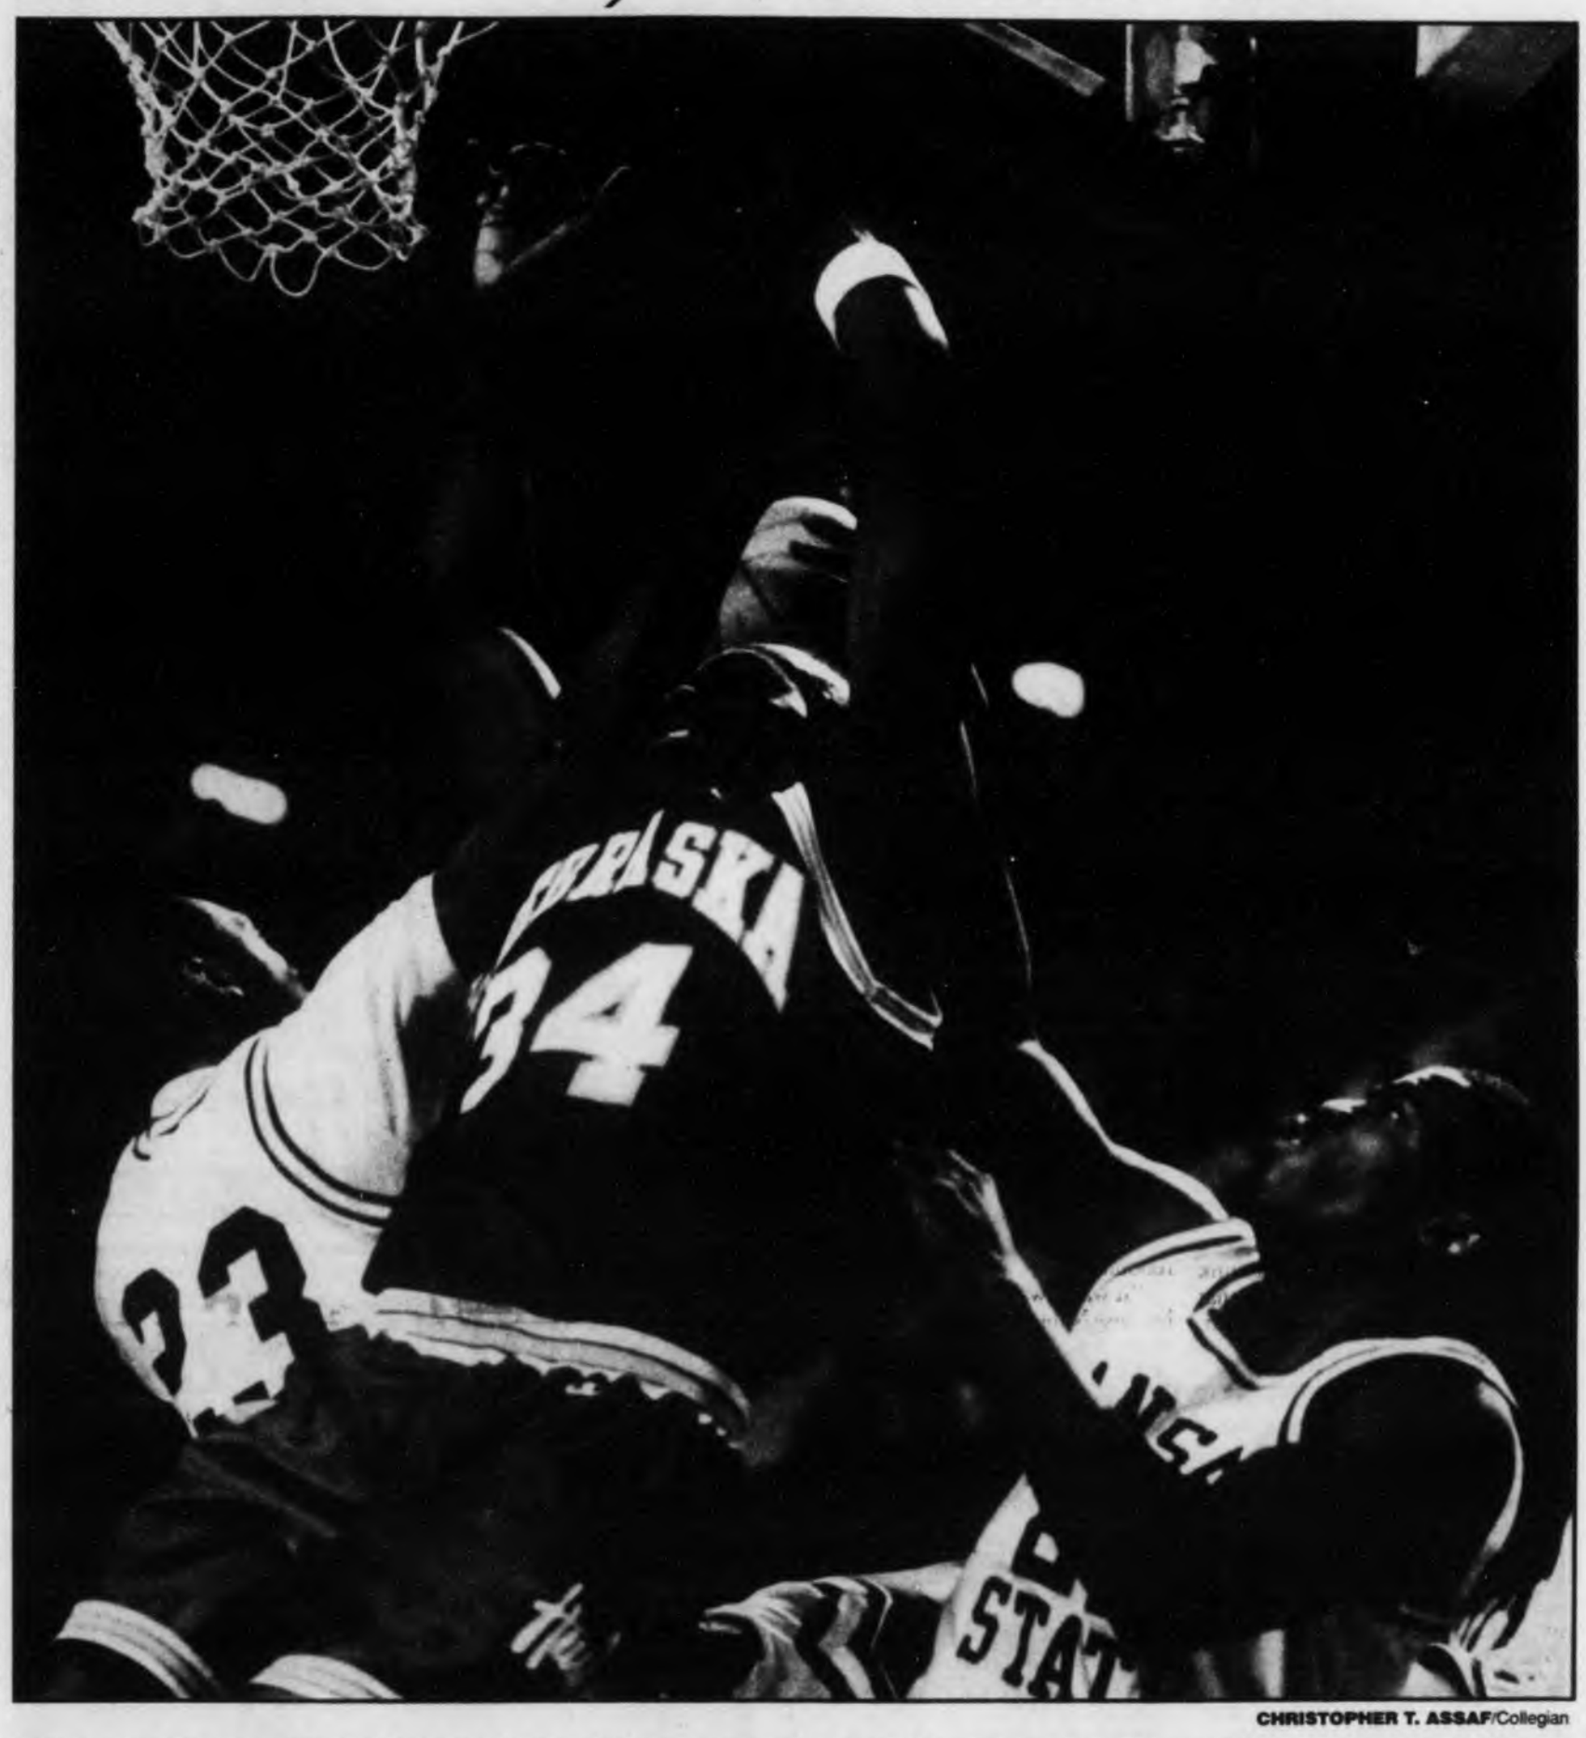
"I was hoping it would go in," Jones said. "I kind of saw the play develop.

"I was set up on the wing and got a good down pick and my man ran right into it. I wanted the ball in that situation."

The fact that K-State, now 12-7 overall and 2-4 in the Big Eight, was able to get the game back to where Jones would have a chance to win it was a testament to the team's newly-found — for one game at least — never-say-die attitude.

"It was a gut check, and for whatever reason, we responded," Altman said.

The reason — or at least part of it — was the cocky nature of the opponent prior to the contest, Howard said.



"You know how it is when someone disrespects you?" Howard asked the media. "It's like someone coming in your room and taking some money off your dresser.

"That's how we felt about the way they were talking about us."

After the game, however, the Wildcats felt more like the thief rather than the victim.

"Together — and that's the big thing — together, we took a big step," Zeigler said. "We were down nine and then 10 and we didn't give up."

BIG EIGHT BASKETBALL

Week of upsets helps show muscle of league from top to bottom

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Any conference that claims to be the best in the land has to expect an occasionally zany week like the Big Eight just had.

Wednesday night, unranked Nebraska knocked off No. 2 Oklahoma State, giving the Cowboys their first loss after 20 victories and taking the luster off Saturday's No. 3 Kansas-vs.-No. 2.-Oklahoma State showdown.

Then, even before the Jayhawks and Cowboys could get down to business Saturday, the Huskers had lost 70-66 to supposedly lowly K-State, which had only one conference victory and whose fans were grumbling about firing their coach.

A couple of hours later, the Cowboys (21-1 overall, 5-1 Big Eight) put the wraps on a foul-filled, turnover-plagued 64-56 conquest of Kansas (17-2, 5-1) and pulled into a first-place tie with the Jayhawks.

Then Sunday, Norm Stewart did something he had only done three times before in a quarter-century as Missouri coach.

He won at Oklahoma. The 12th-ranked Tigers (16-3, 4-2) beat the 21st-ranked Sooners 99-92. It was the fifth straight conference defeat at home for Oklahoma (14-6, 2-5), whose Big Eight home mark dropped to 0-3 for the first time since 1964.

"It's never easy to win here," Stewart said. "I think obviously their ball club, they're losing close ballgames and that makes it difficult for them. If you drop a couple at home, sometimes it's difficult to get back on the right foot again."

The nationally televised Jayhawk-Cowboy match probably did nothing to convince the nation of the subtle beauty of Big Eight basketball. Between them, the two conference leaders had 36 turnovers and 52 fouls. The Jayhawks, stumbling over a weakness that has plagued them before, hit an embarrassing seven of 23 foul shots. Oklahoma State's 27-for-39 free throw performance spelled the difference in a bruising contest variously described in terms relating to warfare and heavyweight fights.

"It was like a war out there," Oklahoma State coach Eddie Sutton said.

"I think they won round one," Kansas coach Roy Williams said, alluding to the rematch in Lawrence scheduled for March 2.

How physical was the battle?

"On a scale of one to 10, I'd say 11," Kansas' Alonzo Jamison said. "Any time you'd go across the lane, you'd get hit. That's how it is in the Big Eight. We knew it would be a physical game."

Missouri's sophomore point guard Melvin Booker had 17 of his career-high 24 points in the first half. Anthony Peeler and Jamal Coleman each had 22 for the Tigers, who had lost at Oklahoma eight straight years.

"This was the only Big Eight arena I had never won in," Peeler, a senior, said. "Now we stay in the conference race and showed we can make things happen on the road."

Colorado and Iowa State did not play over the weekend but meet Monday night on ESPN.

SPORTS DIGEST

▶ U.S. HOCKEY WINS

MERIBEL, France (AP) — Tim Sweeney had a goal and two assists to ignite a four-goal third period Sunday night as the United States overcame a 3-2 deficit and a questionable officiating call to beat better-than-advertised Italy 6-3.

U.S. coach Dave Peterson was credited for getting his players ready for the third period giving them the win.

▶ SKATERS 'FALL' SHORT

ALBERTVILLE, France (AP) — U.S. champions Calla Urbanksi and Rocky Marval and bronze medalists Natasha Kuchiki and Todd Sand had only outside shots to begin with.

They proved it Sunday when the two men missed their double axels and any hope for a gold medal. The pairs finished seventh and sixth respectively in the original program.

▶ IOWA LOSES TO INDIANA

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. (AP) — Damon Bailey scored 26 points as the No. 6 Indiana Hoosiers beat the Iowa Hawkeyes 81-66, protecting a big lead instead of squandering one, as they did a year ago.

Indiana used a 14-3 first-half streak to build a 17-point lead lead of 17 points. But Iowa closed to 41-30 at the break.

▶ TYSON TRIAL CONTINUES

INDIANAPOLIS (AP) — Prosecutors in Mike Tyson's rape trial brought in Miss Black America Sharmell Sullivan and other witnesses Sunday to rebut the defense's claim that the boxer's accuser lusted after his body and his money.

The trial continues today.

▶ DEFIANT DOWNS CONNER

SAN DIEGO (AP) — Defiant extended its winning streak against Stars & Stripes to four in a row Sunday as The America3 Foundation continued its dominance over Team Dennis Conner in the America's Cup defender trials.

Defiant won the second race of the second round by its largest time advantage yet.

INDOOR TRACK

Performances strong in weekend meets

STEVEN ROCK
Collegian

The K-State indoor track team returned home from a pair of weekend meets with three provisional national qualifiers, a qualifier and a new school record in tow.

"I was extremely happy," said track coach John Capriotti of his squad's weekend performances.

Provisional qualifiers are those who didn't reach the national standards that would automatically put them into NCAA competition. These individuals, however, will be given the first nod if fewer than the allotted number of persons reach that national mark.

At the Iowa State meet, the men's 3,200-meter relay team lived up to Capriotti's pre-race expectations and finished first. The quartet of Jared Storm, Jason Goertzen, Randy Helling and Anthony Williams ran the race in a time of 7 minutes, 25 seconds. The national standard for automatic qualification is 7:22. The provisional mark, however, is 7:28, which the squad bettered.

Also performing well at the Iowa State meet was Todd Trask, who ran the 3,000-meters. Not only did Trask beat the provisional-qualifying mark, he broke a school record in the process. Trask ran the race in a time of 8:02.7 and came in fifth in what Capriotti referred to as a highly competitive race.

Another individual whose performance pleased Capriotti was Janet Treiber. Treiber won the women's 3,000-meter run.

"She led the race from start to finish," Capriotti said, "and really did a good job."

Overall, Capriotti was pleased with the team's performance in Ames.

The Nebraska meet landed two high-jumping qualifiers, including one on the national level.

Gwen Wentland's jump of 6 feet, 1 3/4 inches was enough to automatically qualify her for national competition. Wentland's leap was a much-anticipated one.

"It's been something I've been waiting for for a long time," Wentland said. "It was a big meet, and I was glad I was able to perform. I'm just real excited."

Also, a well-rested R.D. Cogswell, who was given last week's meet off, won the men's high-jump competition. Cogswell qualified on the provisional level with a leap of 7 feet 2 1/4 inches.

Each of the two jumpers took first place.

GLOBETROTTERS

From prep also-ran to stardom

Hildreth displays basketball talents while seeing world

PATRICK OBLEY
Collegian

The thought of it made him laugh.

The question Kelvin Hildreth had just been asked was whether or not he was a born basketball talent.

Hildreth explained how he had twice tried out for the John Muir High School basketball team in Pasadena, Calif., and had been rejected both times.

At first, he was too small to make the team. The next year, he was too gangly and uncoordinated after adding four inches to his frame.

"Not at all," Hildreth said, sucking air after a deep chuckle. "Not at all."

Interesting words — considering Hildreth is now in his fifth year as a Harlem Globetrotter.

The difference between prep also-ran and worldwide fame was college. At El Camino Junior College, Hildreth averaged 19 points and nine rebounds a game. At Mississippi State, Hildreth perfected his defensive skills.

Up against the Southeastern conference's top players, he turned in a series of notable performances. During the 1983-84 season, he was the only defender in the nation to hold Akeem Olajuwon to ten points.

At the end of that year, Hildreth was named all-SEC and finished as one of the top-10 free throw shooters in the country.

After college, Hildreth went to the Los Angeles Clippers training camp, but was cut shortly before the season began. And after the Sacramento Kings didn't give him an immediate decision about his chances of joining that team, Hildreth left the United States for Italy.

It was while he was in Italy the Globetrotters gave him a call.

"Yeah, it was kind of cool," Hildreth said. "They told me they would pay for the flight home and I was like 'yeah, that would be great' because I wasn't going to come back if they didn't.

"I got the ticket and I saw it was first class and I said to myself, 'this is a classy organization.'"

At the tryout, Hildreth said the Globetrotter coaching staff wasn't looking for hotdoggers.

"The tryouts are all basketball, no tricks, " Hildreth said. "They want to see if you can play the game. The tricks don't matter, because they know if you are a talent, they can teach you the tricks."

Ever since, Hildreth's life has been hectic. Each year, the Globetrotters average 240 to 260 appearances, with almost all of them coming in a different city.

With all the tricks employed by the Globetrotters, Hildreth said it was easy for people to forget the skills involved.

"When someone in the NBA hits two three-pointers in a row, it makes the highlight film," Hildreth said. "We do that routinely, and the fans expect us to do it routinely.

"In the NBA, no one expects a team to win all of its games," Hildreth continued. "If we lose once, to our fans, it would be the same as if somebody shot Santa Claus."

As for the omnipresent question of whether or not the Globetrotters could compete with the NBA, Hildreth doesn't leave any doubt about his team's talent.

"A lot of our friends that are on the NBA teams come out and see us and when they catch wind of our schedule, they're in awe of us," Hildreth said.

"A lot of people would be surprised to hear me say this, but we can beat teams in the NBA. I wouldn't be telling the truth if I said we could beat the Chicago Bulls, but the other teams, we'd have a pretty good shot of taking them down.

"Our advantage is we play so many games that we've come to know each other and are very cohesive," Hildreth said. "The fans would see that more if we didn't clown around so much, but that's what they want to see and we enjoy bringing that to them."

To hear Hildreth talk about playing serious basketball, not clowning around and falling behind in the score brings out another point Hildreth and his teammates are adamant about.

"The teams we play, like the Washington Generals, are real teams," Hildreth said. "They go out and they play 100 percent against us. They are wanting to win as badly as we do.

"We don't get together before games and choreograph with them what we're going to do. They actually have very talented players. If you look at them, they're actually taller than us.

"To tell you the truth and be very candid, we've been kind of lucky to beat them for so long. There have been quite a few times when we almost didn't pull out a win."

Winning is nice, but it isn't the mission of the Harlem Globetrotters.

"We promote dreams and goodwill," Hildreth said. "Like our motto, we are ambassadors of goodwill to the world.

"When I sat on the bench the first time and watched us play, I laughed my head off," Hildreth said. "But then I realized that if I thought that way, I wouldn't be around too long.

"This organization has done so much around the world and really has laid the foundation for goodwill. Every time I play, it is important for myself, important for Curly, important for Sandy, important for all of us to remember why we are here.

"We are here to make people feel good about themselves. We really like it when crowds come to have a good time."

WOMEN'S BASKETBALL

Jennings scores 18 in Lady Husker win

MARGO KELLER
Collegian

Poor shooting plagued both the Lady Cats and the Nebraska Lady Huskers Saturday at the Devaney Sports Center in Lincoln, Neb.

After a slow start, the Lady Cats couldn't overcome Nebraska's early lead, which culminated in a 76-62 win for the Huskers.

"I don't know how many shots we missed underneath the basket ... I just felt like our team came out extremely flat and pretty much stayed flat the whole first half," Lady Cat coach Susan Yow said. "And, I don't think that Nebraska played the game that they would've liked to have played, particularly in the early goings of the ball game, so ... we are really fortunate that it (the early and consistent Husker lead) wasn't any worse than it was."

The Cats couldn't counter junior forward Karen Jennings' 18 points and 13 rebounds. The Lady Cats knew going in that the 6-foot-2 Jennings would be a menace. The junior forward set a Big Eight record for points in a single game by scoring 48 against the Lady Cats January 21 in Bramlage Coliseum.

Teammates Kim Yancey and Meggan Yedsena each had 16 points for NU, and Yedsena also contributed 10 assists.

For the Lady Cats, Lynn Holzman scored 14 points and had a season-high eight rebounds.

"I'm pleased to see that Lynn Holzman had eight rebounds. I would've liked to have seen a few more rebounds, but ... Nebraska only had nine offensive rebounds for the the game, and that was key for us. It was something we talked about," Yow said.

Besides keeping an eye out for Jennings, K-State concentrated on rebounding.

"It was always a challenge for me because Nebraska has such big girls," Leah Honeycutt said. "So, one of my goals coming into the game was to get as many boards as I could.

"As for my overall game, I'm pretty pleased. We just didn't get over that hump to win the game, but maybe we'll see them in the (postseason) tournament."

The Huskers were able to outscore the Lady Cats 16-7 in the final eight minutes, with Jennings claiming 8 of those points.

Nebraska increased its record to 16-5 overall and 6-2 in the conference. The Lady Cats have a 2-6 Big Eight record and 5-16 overall mark.

Years of eating, drinking make exercise a chore

DAVID FRESE

I was running up the stairs to one of the infinite number of Collegian meetings these vipers put me through here, and when I got there I about had a heart attack.

My chest heaved and my hands shook and sweat formed on my upper lip. "Jesus," I thought, "I'm outta shape."

Remember those days when we were all little high school athletes who thought we'd never die? When we could chase after the cheerleaders and run from the teachers or the pigs all weekend long?

What happened?

I imagine we came of age. Legal drinking age, that is. We took those midafternoon trips down to the Aggie Lounge and drank away our studies and talked about the things we did back home and the things we might do once we were old enough to avoid doing them.

Then there's the possibility that maybe we ate too many Big Classics or mac-and-cheese dinners with a two-liter and a bag of chips in front of the tube.

I go to the Rec Center every once in a while. The Collegian itself has a little intramural basketball team that some of the editorial staff and dang near all the sports staff plays on. We haven't done very well.

The ROTC opened a case of whoop-ass on us two weeks ago. The team we played before did it to us too. It's a good thing we just write about the things that happen in sports and other areas of our interest. I doubt if any of us have the energy to do any of it. It's like that old maxim: "Those who can do. Those who can't, become journalists."

It's possible I could get off what the Japs are calling my lazy American butt and exercise a little more. I've gone to the rec's weight room before, but I get embarassed when my 165-pound frame is being outlifted by a 105-pound sorority woman.

Then, there are the guys there who skip class to do squats and are there any time of day, any day of the week.

I swim like a rock. Running is pain. Playing basketball is no fun when everybody out there gets disgusted with you because you get tired and throw away the roundball six times in a row and nail three airballs. They tend to stop passing you the ball and snicker when you ask if they've got five for the next game.

I guess I'll just be fat. Let those little love handles become a spare tire, and when I'm 60 somebody will have to wheelbarrow me down the halls of the nursing home. Then I guess I'd have an excuse for my, ahem, lack of manliness. Everybody knows nothing grows in the shade.

Then again, maybe I'll bust out of the confines of the this cigarette-smelling newsroom and go running across campus like Carl Lewis, jump the bushes like Michael Jordan, climb the fences like Nitro, dodge the traffic like John Riggins, beat up a few punks like Sugar Ray and run to Aggieville to catch like Canseco the beer the waitress throws to me as I slide onto the barstool for a big plate of Rusty's barbecue.

Comments fire up Cats

MARGO KELLER
Collegian

Askia Jones had more than luck on his side.

After being dubbed the "hapless Cats," underrated K-State — with Jones taking the very visible lead — didn't stop at anything to prove that the Nebraska Cornhuskers couldn't and wouldn't walk away with a win.

Jones' shooting, similar to the Cats' prior performances, improved from mild to hot in this one.

Determined to prove to the Cornhuskers that they were not an dismal team, Ski and Co. came back from a 10-point deficit in the second half to knock off the 'Huskers 70-66.

When it was still anybody's game with seconds left on the clock, Jones pumped in his seventh 3-pointer to give K-State a 69-66 edge it would not again relinquish.

Jones shot 50 percent with nine baskets for 18 field goals attempted, and was 7 for 12 from 3-point land. Five of six 3-pointers dropped in the second half for the 6-foot-5 sophomore from San Antonio, Texas.

"He had a good performance and he shot the ball well, particularly in the second half," Wildcat coach Dana Altman said. "It was sure good to see him play well."

Altman said Jones found added confidence in the second half of the game when he was able to connect on shots from beyond the 3-point line.

"After the first (trey) fell, I felt pretty confident so I just started looking for my next open shot. When the second one went, I really started looking for my shot," Jones said.

Jones improved his 14.9 average per game this season with a team-leading 25 points on Saturday afternoon in Bramlage Coliseum. The game marked Jones's fifth 20-point scoring game and ninth game leading the Cats in scoring this season.

Last Monday against Kansas, Jones led the team with 15 points, but only garnered 39 percent from the field after attempting 13 shots. Within his last five games prior to KU, Jones's highest scoring games were his 10 points at Iowa State and 12 against Missouri-Kansas City. Jones had less than 10 points in games versus Oklahoma, Southern Utah University and Colorado.

"It pissed us off when Coach Altman read an article from a Nebraska newspaper that called us hapless Cats," Howard said of the fire the 'Huskers lit under him and Jones.

Luck was with Jones once again as he made the seventh and game-winning basket.

"I was hoping it went in," Jones said. "I kind of saw the play develop. I was set up on the wing and got a good down pick and my man ran right into it. I wanted the ball in that situation."

NBA

Magic named MVP

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ORLANDO, Fla. — At long last, it was Magic Johnson's day and the Western Conference's All-Star game.

Johnson, after an emotional pregame welcome from NBA All-Stars on both teams, showed no rustiness Sunday from the three-month layoff following his shocking announcement Nov. 7 that he tested positive for the AIDS virus.

Shooting 6-for-7 from the field, Johnson scored 16 of his 25 points in the first 17 minutes of the game.

He had no assists in the first half but nine in the second, when he was scoreless until hitting three consecutive 3-pointers in the final 2:42 to finish 9-for-12 from the field. He earned the Most Valuable Player honor for the second time.

Johnson watched from the sidelines as a 17-0 run near the end of the first half gave the West a 26-point lead en route to a 153-113 victory. It was only the fourth win in the last 13 years by the West.

"Maybe you'll see me back, maybe you won't," Johnson told the fans after being presented with the MVP award. "But I'll remember all these good times this afternoon."

Johnson, named a starter in fan-voting despite his retirement, also plans to play in next summer's Olympic Games and has left the door open to a comeback with the Los Angeles Lakers.

He was the last of the 25 All-Stars announced in pregame introductions. Close friend Isiah Thomas then led the East All-Stars across the court to welcome Johnson back as the sellout crowd at Orlando Arena cheered and gave him a standing ovation.

The West led 79-55 at halftime, shooting 63.5 percent to 45.5 for the East, which went scoreless for 5:40 after a jumper by Michael Adams made it 62-53 with 5:46 left in the second quarter.

John Stockton scored five points and Jeff Hornacek and James Worthy four each during the ensuing 17-0 spree that gave the West a 79-53 advantage.

The West extended the margin to 92-59 early in the third period and the West got no closer than 24 the rest of the way.

The West went on to match the scoring record for a regulation All-Star game. The West won 153-131 in 1961 and two other teams scored 154 points in overtime games.

Johnson led eight players in double figures, including Clyde Drexler with 22 and David Robinson with 19. Michael Jordan scored 18 and Thomas 15 for the East.

Johnson, as was his custom in his previous 11 All-Star appearances, wasted no time putting on a Magic show. He grabbed the opening tip, turned and made a halfcourt bounce pass that was intercepted.

Not much else went wrong for him in the first period as he scored eight points in the first five minutes, including a 10-foot sky hook from the baseline and a fake-pass-and-layup 22 seconds later.

A 3-pointer by Thomas gave the East a 21-19 lead with 6:36 left.

Mind fuels elite athletes

Pyschology plays important role in performers' physical ability, professor says

BETSY BERKLEY
Collegian

Dreams of participating in the Olympics are not realistic for many people, and it often has more to do with psychology than physical capability.

Sports psychologist Edmund Acevedo, director of the center for exercise research, said not everyone can be the athlete he wants to be.

"I look at the psychological characteristics of elite athletes and coaches. I have seen some similar characteristics in elite performers, many of which go beyond the sporting event," Acevedo said.

Athletes are extremely competitive, but not necessarily against someone else, he said.

"Elite performers compete against themselves. They want to better themselves, so they don't necessarily concentrate on beating their opponent," Acevedo said.

"They become performance-oriented instead of win/loss-oriented, and this is the key to their success."

He said each individual works on his or her own physical make-up and characteristics.

First, to become an elite athlete, Acevedo said, a person must be born with the physical ability. Beyond this step, he said, an athlete has to physically train.

"The physical skills can be refined or added to our repertoire of skills," Acevedo said.

For example, he said an athlete might have difficulty shooting free throws for the first five minutes of a basketball game. But, after five minutes, he has no problems shooting them at all.

Acevedo said the athlete needs to get psychologically developed as well.

Mental imagery can help athletes develop from rehearsing and developing strategies.

"This technique can be extremely beneficial," Acevedo said.

"The athletes can use self-talks or goal-setting to help them define what technique is the best strategy for them."

A strategy needs to be developed once a goal has been set, Acevedo said. He said the goal must be concrete, challenging, flexible, realistic, somewhat specific and measurable.

Athletes must have their own individual goals they set for themselves, Acevedo said, and they have to believe in reaching their goals, or they won't be motivated enough to achieve them.

Most importantly, he said the performer must have a commitment every day.

"Athletes have to say it, do it and believe in it," Acevedo said.

Since 1988, Acevedo has worked with coaches. He said he has discovered that goals are many times abused and thrown at an athlete's face for him to believe.

"The problem with goal-setting is the coaches sometimes set goals for athletes, and the athletes never really buy into those goals, or never realize the strategy to reach them," Acevedo said.

Steve Fritz, senior in general business administration, said he believes his coach, Cliff Rovelto, assistant coach for jump and multi-events, helps him attain his goals.

"I make up my own goals, and coach tells me what I can do," Fritz said.

"He has a better idea of what I can do. I'm still learning, so I respect the goal-setting advice he gives me.

"Sometimes, what I say, he thinks is totally outrageous, but on the same token, some of the things he says, I think are outrageous."

Fritz said he sets his goals at the end of each season.

"The goals I make for myself change as the year goes by," Fritz said.

"As each meet gets closer, I sit down with coach, and we decide on my goals and what I need to achieve."

The most successful athletes set goals and know what it takes for them to perform well, Acevedo said.

"They have excellent concentration, self-confidence within themselves, and they think about their sport a lot throughout the day," he said.

Fritz agrees with Acevedo.

"Confidence has a lot to do with my success and performance," Fritz said. "I compete the best when I am rested, and my mind is free.

"As far as concentrating on a certain thing, I don't consciously think about it, but I do have dreams before the days of a meet, so I think about it subconsciously. I try to focus on one event at a time."

Fritz is a decathlete who is preparing for the 1992 Summer Olympics.

"My chances are looking better and better," Fritz said.

Acevedo said good athletes are able to rise to occasions, that is, they perform best in most competitive situations.

"They seem to be consistent in handling their competitive environment like adversity, pain, anxiety and stress," he said.

Athletes can cope with anxiety because there is a tremendous amount of stress and anxiety, he said, but the athlete never sees the sport as stressful.

K-Staters set sights on sun and Spain

Fritz, Schmidt train for summer Olympic trials

TRISHA PERRIGO

As the world gathers around televisions for two weeks to watch the 1992 Winter Olympics in Albertville, France, some K-State students continue training for the summer Olympics.

Steve Fritz, senior in general business administration, played basketball and ran track for K-State. A decathlete, he spends most of his time training for the Olympic trials in New Orleans in June.

"I lift four days a week in the morning and practice six days a week in the afternoon," he said.

Fritz has to place in the top three to compete in Barcelona, Spain, at the end of July.

"It's going to be rough. I was fifth last year in the trials. I'm just hoping everything goes well," he said.

Fritz, 24, said he has plans if he does not make it to the 1992 Olympics.

"I plan to train on through to the 1996 Olympics, and that's probably my better shot if my body holds out," he said.

The decathlon includes 10 events.

The first day, athletes compete in the 100-meter dash, long jump, shotput, high jump and the open 400.

On the second day, the athletes compete in the 110-meter hurdles, discus, pole vault, javelin and the 500-meter run.

Deborah Schmidt, senior in secondary education and K-State javelin thrower, has qualified for the provisionals for the June trials in New Orleans.

To qualify automatically, she must be one of the 24 to throw 176 feet. Currently, Schmidt, has thrown 160 feet, 8 inches.

"I still have the rest of this season to better my mark to qualify automatically," Schmidt said.

Schmidt's supporters said they have confidence in her.

"She'll throw it. In fact, I expect her to throw farther than the standard mark," said Jesse Stuart, assistant track coach in charge of throwing for men and women.

During the season, Schmidt trains with the track team three hours a day each weekday. Schmidt said the hard work will pay off.

"It would be a great experience to throw against all the great athletes who will be there," Schmidt said.

"As for the 1996 Olympics, it depends on how close I am this year, how things go with my career, and if I have the time," she said.

CAMPUS

Police, escorts work to ease safety concerns

Big Eight Schools share similar tactics to ensure security

MARY SPRENKEL
Collegian

Among the Big Eight Conference universities, similar methods provide safety to people on campus, and the improvement of these methods is ongoing.

Nighttime escort services are provided for students at all Big Eight schools except the University of Missouri and the University of Kansas.

Ronald Mason, MU police chief, said students tried an escort service, but one never really got started.

"We do provide night shuttles, and we have lighted pathways," he said.

A few of the campus police departments assist in the escort service by screening applicants, providing radios and helping with the costs for publicity.

Some students, however, stay out of the escort service for liability reasons.

"We carry the phone numbers for the service, but they (student volunteers) do it on their own," said Charles Beckom, K-State Police chief. "We haven't had any problems."

All campuses have emergency phones, but departments would like to have more. Some universities are in the process of upgrading the phones, but costs are high.

"The phones have a use — a valued use. But the interpretation of the use is misleading," Beckom said.

He said the phones are to communicate potential dangers to the campus police.

"We would like to see the phone used before the emergency," Beckom said.

The University of Colorado offers an additional safety feature for students who have been previously harassed.

Known as the tactical alarm system, victims contact the campus police through hand-held radios.

Capt. Dave Evans of the CU police department said a student can rent a radio for as long as needed.

"It's expensive, but worthwhile. It has more of a therapeutic value, allowing students to still do things on their own," Evans said.

Every police department in the Big Eight works with students and groups in teaching safety techniques and self-protection.

Most of these programs are given during student orientation or to groups about a particular subject, such as date rape.

A hands-on, self-defense class is taught at the University of Oklahoma for students, faculty and staff.

Neil Stone, OU police chief, said the class is not a martial arts class, but more about escaping from dangerous situations.

In 1990, Oklahoma State had the lowest number of campus crimes. K-State was second lowest.

Oklahoma State campus police representatives and Beckom both said they believe the type of student body at these universities is the reasoning for these numbers.

"The majority of our students come from a rural background with a traditional upbringing. They are more friendly," Beckom said.

"There's not a fear of many things," he said.

Beckom said students are opening the lines of communication with the department by expressing concerns and interests.

He said he would like to see this continue.

"If we don't know what needs to be done, we will continue to muddle along as we are," he said.

BIG STEVE, in high school you were the quarterback of the football team, but now you're the quaterback of our hearts. You've been great in both roles, but you've been working with All-Star receivers. We bow to you, King Steve. Get off!- Lee-Lee, Scott, Marlo and Kat-House Nance. (Roll over- you're 21!)

HERMIT, YOU are going to have to kiss a pig sometime. Love B.S. and Squirrel.

TO THE Alpha Chi Omega party dates: Boxers and bowties we told you to wear, but when we showed up you complained, "No Fair!" We were dressed as bikers from head to toe. While you were in your underwear and bow. You toured our house and saw all the sights. You knew this would be a wonderful night. We danced and partied and sang lots of songs. The night was perfect- nothing went wrong. Now that you've partied with the Alpha Chi's, you think back and wonder, "why did they lie?" If the name of our party is what you desire, it's Lyre, Lyre, Pants on Fire." Thanks for an excellent time. Love the Alpha Chi's.

women should have the option to do the same, safely and legally, because of what they might do otherwise.

"Before, when I couldn't find a place to have an abortion, I thought of all the ways I could damage myself to have one," she said.

If the law doesn't protect women, Kathy said, women will start protecting themselves.

As the Supreme Court prepares to hear arguments on a restrictive Pennsylvania abortion law, and the Kansas legislature considers new abortion bills, pro-life and pro-choice forces in Manhattan both doubt the court will use this case alone to overturn the broad protection Roe v. Wade decision gave to abortion.

"I think that Roe v. Wade will not be overturned in one case. I think there will be a series of cases," said pro-life activist Alan Oberley, senior in chemistry education.

Oberley has been involved with Manhattan and campus pro-life groups for about two and a half years. He coordinated last fall's "Life Chain," a silent demonstration along Bluemont Avenue, and helped blockade Wichita abortion clinics last summer during Operation Rescue's "Summer of Mercy."

Pro-choice activist Justine Crawforth, sophomore in business administration, also said she doesn't think the court will use the Pennsylvania case to reverse Roe v. Wade, but she agrees with Oberley that abortion rights for women like Kathy are continuing to erode gradually.

The responsibility of regulating abortion will fall back on each state, Crawforth said, as it was before 1973.

"It will revert to the states to decide whether abortion is legal in that state, plus when, why and how," said Crawforth, who is also president of the campus group Voices for Choice.

In "Decoding Abortion Rhetoric: Communicating Social Change," published in 1990, Celeste Michelle Condit wrote: "The primary impact of the national, judicial decision in 1973 was the homogenization of accessibility to abortion through the elimination of the crazy-quilt patterns of disparate state laws."

Simply put, Roe laid down the law of the land: abortion is within a woman's right to privacy.

"What Roe v. Wade said is the woman and her doctor should decide, not the woman and her doctor and the politicians," said Sandra Coyner, director of the women's studies program at K-State.

Coyner was in college in the 1960s, when the push for legal abortion was gaining momentum. She said she knew many women her age who risked their lives and breaking the law to obtain an abortion. Many of them were Texas college students who went to illegal abortion providers in Mexico.

"That was very scary. I knew people who did that," Coyner said. "'Scary' meant you might die."

The amount of guilt, fear and pain these women went through to have an abortion greatly impressed her, she said.

The Roe v. Wade victory was a surprise to her and the women's movement in general, she said, and it made sense of the complexity of state laws.

"To me, it was like a burst of light: 'Of course. It's simple.' If we lose Roe v. Wade, it won't be simple anymore," she said.

Already, the Supreme Court has returned states some leeway in deciding their own abortion restrictions — most recently, in a 1989 decision that revived the Pennsylvania law currently under inspection.

Even with an uncertain majority for either side, and a possible tilt toward the pro-life side, the court probably won't overturn Roe this time because the case doesn't deal with rights, said pro-life activist Matt Vajnar, senior in agribusiness.

"It won't happen. It's not a strong enough statute. It really doesn't deal with the constitutionality on the right of an abortion," Vajnar said.

In essence, the abortion debate is all about rights. Whose take precedence: the mother or the fetus?

In Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court decided the woman's rights came first. During the case, Condit wrote, the justices said the Constitution provides rights specifically for people "born" in the United States — therefore, they said, unborn fetuses are not constitutionally protected.

Roe, then, came to be a case of a woman's right to privacy. Condit says this was the basis of the court's final decision.

"Women had a fundamental right that both prevented intrusion upon their lives by the state governments and justified the interference of the federal judiciary in state law," Condit wrote.

Vajnar called the ruling an illogical extension of that right.

"Abortion is not within a woman's right to privacy," he said.

But Crawforth said it's hard for her to believe a government has the power to give and revoke rights. With Roe v. Wade, she said, the court was merely acknowledging a fundamental right.

"I believe Roe v. Wade was the first time nationally that women were recognized as having the right to their bodies, to own their bodies, to control their bodies," Crawforth said.

Rights go hand-in-hand with responsibilities — that's at least one thing both sides agree on. Of course, they differ on what those rights and responsibilities are.

Oberley said people must associate responsibility with choice. Using the example of a mother who abandons a child, he said, an act that may seem liberating can be irresponsible.

Though the pro-choice philosophy contends the choice, not the abortion itself, is the liberating factor, Vajnar disagreed.

"You have to define what the choice is," he said. "If you're going to define a choice and totally leave out the fetus, you're not being truthful."

Coyner said a woman should not make the decision to continue or terminate a pregnancy lightly. Responsibility doesn't end at abortion or at the child's birth.

"Women's right to control their own bodies is tied to the responsibility," she said. "You can make these decisions, but you have to be responsible for them."

A little over a week after her abortion, Kathy still said for her, there was no other choice. Primarily, she said she did it because of the rape, but other factors figured into her decision: financial difficulties, humiliation, foregoing her education in order to have a baby she did not want.

In short, she said, she was not ready in any way to bring a child into the world.

"Was it fair? I don't know the answer," Kathy said, knowing she doesn't have all the answers.

After the abortion, she said she did experience some twinges of guilt. Maybe the problems she was facing really weren't that bad, she said she thought. Maybe her fetus could have developed into a person after all.

But then Kathy said she thought about being in the same situation again. And she said she'd take the same action.

"I didn't want to go through the abortion, to take other people's money. But I felt forced to have it by the situation," Kathy said. "If I don't want to use my body to carry someone else, that's my choice."

played at UNT for five years. However, he first performed at the festival as a student from Emporia State University.

Steinel said he was impressed with the bands he judged at the festival.

"There were a lot of talented young people," he said.

Four bands received total ratings of I, which was the highest rating a band could get. These bands were Concordia Junior High, Marysville High School, Shawnee Mission East High School and Manhattan High School.

A free concert featuring jazz bands from Wyandotte High School, Kansas City (Kan.) Community College, K-State and the University of North Texas followed the festivals.

Ben Rohrer, K-State music instructor, is the coordinator for the festival and director of K-State's Concert Jazz Ensemble, which performed during the evening concert.

Rohrer said every high-school and community-college jazz band is invited to the festival.

"Basically, it's their choice to whether or not they want to pay the $75 fee to perform during the daytime festivities," he said.

The festival is not a money-making event. Rohrer said.

Horoscope comes true with lost cat's return

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — Michelle Marshall had almost given up finding her cat, Cruiz, who had been missing from her home in Salina for more than a week.

Then she read her horoscope last Sunday: "Lost possessions turn up in the oddest places."

"Now, I don't believe in horoscopes or anything," Marshall said, "but I turned to my husband and said, 'That means the cat.'"

Meanwhile, in Goldsboro, N.C., a woman named Treva Gray was caring for a nameless gray cat in her office at Jackson Moving and Storage Co.

A driver for North American Van Lines had discovered the cat while unloading furniture in Alabama. There was no one there to take care of the frightened animal, which had spent seven days in the back of the 18-wheeler, so the driver fed him, put him on the passenger's seat, traveled on to North Carolina and left him with Gray.

Last Monday, after tracking down his owner through a number on his Saline County rabies tag, Gray called Marshall at work, and told her she thought she had her cat.

"Oh, you're kidding!" Marshall cried. "Well, where are you? I mean, I can come get him."

"Miss Marshall, we're in Goldsboro. It's in North Carolina," Gray answered. "It's 1,500 miles away."

Marshall's 6-year-old cat, whom she had named for his wayfaring ways, had hopped into the back of a neighbor's moving van and ended up in North Carolina. The trick now was getting him home.

"I called around to airlines to see what it would cost, and I couldn't believe it," she said. Ninety-eight dollars for the ticket, $15 for a veterinary exam, $25 for a rabies shot, $30 for an air-certified cage.

Two days later, a headline ran on the front page of the Goldsboro News-Argus: "Stowaway cat arrives from Kansas."

When Nicolas was in Memorial Hospital, there were two other children on his floor with RSV. When he left four days later, there were 10.

"As a mother, you don't want to overreact with every sniffle," she said. "But as one parent to another, I would say if your child seems to be more sick than he would be with just a cold, it never hurts to call the pediatrician.

"They can tell you over the phone whether or not you need to bring your child in."

Sharon Dierking, Amanda Arnold Elementary School and Bluemont School nurse, said the virus does not seem to be affecting school-age children.

She said she believes it is because it usually is more rampant among infants and very small children.

Rose said he has no answer as to why RSV cases have increased.

Union looks for alternative to profit from tobacco sales

JENNIFER NICHOLS
Collegian

Last year, the K-State Union made $27,000 on sales of tobacco products.

Jack Sills, director of the K-State Union, said $7,000 of that was profit.

Since the Union stopped selling tobacco products Aug. 1, the date set by the Union Governing Board in a vote to make the Union smoke-free, it is now looking for ways to regain the money lost from tobacco sales.

He said it seemed hypocritical to the board to sell tobacco products after making the Union smoke-free.

"We are looking for ways to generate a dollar and at the same time satisfying the needs of the students and University population," Sills said.

Sills said more canned soda is being sold at the information counter. This semester, the cooler behind the counter was enlarged so that more refrigerated products can be sold.

Union Assistant Director and Business Manager Jack Thoman said canned fruit juices and bottled water have been added to the cooler since they have been requested by students.

Sills said the tobacco ban has affected the Union in more ways than just sales.

"There's obviously people that are addicted to smoking that were around a year ago that are coming in less frequently or not at all. There's also people who are allergic to smoke who are coming in here now."

Sills said that he is not surprised at the board's decision to make the Union smoke-free. He said he thought the Union was one of the last buildings on campus to become smoke-free.

"It is a trend nationally," Sills said of the decision. He said other public buildings in the area were doing the same thing.

Thomas said he was surprised that the board decided to make the whole Union smoke-free. He thought smoking would be limited to certain areas.

Students who do want to smoke are still able to get cigarettes on campus.

Sills said students can still get them from vending machines in five of the residence halls: Ford, Moore, Marlatt, Edwards, and Haymaker. Moore Hall Governing Board has requested its machine be removed.

Annette Batchelder, sophomore in math and political science and president of Moore HGB, said the request is financial.

Batchelder said Moore does not get any profit from the machine, but it is responsible for paying for any damages, such as cigarette burns in the furniture.

DEMOCRAT NUMBERS GROWING AT K-STATE

MITCH HIXSON
Collegian

Although Kansas has historically been a conservative Republican state, it appears fewer K-State students are associating themselves with the Republican Party today.

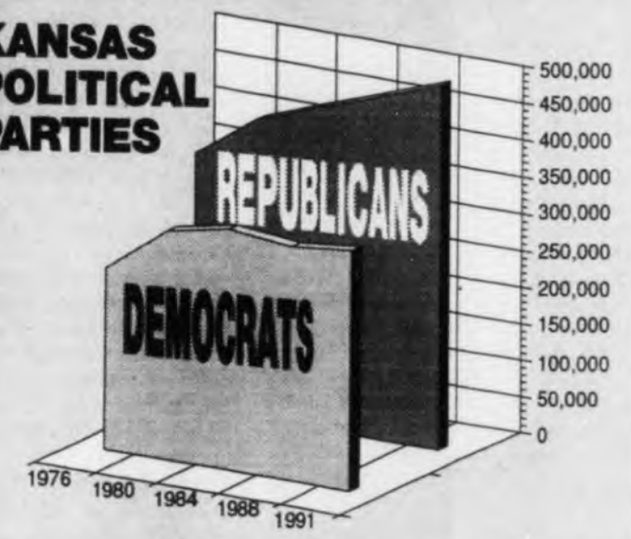
Joseph Unekis, associate professor of political science, said he has seen a change in the ratio of Democrats to Republicans in his classes the last few years. A larger percentage of his students identify themselves as Democrats than 10 years ago, he said.

"I've seen a movement away from more Republican orientation," he said. "I haven't seen a rise in the number of partisans, just a slight shift to the Democrats side, in the sense that it's not overwhelmingly Republican anymore."

Jeff Bottenberg, president of K-State College Democrats, agreed with Unekis.

"The campus is transitionally Republican, but there is more and more of a gray area," he said.

Also, Unekis said a good portion of the student body today would label themselves as independent, rather than to choose one party or the other.



"This trend of not identifying with a party is one of the most interesting political phenomenon of the last 25 years," he said. "Today one-third of the electorate across America, refuse to identify with a political party. Thirty years ago, almost everyone would have sided with a party."

This trend could create a problem, however, because to vote in a primary election, a person must choose a party preference to get a ballot. This brings up the question of how do people choose a party with which to affiliate.

Unekis said there is no easy answer.

"Most people are predisposed to be Republican, [or] Democrat, in part because of their family, peer group or community," he said. "In Some communities it's almost considered tradition to be a Republican or a Democrat."

Unekis said such aspects definitely affect a younger person's decision. But real familiarization, and true interest in politics usually does not affect students until they reach voting age.

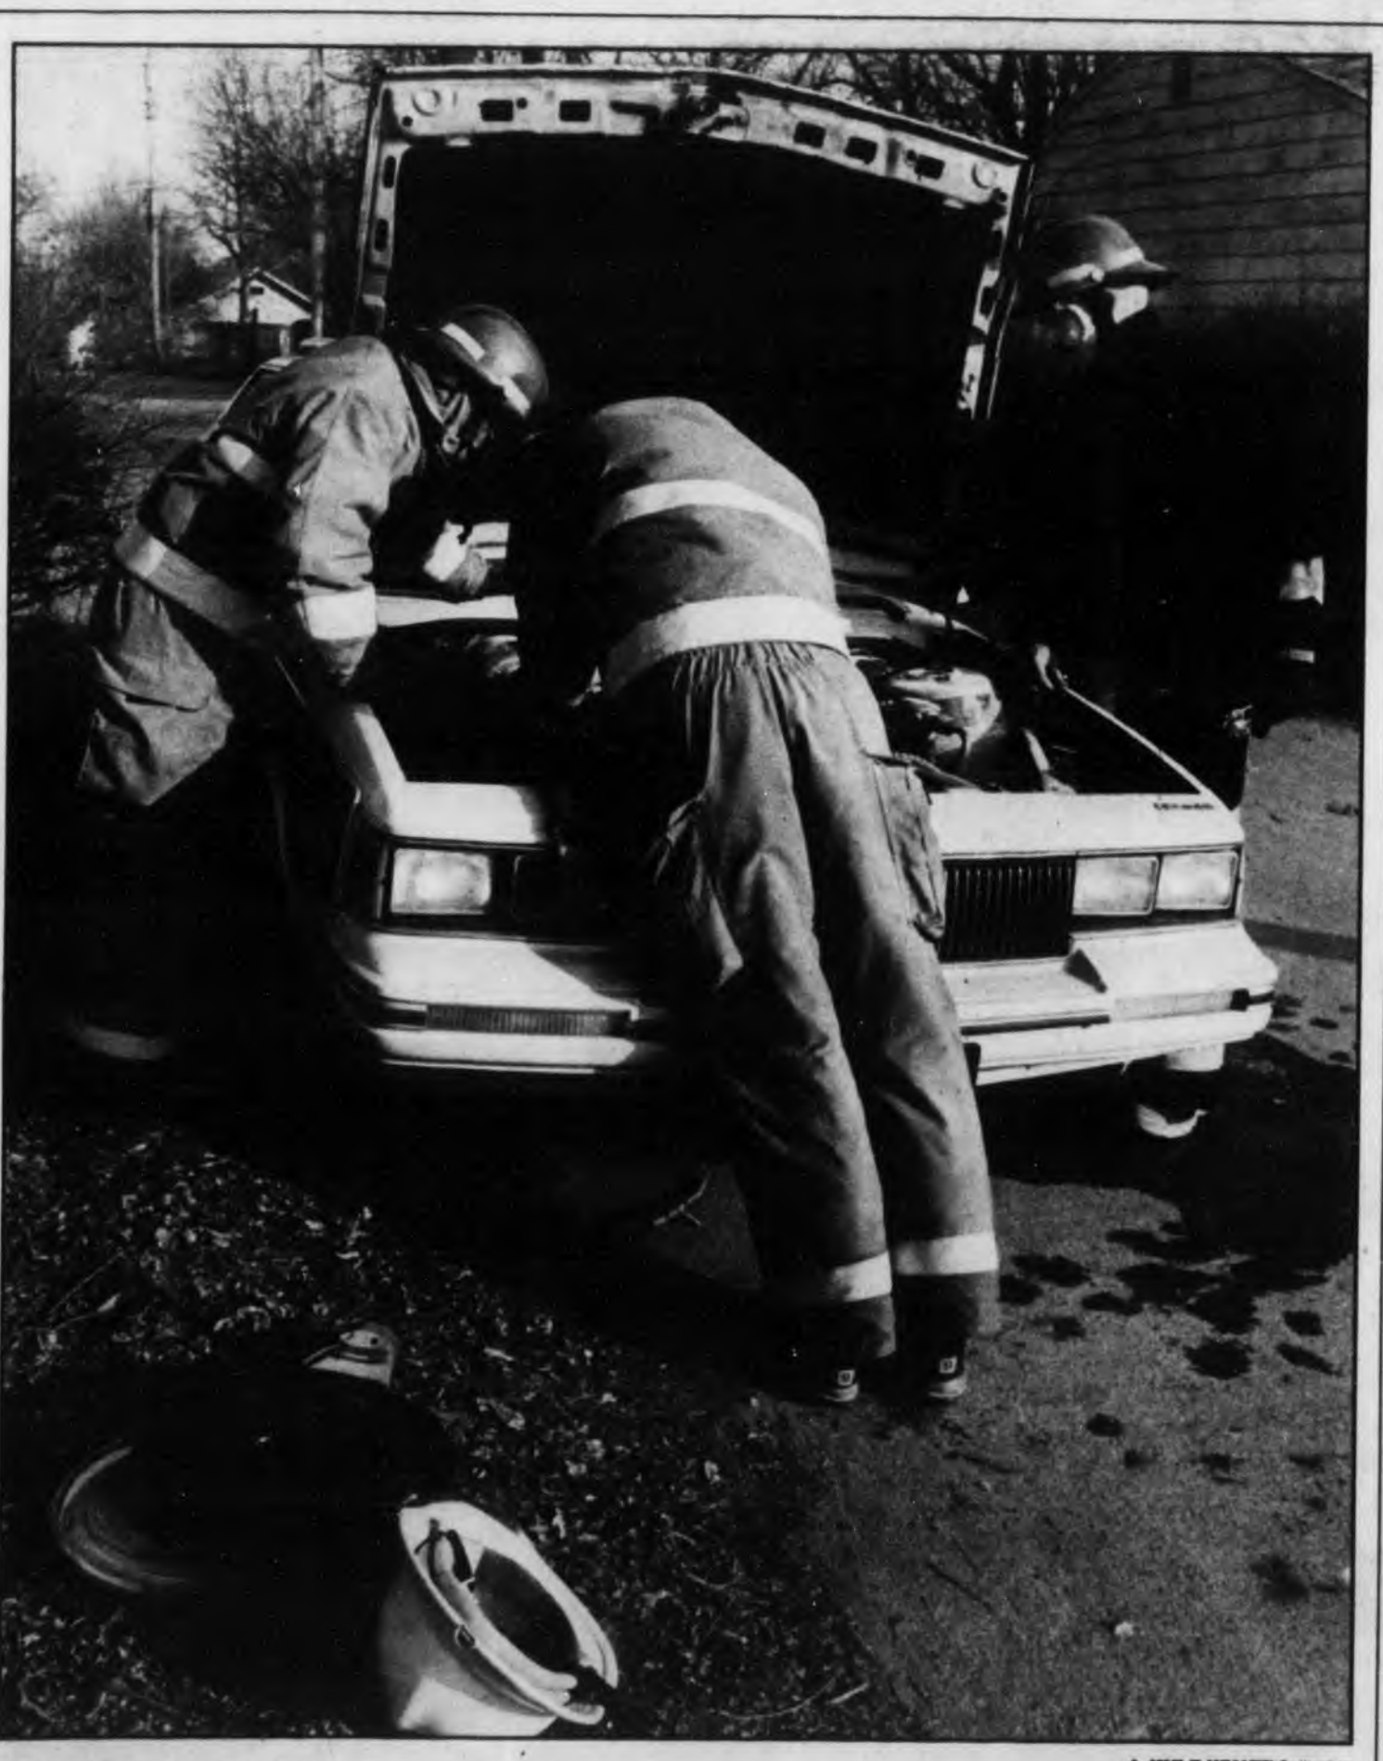
Laurie Johnson, assistant professor of political science, said economic circumstances may cause some people to change political affiliation.

"I think it's based a lot on the pocketbook," she said.

Johnson said, for example, many people in the lower-income brackets tend to support the party they feel can help them the most. This usually means the Democratic party. Rich, upper-income brackets, however, are primarily associated with the Republicans.

Robert Swanson, executive director of the Kansas Democratic Party, said the recession has propelled economics back into the lead as the most important factor when choosing a party.

"I think it's the key, but usually most people start out by being what their parents were," he said. "I was taught by my parents that the Republicans were rich, the country-club elite, and everyone below that was a Democrat."



Johnson said many people today vote more on a candidate's personality than the party that stresses the principles they by which they live.

"For some people it's just a gut instinct of which party will do more for them," she said. "Voting has become very materialistic."

Johnson said people who vote a straight ticket, voting for all Republicans or all Democrats, are often criticized, but that usually shows the person thought about which party was more closely associated with their ideals and morals.

'Roots' author Alex Haley dies of heart attack at age 70

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — Alex Haley, the Pulitzer Prize-winning writer whose book "Roots" told the story of the black experience in America and inspired people of all races to search for their ancestors, died Monday. He was 70.

Haley, whose other works included "The Autobiography of Malcolm X," died of a heart attack at a Swedish Hospital, a hospital spokeswoman said .

Haley had been scheduled to speak Tuesday at the Bangor Naval Submarine Base near Bremerton, said Liz Beauton of the base's human resources department.

Survivors include Haley's third wife, My, and a son, Bill.

Haley won the 1977 Pulitzer Prize for "Roots: The Saga of an American Family," the gripping story of his family's monumental journey from Africa to American slavery and ultimately to freedom.

The result of 12 years of research, the book blended fact and imagined detail in tracing Haley's family back six generations to Kunta Kinte, who was kidnapped from Gambia, West Africa, in 1767 and shipped to this country as a slave.

The book sold 6 million hardcover copies and has been translated into at least 37 languages. The ABC television miniseries adapted from the book drew 130 million viewers over seven nights in January 1977, then the largest program audience ever.

"He was truly a gifted person who wrote a book that was monumental," Benjamin Hooks, NAACP executive director, said.

Haley's warmhearted and rich descriptions of his ancestors' lives set off a wave of interest in genealogy, lasting long after the book faded from best-seller lists.

"He was enormously important, probably more important than most of us really realize," said Lamar Alexander, U.S. education secretary. "His importance will be lasting. It wasn't 15 minutes in the sunlight. It'll last forever."

In an interview Feb. 4, Haley said he was still getting reactions from "Roots," a decade and a half later.

"To this day, people, particularly African-American people but white people as well, will just totally, unexpectedly ... walk up and not say a word. Just walk up and hug you and then say 'Thank you,'" Haley told radio station WKYS in Washington, D.C.

The book made Haley rich, generating a steady stream of royalties and making him a fixture on the lecture circuit.

It also attracted four plagiarism suits. Three were dismissed, but Haley settled out of court with author Harold Cortlander, who charged Haley lifted a 100-word segment from his novel, "The African." Haley said the passage was in something somebody had given to him.

Haley, the eldest of three sons, was born in Ithaca, N.Y., Aug. 11, 1921. He was raised from infancy in the west Tennessee town of Henning by his maternal grandmother.

His father, a college professor, was studying in the North, and his mother, a grammar school teacher, died young.

"I find that Southern-born people, white or black, tend to be better raised than people from other sections," Haley said in a 1988 interview, "Grandma taught me like that."

For example, he said his grandmother would not have approved of four-letter words or explicit sex scenes, so "Roots" didn't have any.

Haley graduated from high school at 15 and had two years of college before enlisting in the Coast Guard as a mess boy in 1939.

He began his writing career on Coast Guard ships during World War II, first penning love letters for shipmates, then working on manuscripts. The Coast Guard created a special position of chief journalist for him in 1952.

He did much of his later writing aboard cargo ships, booking passage several times a year to escape telephones and speaking invitations.

Haley retired from military service in 1959 and began full-time freelance magazine writing.

His first book, "The Autobiography of Malcolm X," published in 1965, sprang from a series of Playboy interviews Haley conducted with the black Muslim leader.

His first book after "Roots" was a novella, "A Different Kind of Christmas," about a son of a wealthy southern plantation owner who undergoes a moral conversion and joins the Underground Railroad to help free slaves.

Last month, Haley announced he was giving up his farm near Knoxville, Tenn., to devote more time to writing. He had been working on a book about the town of Henning.

Professor given grant for watercolor work

A K-State professor and a Manhattan resident were recently recognized by the Kansas Arts Commission.

The KAC awarded Margo Kren, associate professor of art, a $350 professional-development matching grant to pursue her visual art career in watercolor work.

Mary Doolittle of Manhattan was hired by K-State's Cooperative Extension Service as Rural Arts Circuit Rider. The position is funded by the KAC.

Margo Kren

Mary Doolittle

Bob Burtch, public information coordinator for the KAC in Topeka, said the grants were started a couple of years ago to help artists explore new areas and stages in their artistic development.

A panel appointed by the governor and consisting of 12 Kansas residents evaluates the artists' qualifications.

Kren said she submitted past watercolor works and drawings, and an application and a resume.

Quality of work, project budget and geographic location are considered in granting the funds, Burtch said. The KAC tries to distribute the money to artists from a variety of areas.

Fourteen Kansas artists were awarded matching funds between $100 to $500. The KAC's budget is set up through the Kansas Legislature. The commission then decides how the funding will be distributed.

"When an artist is preparing to make a big change in their work, acrylics to watercolors for example, and has many years of productivity behind them, they are more likely to get the funds to help pursue their ideas," Kren said.

The KAC's mission is to pass on state and federal funds to artists and art organizations. The Manhattan Art Council and the Sunset Zoo Cool Cat Festival have both received aide in the past.

The KAC also supports two campus publications: University Literary Magazine Review and Kansas Quarterly.

Kren said she was looking forward to using the grant money.

"The money will aid in purchasing supplies and equipment to produce larger watercolor paintings," she said.

Doolittle, whose position with Extension is funded by the KAC, has the responsibility of interacting with rural communities in Kansas.

Rural communitites turn to Doolittle when they face a challenge to bring arts programming to their area. She is there to tell the citizens about arts programming and art organizations.

For example, if a community wants to hold theatrical performances or start a community chorus, Doolittle helps the rural communities put together grant proposals to present to the KAC. The funding received could pay for a script for a play, costumes or operating expenses.

When a community is interested in visual arts, a painter may be brought in from K-State to a senior citizen center. The grant could pay for a series of lessons. The art could then be mounted in an exhibition for the community to view.

"Oral history is another art category," Doolittle said. "Currently, a grant is being requested for a community that wants teenagers to get together with senior citizens and record their history stories. Then the teenagers will transcribe the recordings and place the book in the public library," Doolittle said.

Doolittle is also working as the regional rural arts conference coordinator for a conference in Abilene March 27-29.

"Kansas was chosen by the National Endowment for the Arts to host a regional conference, which is a great honor for the state," Doolittle said.

Violence up after Desert Storm

Murder, other crimes increase
9 percent in Riley County in '90-91

KIP BEASLEY
Collegian

The recent stabbing of a K-State student, topping off a series of violent crimes in the area involving Fort Riley soldiers, has increased student awareness about violence in Aggieville.

The series began in September when a K-State student was murdered while working at a Junction City convenience store.

Weeks later, a student was shot in the leg in Aggieville. And in November, a woman's body was discovered at Fort Riley.

"There's been an obvious increase in violence — more than just your normal get-drunk trouble," said Mike Toepffer, Riley County Police Department officer and freshman undecided.

"From appearance," he said, "the more violent crimes occurring around Aggieville are involving military people, rather than students.

"They are coming to Aggieville prepared for trouble, bringing guns and knives, whereas the normal student doesn't come to Aggieville looking for problems."

David Hubbard, chief of physical security and crime prevention at Fort Riley, said there has been an increase in soldiers toting weapons after the Gulf War.

"On a 5-year basis, crimes at Fort Riley have declined, although after Desert Storm we had a 20-percent increase within a three-month period with people carrying guns and weapons," he said. "That increase could be attributed to Desert Storm, but we don't know for sure."

Statistics show aggravated assaults in Riley County decreased in 1990, but have been increasing lately, said Capt. Allen Raynor, investigations division commander at RCPD.

Between 1990 and 1991, the county experienced a 9-percent increase in part I crimes — murder, rape, robbery, assault, theft and auto theft, Raynor said. He said in the past year there had also been an increase in Aggieville street fights leading to injuries.

"This is a trend towards being a problem, but a 9-percent increase is nothing to be alarmed about," Raynor said.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

Globetrotters to play in Bramlage tonight

KEITH LEFF
Collegian

The Harlem Globetrotters will join K-State in its celebration of Black History Month.

The Globetrotters will perform at 7:30 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum.

Charlie Thomas, Bramlage director, said this is not the first time the Globetrotters have been to Manhattan.

"They've been here before, and they love to play in college towns," he said.

Thomas said the show is a fun, entertaining event for the whole family.

Joe Anzivino, general manager of the Globetrotters, said this is the team's 66th year of touring together.

"The team usually tours nine months out of the year and starts training camp the first of September," he said.

Anzivino said on an average, the organization signs one or two players a year.

He said some of the players are rookies and some like Sweet Lou Dunbar, the team's chief showman, have been with the Globetrotters for 14 years. Anzivino said there has been a woman on the team for eight years.

Fans can expect the classic trademarks of the Globetrotters like the rubber band on the basketball trick and the old water bucket routine, Anzivino said.

He said people who have seen the show in the past bring their children.

"These people know what is going to happen, but they enjoy watching their children become surprised," Anzivino said.

"Our team loves to play, and it shows," he said.

V.I.P. tickets can be purchased for $15, with no discounts accepted. Tickets may also be purchased for $12.50, $10.50 and $9.50.

Tickets may be purchased at a two-dollar-off discount for children under12 and adults over 60.

Half-off discounts can be obtained at the point of purchase by presenting both end flaps from a Bounce fabric softener box or the net-weight statement from Cheer laundry detergent.

Neighbors oppose plan for duplex complex

Concerns lead to rejection by Urban Planning Board

PAM FRAHM
Collegian

A group of neighbors has joined forces to oppose a planned development of duplex units at the intersection of Kimball and Browning avenues.

Bo Newsom, developer from Lawrence, is seeking rezoning for the land on the northwest corner of Kimball and Browning avenues to allow construction of a large duplex development.

At the Manhattan Area Urban Planning Board meeting last Monday evening, the board voted 6-1 to recommend the city commission reject the Planned Unit Development.

More than 100 people attended the meeting to express their opposition to the development. Testimony started about 7 p.m. and almost lasted until midnight.

Linda Ferguson, member of the planning board, said there were several reasons the board opposed the development. The concerns included the excessive density of the plan, insufficient parking and water drainage problems.

"At this point, the neighborhood, along with the church, is at odds with the developer. We hope that something can be worked out that everyone can live with," Ferguson said.

Chuck Lubbers, member of the group opposing the development, said the planning board's decision reflects many of the problems with the development that were concerns of the surrounding neighborhood.

Newsom's proposal is to build 61 buildings with 2 duplex units each on the vacant lot. Each unit would have at least 3 bedrooms. Because the city would allow up to four unrelated people to live in each unit, this project could add close to 500 people to the area.

The group fighting the development has cited several reasons for their opposition.

Nearly all the surrounding area is residential, single-family housing, and the group believes the proposed development would not fit into the neighborhood.

The group is concerned about the added traffic on Kimball and Browning avenues, particularly because school children must cross these streets while walking to and from Marlatt School.

The group is also worried the number of children who might live in the development would add to school crowding.

Drainage is already a problem in the area, and the opponents believe the development may make it worse.

Iowa caucus inaugurates wide-open Democratic race

Native senator Tom Harkin only candidate who actively sought votes

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DES MOINES, Iowa — Sen. Tom Harkin looked homeward for victory Monday in Iowa caucuses that inaugurated the wide-open 1992 Democratic presidential sweepstakes.

His rivals skipped the contest altogether, pointing instead toward next week's primary showdown in New Hampshire.

Harkin said he was aiming for 60 percent of the caucus vote and a showing strong enough to provide momentum to his struggling New Hampshire effort.

Republicans were waiting a week to test the conservative challenge to President Bush. The Iowa GOP cancelled its traditional presidential preference poll, leaving New Hampshire to go first.

Uncommitted Democrats looked like Harkin's biggest threat. The other Democrats in the race — Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton, Nebraska Sen. Bob Kerrey, former Sen. Paul Tsongas and former California Gov. Jerry Brown — made no effort even to compete for second place.

That made Iowa a one-candidate show — a rarity since Jimmy Carter used the caucuses in 1976 as a launching pad on his way to the White House. Customarily, candidates have lavished months of campaigning and tens of thousands of dollars in television advertising in the state.

The absence of candidates in Iowa meant New Hampshire voters will render the first meaningful verdict on the nominating races, and on the various prescriptions for economic revival that have emerged as the dominant issue in the race.

Monday night's caucuses are the first step toward selection of Iowa's 49 delegates to the Democratic convention, where 2,144 votes are needed to secure the nomination. But at this early stage of the campaign, it wasn't delegate strength the candidates were after, it was headlines and momentum.

"We need to come out of Iowa smoking," said Harkin, who campaigns as the only "real Democrat" in the race. "We need to do it right."

His rivals spent caucus day in New Hampshire, where the polls indicate a tight race between Clinton and Tsongas, who served one Senate term from Massachusetts. Kerrey, Harkin and Brown trail in the pre-primary polls, which suggest a large undecided vote with a week to go.

On the Republican side, neither Patrick Buchanan nor David Duke made a move against Bush in Iowa. But neither the White House nor the state GOP was in the mood for any surprises, and the presidential preference poll was scrubbed.

Even Harkin's overall effort was minuscule compared with caucus campaigns of the past. He spent about $250,000 to open a campaign office and recruit volunteers in about 2,000 of his state's 2,166 precincts. He ran no broadcast advertising, though, and his only concerted campaigning was a three-day blitz in the final weekend.

Harkin's campaign themes center on an appeal to old-line liberalism that sells well to the hard-core party activists. In addition, Harkin had long and close ties to labor, peace and other activist groups that carry influence in the caucuses.

The New Hampshire campaign shapes up as a struggle for survival among the Democrats, and a Buchanan-Bush contest.

Buchanan, a conservative commentator who depicts the president as a failed conservative, told an audience in Nashua he hopes for a strong New Hampshire showing.

COLLEGIAN OPINION

TEXTBOOK PRICES

"I understand how it seems, but we're not trying to rip people off. We want to provide the necessary items at the lowest possible price."

– Kay Farley, K-State Union Bookstore Manager

EDITORIALS

Students should share textbooks, not purchase them

Textbooks are too damn expensive, and despite what the publishers and bookstores would have us believe, there is something you can do about it.

Someone's making a whole lot of money off of unsuspecting, poor college students and no one's talking.

Bookstores say they aren't making money from the sales. The books cost more for them each year, and their costs go up. Publishers costs go up, too. And don't forget about the various middlemen who handle the books on their trip from the publisher to the shelves.

Bookstores say what students forget is that textbooks are only a small percentage of their educational costs. And they are vital. What would students do without them, they say.

First of all, $200 or more a semester is one-fourth of the cost of tuition. That's not a small percentage.

And apparently many students are doing just fine without textbooks. Bookstores are experiencing a high rate of return of new books to publishers because students are refusing to buy the high-priced books.

Good for them.

Unfortunately, there are many classes you can get a decent grade in without ever opening the textbook, just as there are some classes you can conquer by only reading the book and never going to class. That's just a fact.

And sometimes you buy a whole slew of required books, only to find out the professor will only get to the first few, or will only make you read a couple of chapters out of one.

Even better is when professors try out textbooks on you, never to order them again. Or when they decide to change editions on a semesterly basis.

Enough said. The "bitch list" could go on forever.

The point is that if the publishers, professors and bookstores can't do anything about the skyrocketing textbook prices, the students should. And they can.

Organize book trades or used-book sales in your living groups, campus organizations or academic majors. Those poor business majors with their $60 new-edition-every-semester accounting books could band together and break some retailers' hearts.

Share books with friends and roommates. Or call up someone you know who took the class in the previous semester and intervene before the bookstore does.

Or, if you want to be really radical, just don't buy the book if you've heard from someone who has taken the class that you won't need it. Common sense says you would never spend $30 on a hard-back Stephen King book you plan to just leave sitting on your shelf, never to be touched.

They say their hands are tied. Let's help untie them.

WHERE DO THE SUNFLOWERS ROAM?

ROBLIN MEEKS

"Gather ye sunflower seeds* while ye may ..."
— Robert Herrick
(*misprint)

Kansas is the "Sunflower State," is it not?

I remember as an 8-year-old scratching through buffalo grass with my three-toed hand plow like a farmer in debt, coaxing my grocery-store-bought seeds out of their envelopes and into wet earth. I had always wanted to plant a garden.

I staked off what I thought looked like a particularly fecund coffee table-sized square of my back yard along the neighbor's fence and out of our well-worn kickball diamond. (Come to think of it, anyone who visited my living room at the time would surely remember that my family's coffee table was more oval than square, but who ever heard of a circular garden? My family was never one for coffee either.)

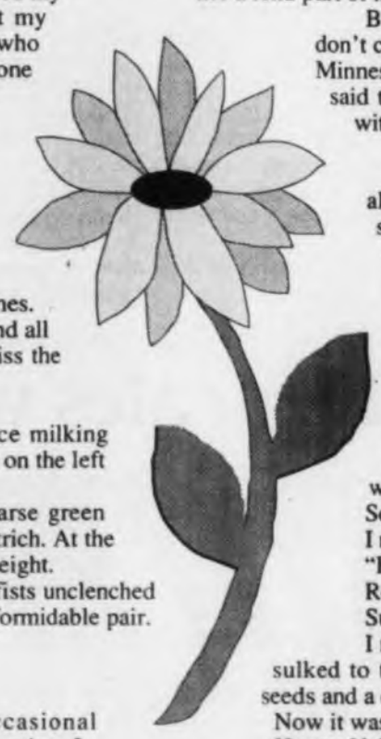
I had a grand plan. Four rows — one consisting of morning glories, two of various vegetables. The front row was reserved for my pride and joy.

Three sunflower seeds.

Not the eating kind where you split the shell and lap out the salt until the sides of your mouth are chafed. Not the kind that you used to spit moist husks into dirty styrofoam cups during little league games. Not the kind that your friends dared you to chew chaff and all without gagging. Not the kind that if you sometimes miss the meat in the center it doesn't really matter anyway.

I'm talking about the planting kind.

Of these three magic seeds, definitely worth a nice milking cow in my opinion, two-and-a-half plants grew. The one on the left wilted after just over a week. I did all I could.



The other two, however, daily stretched their coarse green stalks upward, each growing thick like the neck of an ostrich. At the top, a tight green fist seemed to be waiting for the right height.

The two plants grew over eight feet tall before the fists unclenched into two unbelievably large blooms. They were quite a formidable pair. I had no doubts as to how the flower got its name.

Soon bumblebees came to pollinate the centers.

The centers then filled with seeds.

I enjoyed watching the birds (even an occasional meadowlark) pull seeds from my sunflowers' toothy grins. I imagined myself climbing up the stalks to sit with the birds and gather seeds for my mother, father and brother. I never did.

Toward the end of July, the petals had completely fallen and the heads had begun to yellow and droop. By August, they had doubled over. By September, the buffalo grass had retaken what it had lost, and a good mowing or two by my father left the patch looking like the rest of my back yard.

I've never tried to grow sunflowers since.

This Friday being St. Valentine's Day, I wanted to give the woman I deeply care about, who unfortunately lives about two states to the north, something that I find beautiful. I headed into a local florist late last week with this memory on the edge of my mind; I thought that by giving her a Sunflower, I would be giving her a fond part of myself, and as well, Kansas.

But, the florist told me that flower shops in Kansas don't carry sunflowers. I asked her if they were available in Minnesota (although that in itself should be a felony). She said that she didn't know of any place that stocked them with any regularity. They were too out of the ordinary.

I explained to her that in New York City, a place where there are a precious few gardens, almost every deli/grocery in all five boroughs sells sunflowers — albeit smaller, watered-down versions — for about $2 apiece, cash and carry. She was unmoved.

I asked her if she even wondered where all the sunflower seeds chewed by children in the world came from. She didn't.

I also asked her if she thought it ironic that a person — a native Kansan, mind you — couldn't walk into a local flower shop in the Sunflower State and pick up a sunflower. All she could say was: "Sorry."

Sorry?

I might just as well start eating nothing but rye bread.

"How about some nice roses?" she offered.

Roses?

Sunflower thoughts won't fit into rosebuds.

I reluctantly picked another kind of flower to send and sulked to the nearest convenience store for a couple bags of seeds and a dirty styrofoam cup or two.

Now it was official: nothing in life is assuredly as it seems.

Happy Valentine's Day, Yen, deep like a sunflower, tall like a sunflower.

CLASSES MAKE ME THINK

EVE WILSON

"When will I ever use this again?"

Many people ask, "When will I ever use this again?" in reference to material they go over in their classes. I used to be that way, but several classes have made me take notice of who I am and the things I do. You could say they've made me more self-aware.

For instance, I am very argumentative. Don't get me wrong, I don't argue just to make people angry or just for the sake of arguing. I also don't argue when I know that I am wrong. But I will argue on just about any subject, as my poor fiance will testify.

But even while arguing, I do listen very well. Even though I may seem at times to be off in another world, be assured I'm soaking up what you say and the manner in which you say it. I would also rather listen to people talk than talk myself in most cases. I also listen for contradictions to previous statements.

On that wavelength, in order to catch those contradictions I must rely on my memory. Unfortunately, I am plagued by selective-retention problems, or more plainly, I only remember certain things. Fortunately, for the most part I remember the good things, not the bad.

I'm becoming less judgmental as I mature. I've done enough "bad" things in my short lifetime to keep me from being the "perfect" person. I have made numerous mistakes, some of which will affect me for the rest of my life. Luckily, none of these is of a legal nature. However, not everyone is so lucky. Because I've realized these things, I know fundamentally I don't have the right to judge anyone.

Work is one of my main "driving forces." Sometimes I do too much; sometimes I do too little. Right now, from my fiance's and my family's standpoint, I do too much. They say I never take time to rest mentally and physically. I say I'm not doing all the things I need to for the campus and community.

Monday through Friday there is work (secretarial, KSDB-FM 91.9 and Collegian related) and class which total a minimum of 51 hours a week. If I study the suggested three hours per class, I'm left over with 17 hours of sleep for five days. Saturdays are usually for me to enjoy, but Sunday is just another work day.

I have very high expectations. That goes for myself and others. Nothing is ever good enough; we can always improve on whatever we do. I don't like to see people settle for second best, and I expect myself not to either, though I often do.

Something major I learned was that very often I lack self-esteem. It took someone very close to me to help me see it. Even though I thought I was doing well in that aspect, I really wasn't. I continued to put myself down so others can't hurt me when they may try to. I have also been known to deny to myself what a great person I am and that I have achieved some outstanding things.

Since grade school I've been characterized as a mean and very insensitive person. After hearing that enough, you bet I believed it. Well, since I'm getting teary eyed thinking about it, I guess you could say I've realized how wrong it was to believe something like that about myself.

I try to be realistic when people ask something of me. That is, I avoid making promises I can't keep. Sometimes this keeps me from making any kind of commitment whatsoever, and I really get frustrated when others do that. But I'm going to take it to heart now that I can't be all things to all people; I can't please everyone all the time.

I apologize because this column is extremely self-centered. But that's another thing I've found out — I apologize too much. If given a chance, I would take the blame for the world's problems because I haven't found a way to solve them.

But I guess the most important thing is that all of my experiences, even in classes I thought were worthless to me, have made me think. I treasure the ability to learn different thinking skills and thought processes.

That will be my criteria for each class I take from now on. It won't matter to me whether or not I will use the exact procedures I have learned later in my life. It will only matter if the class will make me think. Hopefully in your future choice of classes you won't take the "easy" one. Take the one that will make you think.

▶CONSTITUTION GRANTS FREEDOM FROM RELIGION

Editor,

CAMPUS CRUSADE FOR CHRIST. What is it with these guys? Every time I turn around there is something new that I am not allowed to do. This group's latest evil event, which the general public is not allowed to partake in, is watching the movie "Henry and June" just because it has a wicked rating of NC-17.

I challenge this group to watch the movie before deciding, on its merits, whether or not it should be considered "pornographic" and banned. If after examining the movie they find it pornographic, violent or just a bad movie, then I suggest that they don't recommend it to their friends. May I remind this religious organization that the first amendment in the U.S. Constitution gives them the freedom of religion, as well as giving me the freedom FROM religion.

▶AMERICA NEEDS TO BE SAVED FROM DUKE'S RACISM

Editor,

This is just a note to inform you that there may be a few people out here who feel Kansas has taken a giant step backwards. Your Feb. 5 editorial, "Kansas makes wise choice allowing Duke's primary bid" brings up some rather graphic thoughts for those of us in the minority.

Am I the only person in Kansas that remembers exactly what is in his past? Correct me if I am wrong, but didn't this person lead the Ku Klux Klan a while back? Just so that we are on the same page, the KKK is not a church group. This is not a group that is fighting for some exploited cause. This is a group that has historically fought against the premise on which this country was built, equality for all.

This is supposed to be a competent nation, or at least that's what I was raised to believe. This person's philosophies, personal background and history are the exact reasons that he should be left out of the primary April 7. Duke has spent a great deal of his life ignoring the rights of minorities. As a reward for this, you feel he has a right to run for president?

I thought we studied history so it would not repeat itself. We have documented the injustices of Hitler in Germany. We have successfully contained a maniac named Saddam Hussein in Iraq. Who will save the minorities from a RACIST Duke in the United States of America?

ACADEMICS

Owning computer asset for school

Students want systems to suit them at lowest possible price

VICKY SAENZ
Collegian

Students are discovering that owning a computer can be an academic asset, but they may not know what to look for in one.

"There are a lot of people not sure of what they need. What we try is to get them in the right direction," James Lund, owner of Fox Business Systems, said.

Bridgit Barglett, owner and manager of Alpha Computers, said students come in all the time for advice. She said they are looking for a good computer at the lowest price.

"The computers in higher demand are the 386 systems and the desktops," Barglett said.

The newest item on the market is something called the notebook, which is the smallest computer available, Barglett said.

"They're like portable laptops," she said.

The 286 with a 40 megabyte hard drive costs around $1,200, while the 60 megabyte costs $1,800.

"The notebooks are without a question a cost-effective computer," Barglett said.

Lund, on the other hand, said the computer most demanded by students is the AUVA, an IBM compatible.

"This computer is modularly upgradable. Because of the student's tight budget, we mostly sell the 286, but the 386 is also in demand," Lund said.

He said the AUVA meets all the workload requirements to use it throughout school.

"You can handle work and home applications without any problems," he said.

Edith Gutman, graduate student in regional and community planning, said she believes one of the most important things is for the computer to be IBM compatible.

"I don't really care about the brand," she said. "There are good deals you can find with unknown brand names."

Dale Withroder, junior in nuclear engineering, recently bought an IBM 386 from a company in Omaha, Neb. He said he talked to a lot of friends and went around to various shops before buying his computer.

"I only considered buying an IBM compatible. I guess that the school network had a big influence on the decision," he said.

The increased demand for computers is reflected at the K-State Union Bookstore. The Union Bookstore sold between 250 to 300 computers in the last fiscal year, and it has already sold as many within the last six months.

Tom Maier, computer buyer at the Union Bookstore, said the two most popular brands are the Zenith 386SX, which costs $2,300, and the Macintosh LC 386SX, which costs about $1,800.

The Macintosh has a higher education pricing scheme, Maier said, and it offers an eight-year loan for buying computers.

He said Zenith does not offer a scheme, but it does offer a substantial discount of 40-percent on computer purchases.

Software preferences are extremely varied, and students look for packages that fit their needs.

"I'm looking for software that covers my career demands. What I'm more interested in is a word processing package and graphic software," Gutman said.

Kansas's primary ballot filling

COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Kansas presidential primary ballot is filling up with many well-known candidates as the Feb. 12 filing deadline approaches.

Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton filed Friday to add his name to the Democratic ballot for the April 7 primary election.

Clinton is the third major candidate for his party's nomination to pay the $100 filing fee and get on the ballot. U.S. senators Bob Kerrey of Nebraska and Tom Harkin of Iowa have already filed.

Also, former California Gov. Jerry Brown added his name to the list, becoming the fourth Democrat to file in Kansas.

The other major Democratic candidate, Paul Tsongas, a former U.S. senator from Massachusetts, is expected to file before the deadline.

On the Republican side, President George Bush recently filed, and David Duke had previously filed.

Patrick Buchanan, the other major Republican candidate, is expected to file soon.

Netters swept in weekend matches at Notre Dame

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

The K-State tennis team was looking for tough competition this spring to improve their own game and take the program to another level.

Now they have to learn to deal with the harsh wind that can blow into the players' faces when battling for respect on that upper level.

The Wildcats returned from a three-match weekend trip to South Bend, Ind., without a win, losing 7-2 to Miami of Ohio Friday, 8-1 to Notre Dame Saturday and 6-2 to Drake Sunday.

Cats coach Steve Bietau said the final team results do not make him happy, but he still saw some good signs in the players' games.

"Sure, we're disappointed with the results and we're not excited about the record," he said. "If we hadn't had a good effort from the players, I would be disappointed with the matches. But that's not the case."

In the first match Friday, K-State faced Miami of Ohio, which was somewhat of a stranger to Bietau.

"They were better than I thought they would be," he said. "They were stronger in the top positions."

Bietau said he saw nothing really surprising in the loss.

"I thought the effort was good for the most part," he said. "I was pleased with the toughness Martine Shrubsole showed."

Besides Shrubsole, who lost to Laurie Vetter 6-1 and 6-2, Bietau was satisfied with the performances of Karin Lusnic and Michèle Riniker, who both won their games to collect K-State's two points.

"Karin played better than she did against BYU," Bietau said. "Michèle is playing very well and with a lot of confidence right now. She knows what she's to do when she goes on the court."

To be able to win against Miami of Ohio, Bietau said, the team would have had to play well in almost every position.

"We had close matches in singles and doubles," he said. "But they were deeper and our injury situation hurt us a little bit."

No. 25 Notre Dame was the opponent Saturday. Despite the clear 8-1 loss, the team showed some character, Bietau said.

"I thought we played pretty hard in that match," he said. "We all were very competitive."

However, Riniker was the only player who could transform her effort into a win, beating Laura Schwab in two sets 6-2 and 6-2.

"Michèle dominated a good player in that game," Bietau said.

Schwab was one of the nation's top-50 players as a junior last year.

Riniker was also pleased with her matches this weekend.

"I'm satisfied, and I think I am on the right track now," she said.

Riniker said the most important win for her was her third match, against Tisa Vail of Drake, in which she won in three sets.

"That was the game I really got challenged," she said. "I played the right balls in the significant moments. She's a good player who I've already played twice. The wins against her give me a lot of self-confidence."

Generally, the Drake match was much closer than the two previous, as Bietau said he had expected.

Besides Riniker, Suzanne Sim won her match in two sets against Darcy Maat. Mareke Plocher and Neili Wilcox fell just short in their attempts to win, both losing in three close sets.

Through the additional losses of Lusnic and Shrubsole and the forfeits of the remaining doubles matches in order to catch its flight, K-State remained winless on the spring season.

Bietau said if anything, the netters need to develop more confidence and not be afraid of making mistakes.

The best example of that was Lusnic, who lost both matches after her win Friday.

"She's a little bit unsure about herself on court right now," Bietau said. "Because of that, she's not playing a strong match every time out yet."

TYSON TRIAL

Tyson found guilty; faces up to 60 years

ASSOCIATED PRESS

INDIANAPOLIS — Former heavyweight champion Mike Tyson was found guilty Monday of raping a Miss Black America contestant who said he lured her to his hotel room and overpowered her.

Jurors deliberated about nine hours before reaching their verdict in the case, which threatens to end the rags-to-riches career of one of the most prominent athletes of his generation. Tyson was the youngest heavyweight champion ever, and had been planning a comeback in a title fight against champion Evander Holyfield this spring.

Tyson, 25, sat staring straight ahead impassively as the verdict was read. He was found guilty of all the charges he faced — one count of rape and two counts of criminal deviate conduct.

The judge said Tyson could remain free on $30,000 bond and set sentencing for March 6. He faces up to 60 years in prison.

Tyson and his entourage, including his promoter Don King, left the courthouse without making any comment.

The victim was not in the courtroom when the verdict was returned. She had been in court earlier during closing arguments.

Tyson's trial followed, and was often compared to, two other cases in which relatively unknown women said they were wronged by powerful men — Clarence Thomas and William Kennedy Smith.

Tyson, whose stormy relations with women have been the stuff of tabloid headlines for years, offered an unusual defense — that he was a crude womanizer whose accuser must have known he wanted sex.

He maintained he was blunt about his desires from the outset, and they had sex with her consent.

"I didn't violate her in any way," he testified. "She never told me to stop, or I was hurting her, nothing."

His accuser, at 18 the youngest pageant contestant, testified the boxer had overpowered her in his hotel room, pinned her on a bed with his forearm, stripped her, raped her and laughed while she cried in pain and begged him to stop.

"I said, 'Please, you're hurting me! Please, stop!' And he started laughing, like it was a game," she said.

The trial spanned nine days of testimony and featured nearly 50 witnesses.

The incident took place last July 19 before the Miss Black America pageant.

Besides the accuser, crucial prosecution witnesses included an emergency room doctor who said the woman suffered injuries consistent with rape, and a chauffeur who said the woman appeared scared and shaken when she emerged from Tyson's hotel.

Eleven pageant contestants testified for the defense, which ironically sought to portray Tyson as lewd and obsessed with sex. Many described Tyson's use of crude, sexually explicit language.

Some also said they heard the accuser make comments about his body, intellect and net worth, bolstering a defense argument that she was a gold-digger who concocted a story of rape out of anger over being treated as a one-night stand.

Others told a version of events closer to that of the accuser, who said she never heard the lewd remarks and never made any suggestive remarks herself.

The woman said she met Tyson at a pageant rehearsal. Later, he called from his rented limousine and asked her to go sightseeing, she said.

Tyson said the two kissed in the car, but his accuser said she rebuffed his advances. She said they stopped at Tyson's hotel presumably so he could make a phone call or pick up his bodyguard. She said they were watching television and talking casually when Tyson told her, "You're turning me on."

The woman said she went to the bathroom, and when she emerged Tyson was sitting on the bed in his underwear.

"I was terrified," she said. "I said, 'It's time for me to leave.' He said, 'Come here,' and grabbed my arm. I said, 'Stop! Get off me!' I tried to fight. It was like hitting a wall."

Blair becomes first U.S. gold medal winner

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ALBERTVILLE, France — Bonnie Blair brought her own cheering section all the way from home and then gave them something to cheer.

Blair turned melting ice into Olympic gold Monday, defending her 500-meter speedskating title on a soggy French track and finally putting the United States on the board after three disappointing days.

The 27-year-old Blair, who had not acknowledged her wildly enthusiastic fans during warmups, raised her arms above her head after the race, stripping off her hood and waving as she skated another loop of the track.

Blair's time of 40.33 was well off the world and Olympic record of 39.10 that she set on the indoor track in Calgary in 1988, but it was easily enough to bring the United States its first medal at the Albertville Games.

Ye Qiaobo, 27, of China, took the silver in 40.51. Christa Luding of Germany, who was Christa Rothenburger when she dueled Blair for the gold and the world record in Calgary, won the bronze here with a time of 40.57.

Blair, of Champaign, Ill., kissed and hugged long-time rival Luding as they stood on the platform after receiving their medals. Blair earlier turned to face the huge contingent of American fans, holding her gold in one hand and waving with the other.

Single Senegal skier survives sinister slope

VAL D'ISERE, France (AP) — Meet Lamine Gueye, kamikaze skier.

Gueye, half of Senegal's team at the Winter Olympics, can boast a finish on the twisty, bumpy La Face de Bellevarde downhill course — a low finish, for sure, but better than the DNFs (did not finish) strung up by such stars as Leonhard Stock and Marc Girardelli.

"The first time that I was at the top, I was quite worried," Gueye said. "It's madness, that run."

Johnson's game magic for all

ORLANDO, Fla. (AP) — Magic Johnson's remarkable All-Star game performance should silence talk that he will make only a token appearance in the Olympics.

It also could renew speculation that he'll be able to return to the Los Angeles Lakers.

Johnson had 25 points, nine assists and five rebounds in 29 minutes of the Western Conference's 153-113 victory Sunday. It was his first game since retiring on Nov. 7 after testing positive for the AIDS virus.

"I asked Magic at halftime if he was still the property of the Lakers," the Suns' Jeff Hornacek said. "If not, we'd like to sign him for the playoff run."

Johnson, however, wasn't talking about making a comeback beyond his planned appearance in the Olympics.

"This was like the perfect ending to the story," he said. "I've been trying to write this story all week, and it was like I was at my typewriter and I said, 'Here's my ending. Period.'"

But Isiah Thomas, one of Johnson's closest friends, said he wouldn't be surprised if Johnson came back full-time.

"There's talk about this being his last game. I'm not so sure about that," Thomas said. "I'm just going to wait and see. As a friend, my responsibility is to support whatever he decides to do."

Before the game, Johnson said, "No matter how well I play, I can't start thinking crazy like I can resume my career next week. I have to keep a grip on things."

Johnson said he's not prepared to rate where Sunday's game ranked on his list of highlights.

"I'm a guy who rates everything later," he said. "Hopefully, I'll get a chance to play in the Olympics and win a gold medal.

"I like to take walks in the park by myself, where no one can bother me and I can think. I'm sure I'll rate this one later on doing something like that."

The other All-Star players and coaches also will rate the game high on their list of highlights.

"I was glad to be a part of history in the making," said Clyde Drexler, who scored 22 points and got two votes to Johnson's nine in the MVP voting. "I was glad to be on the same court with him."

Johnson capped his near-perfect day with three 3-point goals in the final 2:42. The last 3-pointer was the final basket of the game, with 14 seconds left.

"It was a storybook ending," Chris Mullin said. "Magic hit the shot, gets the MVP and we win the game. It was perfect.

"Why did that last shot go in? Because he's Magic, it's as simple as that."

IMMIGRATION

Haitians experience violence

U.S. authorities investigate, say no evidence exists to prove persecution

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Haitians who escaped their homeland twice since last fall told U.S. authorities about reprisals they suffered after their forcible return by the Coast Guard, immigration officials said Monday.

The acknowledgment of the claims of persecution came as the Bush administration again stated it had no documented evidence of reprisals against repatriated Haitians.

State Department press officer Richard Boucher said officials had investigated claims by four Haitians who said they were persecuted.

"We've not found information to corroborate these stories. We don't have evidence that people are being persecuted upon going back," he said.

Secretary of State James Baker last week insisted there was not a single documented case of a repatriated Haitian being persecuted or targeted after their return.

But human rights activists released reports from interviews with Haitians, which told of soldiers murdering and kidnapping people after they were delivered to the docks in Haiti.

Arthur Helton, a New York lawyer specializing in refugee affairs, said 41 Haitians who told such stories last month to the Immigration and Naturalization Service were cleared to travel to this country to press political asylum claims.

INS spokesman Verne Jervis couldn't confirm the figure but said a number of Haitians who recently escaped by boat told stories of abuse during the period after their forced return last fall.

These Haitians are being allowed to apply for political asylum because INS interviewers found their stories had at least enough credibility to merit further review, Jervis said.

More than 15,000 Haitians have fled the strife-torn Caribbean nation since a Sept. 30 military coup toppled the democratically elected government of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide.

More than 10,000 have been detained at the U.S. Navy base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, following their interception on the high seas by Coast Guard cutters. The refugees were interviewed there by INS and U.N. officials.

The INS has cleared 3,912 Haitians to apply for political asylum, Jervis said. Most faced political persecution because of their support of Aristide, he said.

Two Coast Guard cutters returned 510 more Haitians to Port-au-Prince Monday, bringing to 1,599 the number of refugees forced back to their homeland since the Supreme Court lifted an injunction against repatriation Jan. 31.

Meanwhile, lawyers for Haitians armed with the reports of refugee interviews conducted by U.N. officials asked the Supreme Court to issue an emergency injunction to stop the forced repatriations.

Miami attorney Ira Kurzban charged that during lengthy court battles this year over repatriation, the Bush administration had withheld information that Haitians had been persecuted following their return last fall.

"For the State Department to claim they didn't know what was going on creates a lie within a lie, and I guess they think the American public is simply stupid," said Kurzban, who represents the Haitian Refugee Center.

Helton said the interview reports show an astounding discrepancy between credible evidence of persecution and bland assurances from the State Department that returned Haitians need not fear harm.

"The department is blind to the emerging evidence," said Helton, director of the refugee project of the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights.

Helton's organization asked Attorney General William Barr in a letter to suspend repatriations until the Bush administration determines it is safe to return Haitians.

Refugees told U.N. officials that soldiers questioned them after their return to Haiti and came to their homes.

One repatriated refugee, Thomas Similus, told U.N. officials soldiers arrested him the same day his cousin, Lifete Similus, who had also been repatriated last fall, was taken into custody.

Before his own arrest, Similus said he learned his cousin's bullet-riddled body, dressed in military clothes, was found on a street in the town of Cite Soleil.

After his arrest, Similus said he managed to escape the national penitentiary by dressing in women's clothes smuggled into the prison, the report said.

REVIEW

There's still some good country music

DAVID FRESE
Collegian

So many people are jumping on the Garth-Clint-Alan-Dwight-George country music steam train, it's becoming harder to take country music seriously.

Sure, there are those folks who've been fans of those wunderkinds since before the country zeitgeist blew through the nation in the past year, but there's still too many wanna-be's out there for my taste.

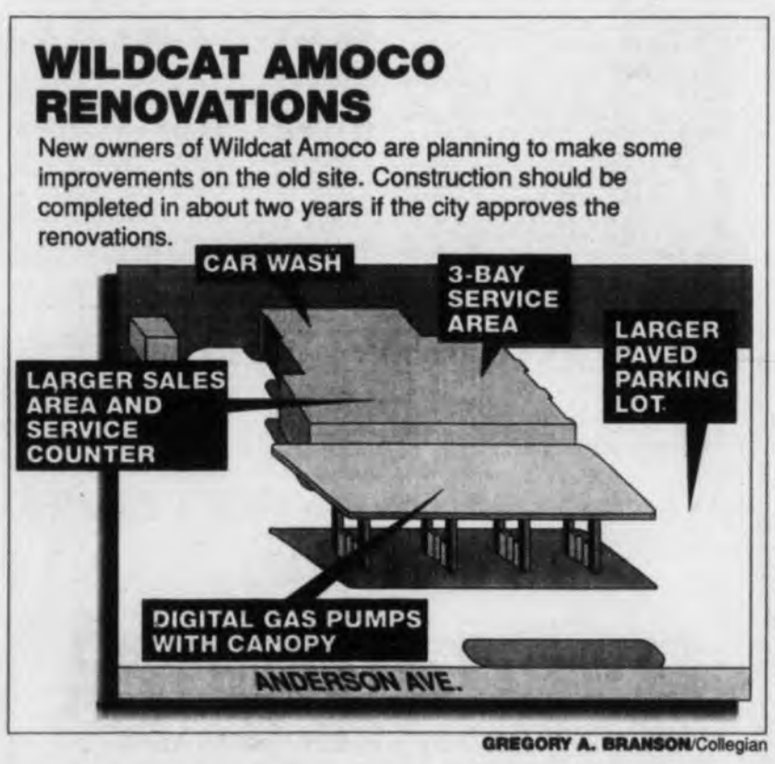
But I picked up Emmylou Harris' new album a couple days ago and was pleasantly surprised to hear there's still some good old music in the country scene.

Country radio stations have given less airplay to Emmylou over the past few years in favor of the M.C. Hammers of the C&W genre. She has a following, however, in the vein of fans of the Replacements or the Chicago Cubs.

Her new album, "Emmylou Harris and the Nash Ramblers at the Ryman," was recorded live at the original home of the Grand Ole Opry. She writes in her liner notes that she tried to pick up the sounds of that old wood cornerless room where the heart and soul and memories – "the hillbilly dust" – of all who played there before permeates the hallways.

The Nash Ramblers are her new backup musicians, picked up from groups like Newgrass Revival (who played at the Walnut Valley Bluegrass Festival in Winfield this past fall), Seatrain and Manassas.

Harris' previous backup band produced talents like Ricky Skaggs and Steve Wariner, and it's a sure thing these guys are next.



It takes a true talent to take songs like Steve Earle's "Guitar Town" and follow it up with Curley Williams' "Half as Much." Then to put together a sweet and soulful version of "Mansion on the Hill" from Bruce Springsteen's best album ever, "Nebraska" and follow it up with Bill Monroe's bluegrass classic "Scotland."

There's a ton of great music on this album. Three songs written by Monroe appear on "At the Ryman," along with stuff like Creedence Clearwater Revival's "Lodi," which Harris dedicates to a somewhat John Hinckleyish fan named "Dick" (no kidding), who used to follow her around every place she played.

"At the Ryman" is a great album, all the way around. Whether you dig the New Kids on the Block or the new kids of country. Trust me. Harris' latest would be a great addition to your collection.

Service station plans expansion southwest of campus

Wildcat Amoco to add building, move car wash

TOM LISTER
Collegian

Within two years, students should see a new service station near the southwest corner of campus.

The new owners of Wildcat Amoco, 1701 Anderson Ave., are planning to renovate the station and expand to a west lot.

"It needs to be done to make it a more attractive facility," manager Terry Wark said. "Cleanliness is one thing customers look for."

Wark said plans for this summer include new underground tanks, digital gas pumps, a canopy and pavement of the west lot.

Changes for next summer will include a new limestone building and relocation of the car wash to the back of the station, he said.

Although plans for the expansion have not yet been approved, Wark said he doesn't anticipate any problems.

The KSU Foundation leases both the land where the station is and the west lot.

"I don't see any problem with it. We've talked to the Foundation," he said.

David Weaver, vice president of real estate for the Foundation, said Wildcat Amoco's former owners had submitted plans for station renovation a year ago. The plans had passed, he said, but new plans would also require the city's approval.

"They'll probably make sure that the new land doesn't violate any zoning," Weaver said. "We don't anticipate any problems. I had suggested that they use limestone to tie it in better to the University."

Eric Cattell, senior planner for the City of Manhattan, said the zoning for the Wildcat Amoco area is a planned unit development. Whereas regular zoning only establishes land uses, a PUD establishes three things: zoning, site design and platting (laying out lots).

"The main difference is that the PUD develops more flexibility," he said. "It allows you to mix land uses."

The lot west of the station was also a PUD and had been the ground for a house, Cattell said.

"The original PUD required the bungalow to buffer the gas station from the other houses," he said. "In 1990, Amoco and the KSU Foundation made an application to change the PUD, to allow more parking and an island."

Cut in capital gains suggested

Tax imposed when money removed from stock before specified time

MITCH HIXSON
Collegian

Talk of cutting the capital gains tax has been common recently, but who it will benefit and how much it will stimulate the faltering economy is debatable.

President Bush suggested cutting the tax during his recent State of the Union address and presidential hopefuls have endorsed the idea.

The capital gains tax is imposed when money is moved out of a stock before it matures. As the tax stands today, a person would pay a tax, or penalty, of up to 28 percent on their net gain from the prematurely moved stock.

Many people agree the definition of the tax is confusing, but not just because of the terminology.

"There are bits and pieces of this that make sense," said Peter Ekman, assistant professor of finance, "I have not heard a total explanation of the thing that makes perfect sense."

Michael Oldfather, associate professor of economics, explained Bush's arguments for cutting the tax.

"Part of the net gain on the stock can be attributable to inflation, not actual gain," he said. "By cutting the tax, Bush is getting the tax down so people pay a tax on the true gain, not on inflation."

Ekman said another argument for cutting the tax is that a reduction would stimulate the economy. He said people who have money invested in certain stocks would like to be able to reinvest in other stocks that may have better prospects.

"Now when they move the money out of that stock, they are taxed on it using the capital gains tax," he said. "Essentially, what it comes down to is the investors can't invest in the best investments."

Ekman said people who are trying to raise money to get business ventures started cannot because the money is locked up in other stocks where a tax must be paid to achieve access to it.

"I'm confused on why this type of tax cut could be better for the economy than any other," Ekman said. "At times tax cuts can be good for the economy, but not all the time."

Oldfather said he is not sure why Bush is so adamant about cutting this tax.

"Many of his advisers have told him forget it, because it is a 'ready-made' issue for the Democrats," he said. "The benefit of the tax sounds like a positive for the consumer, but hardly any benefits will hit anyone below the top 4-5 percent."

Ekman said he agreed.

"It's a tax cut for the rich. There is no doubt about that," he said. "The people who have the most money in the stock market are the ones who will benefit. Any effect on anyone but the rich would be a very indirect effect."

Another potential reason to lower the tax is to try to encourage more investment, he said. If the cut is applied consistently, it would increase investment.

"It would increase investment because the cut, in effect, is a subsidy," he said. "People would be more interested in investing because the tax would be less. The question to ask, however, is how much would investment increase, not if it will.

"No one knows what a capital gains tax will actually do, because it's just not an easy thing to study."

Breast implant complaints nothing new

Silicone safety questioned earlier, documents reveal

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Dow Corning Monday released hundreds of internal memos, letters and other documents revealing it had received complaints for decades that its silicone gel breast implants had caused medical problems.

The company has repeatedly told doctors and the government the implants are safe, and it reiterated that assurance on Monday. But the documents show concern within Dow Corning as well.

In one 1985 memo, Bill Boley, a company scientist, warned that more testing was needed to determine whether a particular formula of the silicone gel caused cancer. He wrote, "Without this testing, I think we have excessive personal and corporate liability exposure."

Boley's note is in a 4 1/2-pound book of internal documents the company released at the demand of the Food and Drug Administration, which is re-examining the safety of the implants. At the FDA's request last month the manufacturer and surgeons agreed not to use any more implants until the agency decides on their safety.

An FDA advisory committee is to meet next week to consider the safety issue, and the agency had demanded release of the documents to give the panel time to consider them.

An estimated 1 million women in the United States have had such breast implants.

People filing lawsuits, as well as consumer groups, have alleged the breast implants can cause a host of medical problems, including cancer and damage to the immune system, if they break open and spill the silicone gel inside the body.

A quick examination of the documents does not show the company's studies confirmed those allegations. But the papers do show a long history of complaints, leaky implants, production problems and concern for public relations.

One company memo, dated March 9, 1971, told of a New Orleans patient whose breast had become irritated about four months after receiving an implant following a mastectomy.

Twice, the doctor treating her thought it was an infection and gave her penicillin. The irritation went away and then came back. After the third occurrence, the doctor found "the irritation had lacerated and the fluid was oozing from the wound," the company memo said.

The doctor then removed the implant and found it "was partially empty of gel, and what gel was there was extremely fluid and oozed out of the prosthesis and the surrounding tissue," the memo said.

The memo said the doctor was afraid of being sued for malpractice. He said he had done at least a dozen similar operations without a problem.

The gel inside the implants is supposed to be gooey and sticky, but one surgeon, in an angry letter to a company representative in 1987, reminded him of the time he watched an operation to remove a defective implant.

"The ... implant that was removed from the patient that you observed had gel which literally ran to the floor," Dr. Charles Vinnik of Las Vegas wrote. "We all observed it — it was far from cohesive, having the consistency of approximately 50-weight motor oil."

Vinnik went on to complain the company did not seem to be taking him seriously.

"What really has burned me is the fact that on many of these reports when I received them, there are gratuitous self-serving statements wherein the evaluator obviously speculates that somehow or other the patient has, at my direction, abused the implant," he wrote.

The company, in an explanation that accompanied the documents, acknowledged that silicone gel in the body can cause problems.

"Testing completed to date shows that the primary observed effect of silicone in the body is that of the classic foreign-body reaction," Dow Corning said. "The tests do not indicate any association between these silicone materials and cancer, or diseases of the immune system."

The company did acknowledge that if the leaking silicone gel works its way beyond the scar tissue that normally surrounds an implant it can cause "persistent tissue inflammation or localized tissue irritation in some cases."

The company's literature to surgeons did not specify this among the adverse reactions to the implants. Those included only occasional complaints of excessive breast firmness and/or discomfort.

Elsewhere in that same pamphlet, Dow Corning described what a surgeon should do if an implant breaks while being installed. After pulling out as much gel as the surgeon can grab with his fingers, "any residual macroscopic gel remaining in the pocket can be removed by blotting the walls of the pocket with a series of 4x4 sponges."

If any of the gel gets on surgical instruments, the pamphlet recommends cleaning them with benzene.

Robert Rylee, chairman of Dow Corning's health care businesses, said Monday the newly released documents represented a public relations disaster for his company. But he said the focus should be on scientific data rather than inflammatory company memos.

He said the company believes the devices are safe, aside from the risks of any surgery.

Widow donates $1.4 million to library

Gift in honor of K-State alumnus; project planning still in preliminary stages

COLLEGIAN STAFF

The College of Engineering is $1.4 million closer to a new library, after a donation from the wife of a deceased alumnus in Florida.

Alice Fiedler, of St. Petersburg, Fla., donated the money in honor of her husband, George Fiedler, who graduated from K-State in electrical engineering.

"Alice Fiedler wants to have something to recognize her husband and recognize all that the University has done," said Don Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering.

"We haven't got things in place yet, but we're looking at all the options," Rathbone said.

Rathbone said he and his special assistant on the project, Scott Scroggin, are just getting into the planning stages.

"We felt the need for more space for study areas, as well as room for study activities. This has been in my and other minds for a number of years," Rathbone said.

The library's link with Farrell is currently being examined.

"We're starting to look at designs now," he said. "We're trying to see how it's going to be coordinated with the main library. That's a major issue for the rest of the University. We'll evolve on that issue.

"As far as location goes, it could be attached to the present facility or encapsulated in the main library. We're seeking the guidance of the donor, but it's undecided as of now."

Scroggin is gathering the information needed to make the larger decisions. Included in the planning is the use of third- and fourth-year architecture engineering students.

"On April 6, there should be enough primary information gathered for a four week assignment," Scroggin said. "We'll be looking for basic schematic diagrams. It's natural for the College of Engineering to call on the school of architectural engineering."

Rural Paraguay gets help from K-State

Professors train professionals in integrated project

MARGO KELLER
Collegian

A new College of Human Ecology project is transcending country and cultural boundaries to educate government health officials at the request of the government of Paraguay.

The Caazapa Area Development Project will train rural development professionals in the Caazapa region of the agriculturally dominated South American country.

"K-State has been recognized as a resource, and this is one of the first of those related areas in which agriculture will work with human ecology on techniques to train governmental officials on health, health care, nutrition and resource management," Barbara Stowe, dean of human ecology, said.

The initial framework for the most recent project was set up by Meredith Smith, professor of foods and nutrition, and her husband Nelson de Barros Barreto, a Paraguayan professor who worked to establish a new major in human ecology with the College of Agriculture of the National University in Asuncion, Paraguay, with a $1-million W.K. Kellogg Foundation Grant.

The Kellogg Foundation, located in Battle Creek, Mich., supports programs in education, health services and agricultural development in the United States, Africa, the Caribbean and Latin America.

Smith is spending the semester in Paraguay conducting studies to educate government health officials.

The new academic year in Paraguay begins in March, with specific courses outlined for the first two years of instruction.

Basic classes such as chemistry, mathematics, botany, zoology, human ecology and human development will be taught the first year.

The second year will include microbiology, statistics, family agriculture production 1 and 2, rural sociology, and micro-computers courses.

Twelve students participated last year, and 20 will be entering class in March after taking the entrance exams beginning Feb. 10, Smith said.

"Public health, agriculture and forestry extension, development bank, and other professionals will learn to work together in planning for the development of the region," Smith said.

"They will learn to develop their plans with the families who use the services they provide. This should result in a program that better meets the needs of families of Caazapa using the resources available."

The Caazapa project began 10 years ago, but the most progress has come within the last four years.

Several professors will join Smith later this month or by the end of March.

George Brandsberg, professor of extension computer systems, will teach the staff desktop publishing and show them how to prepare better training materials. Fred Worman, agricultural economics associate, and Fadi Aramouni, assistant professor of foods and nutrition, will work on specific programs in Paraguay.

Meredith Stroh, assistant professor in foods and nutrition, provides support for Smith from K-State and might also travel to Paraguay this semester, Smith said.

Stroh is active in the Paraguay Partnership program, which also has helped to develop strong links between the state and country.

The program began more than 25 years ago with the Kansas and Paraguay Partnership being one of the strongest pairings. They were matched due to similarities between the countries including both being agriculturally orientated, fairly rural, no coastlines and both having a population of Mennonites, Stroh said.

In addition to money awarded by the Kellogg Foundation, the World Bank helped finance money for the project in Caazapa.

"This approach differs from traditional development programs in that it considers the needs of all family members as they relate to one another and as they interact with their immediate environment," Smith said.

The project uses a human ecology approach, one in which the total family and exchange between family economic development and quality of life is enhanced, Stowe said.

The approach is different than teaching the citizens to farm – it centers on a total resource management or systems approach, she said.

"Families and professionals will work together to develop more realistic plans that will benefit everyone in the area," Smith said.

"We hope to change the attitudes of both families and professionals so they will identify needs, plan change and identify resources to make that change occur without waiting for someone to tell them what to do.

"Due to the previous repressive government in Paraguay, people are used to waiting for someone to tell them what to do. Initiative and entrepreneurship were not rewarded."

The focus is also on education for the rural workers and not just instructing them, but educating them by using a modeling approach.

This approach allows the students to teach others in the same way they are instructed.

"The philosophy is on receiving hands-on experience in the real world while under supervision so they get a directed experience. We don't value that experience as much, but in a developing country those experiences are invaluable," Stroh said.

Reception for the project, like similar projects, has been favorable.

"We found a great deal of enthusiasm from both the families and the professionals for our approach while we were conducting the rapid rural assessment," Smith said.

The human ecology project conducted a rapid rural assessment in August 1990 when directors and professionals from the Agriculture Extension Service, Forestry Service, Public Health Service, National Development Bank, Agricultural Credit Agency, Agrarian Reform Institute and Pastorial Social were contacted.

"Although the government is receptive, whenever one begins to work with another country, there are difficulties in negotiations. There is a great deal of give and take," Stowe said.

Due to changes in the former dictatorship, the country's leadership now endorses agriculture-based projects.

"The Paraguayan government has been very supportive," Smith said. "We began the project at their request. They are planning a great deal of publicity, especially as we inaugurate the project."

Stowe said the college will continue to foster additional projects between Paraguay and K-State.

Space may hold cures for ailments

Bioserve focuses research on effects of microgravity in plant, animal cells

KRISTIN SCHMIDT

K-State life scientists hope to find solutions to human ailments in outer space.

For five years, scientists in the Division of Biology have worked closely with aerospace scientists from the University of Colorado at Boulder, on a project called Bioserve, Terry Johnson, director of the Division of Biology, said.

Bioserve is funded by NASA for the commercial development of space. Research about the effects of microgravity on plant and animal cells benefits both the space program and commercial industry, Johnson said.

"Universities are on the cutting edge of technology, and Bioserve is a bridge that connects commercial industry to universities," Ken Buyle, special assistant for Bioserve space technology, said.

Cellular experiments ranging from microscopic organisms to plant seedlings will be sent into outer space this June as part of the program, he said.

Researchers are interested in the effects of microgravity on the immune system, cell development and

STATE GOVERNMENT

Finney says Kansans will pay for services

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — If Kansans want state government to provide more services and operate more programs, they must be prepared to pay for them in higher taxes, Gov. Joan Finney said Monday.

"Remember, the only money the state has to pay for services comes out of the pockets of Kansans," Finney told high school students attending the state Department of Education's annual CloseUp Kansas conference.

The governor also spoke to college students attending the Associated Students of Kansas' annual day at the Legislature program.

She declined during her appearances to discuss a school finance proposal introduced last week by House Democrats, but said she was disappointed her own school finance plan has not been introduced.

"We've been in session now, what, five weeks? And I still haven't seen a bill" that would enact her school funding plan, Finney said. "They had told me they would introduce my plan."

The House plan, advanced by House Education Committee Chairman Rick Bowden, D-Goddard, Speaker Marvin Barkis, D-Louisburg and other top Democrats, proposes a uniform 45-mill statewide property tax to fund education as her plan does, but differs from Finney's plan in one major respect.

That plan, on which hearings are scheduled Wednesday and Thursday, would allow local school districts to raise their annual budgets 10 percent above a statewide average per-pupil expenditure limit, if local taxpayers are willing to pay most of the difference in cost.

"I'm not going to address it yet," Finney said of that provision.

However, she told the high school students she was prepared to negotiate over her school funding plan.

"I'm listening to you," Finney said of public concerns about her plan. "We will address the needs of sparsely populated areas."

Rural legislators have expressed concern that under her plan, local districts' budgets would be dictated by how much the state allows them to spend per pupil.

They say that will force school consolidation because districts with few students can't afford to hire the number of teachers they need to match their urban counterparts.

Violence

Besides safety concerns, many people are also curious about the cause of the recent violence.

Some liken the situation to trouble soldiers returning from Vietnam had readjusting to civilian life. Others speculate the success of Operation Desert Storm and subsequent family and community support have made soldiers overconfident.

Mark Meseke, Fort Riley media relations officer, said the soldiers' attitudes are different now than they were before the Persian Gulf War.

"The situation gave them importance," he said. "They are a bit more proud of what they did, because they recognize the reality of war. Many are living life to the fullest."

Meseke attributes the recent violence to a number of things.

He said bars discriminating against soldiers, a population increase of more than 4,000 at Fort Riley, limited housing stresses and family hardships brought on by the war may have contributed to the violence.

"More soldiers are going through personal and organizational stresses brought on with the down-sizing of the Army," Hubbard said.

Meseke said, however, there are many services available to help soldiers cope with problems after the war.

Pamela Martis, company commander for the 977th military police of the 716th military battalion at Fort Riley, said she agreed the support was a pleasant surprise and helped a lot of people.

Services include one-on-one advisment, family counseling, support groups, mental health services and continual community and national concern.

Although many people said they believe the increase in violence in and around the Manhattan area can be attributed to post-war problems, Raynor said he thought the recent Aggieville violence was due to outdoor beer gardens.

Outdoor basketball and sand volleyball create competition and force people to take sides, he said.

"In combination with alcohol, they get worked up, and then the bar closes and pushes them out on the street," he said. "They are in a competitive mode and are unable to ignore usual comments, and then conflicts arise."

Democrats

Kansas Republican Party, said the major differences between the Republican and Democratic parties are that Republicans believe smaller governments are better, local governments know how to run their affairs without federal intervention and a tough national defense is good, even in peace time.

People who have the same ideas of what government should provide gravitate toward the Republican Party and vice-versa, she said.

There seems to be a growing wave of partisans who vote for the best candidate, regardless of party.

Scott Norton, junior in accounting, said he leans toward the Republican side, but would vote for a Democrat.

"What is important is who can do the best job," he said.

Sean Wissman, freshman in economics, said he is a Democrat, but would not cross party lines.

Wissman said Democrats' ability to look at and understand all sides of a situation, then search for an answer that would fit everyone is also important to him.

"Republicans have a tendency to be deceived by the apparent simplicity of a problem and then act irrationally," he said.

Steve Casey, sophomore in environmental design, said he thinks one should be wary of labeling anyone Republican or Democrat.

"I would consider myself a Democrat, but when labels are used people start thinking every person who says they are a Democrat is liberal, and every person who says they are a Republican is conservative, and that's not true," he said. "We're all a little of both, and I think that is important to remember."

diseases, Buyle said.

Commercial uses of the program include the development of new drugs and cancer research, Johnson said.

Because cells act differently without Earth's gravity, Bioserve opens the doors to research that would not have been possible on Earth, he said.

For example, Johnson said space would be an ideal place to test drugs which combat osteoperosis, a disease involving the loss of calcium and the weakening of bones.

People lose calcium at a highly accelerated rate in microgravity, so experimental drugs could be tested much faster in space than on Earth, Johnson said.

Another concern of the program is the safety of astronauts and other individuals in space. Scientists are studying the recycling of water and wastes and how food can be grown in microgravity, Johnson said.

He said a 1995 mission to Mars is scheduled, and a space station should be in orbit by the late 1990s.

Johnson said the exposure to the study of microgravity students are experiencing is nearly as important as the research conducted.

He said the 15 to 20 students involved in Bioserve will be the new scientists of the future.

ESSENTIAL EDGE

December gifts reach monthly record — $5 million

MARGO KELLER
Collegian

Gifts to KSU Foundation's Essential Edge campaign reached almost $5 million in December 1991.

This is the highest monthly total of the University campaign to raise $100 million for the eight academic colleges, intercollegiate athletics, a new art museum and University Libraries.

"The need for private funding has combined from volunteer needs to support the University," Gordon Dowell, KSU Foundation director of publications, said.

The December total included 102 gifts of $5,000 or more which brought the Foundation fund raiser $19,000 short of $5 million.

The previous monthly record was set in December 1990 with $4.4 million in gifts.

"Tremendously large funds and the Telefund have grown steadily. We anticipate a tremendous amount in the number of gifts, the number of donors, the number of dollars. All three have grown, which relate to more support for the University," Dowell said.

The College of Agriculture has raised 105 percent of its $12 million goal, and the College of Engineering, Veterinary Medicine, Intercollegiate Athletics and University Libraries have reached more then 80 percent of their targets.

Dowell said one reason monetary gifts increased in December was both individuals and corporations could claim tax deductions on their 1991 tax returns.

The campaign garnered $17.4 million in 1991 to increase the campaign total to $90 million. Farm Bureau donated their $3.2-million headquarters which now house the KSU Foundation.

The Ross Foundation, a Kansas milling industry, donated $250,000 toward a professorship in the milling science and management curriculum.

Individual donors provided the rest of the financing for the Edge campaign.

Mark Moore, Foundation vice president for capital campaigns and planned giving, said several family members are usually involved in the decision to donate gifts or endowments, which can be a time consuming process.

"A major gift is a cultivation process. It takes a certain length of time, from a week to two years," Moore said.

Announcements of gifts included a business administration professorship presented by Herb and Neva Blevins, of Scotch Plains, N.J., for $588,000.

Upperclassmen in earth science education and geology will benefit from a scholarship in memory of Ron Schultz. The scholarship, which was provided by Lindley and Kathleen Reimer, Liberal, uses the Mobil Oil Foundation matching-gift program.

The College of Agriculture received $250,000 from the estate of Norman & Trella Currie of Scandia, Kan.

Other donations included scholarships for students in various majors and works of art for the K-State Permanent Art Collection.

"The Foundation has gotten much stronger. We have created an awareness throughout the country," Moore said.

COMPUTING

Mainframe switch possible

K-State may log on to KU system; Coffman says both schools would benefit

AMY COX
Collegian

Student academic records may not be kept at K-State in the future.

The possibility of phasing out K-State's mainframe and transferring computing capabilities to the University of Kansas was introduced by Vice Provost Bob Kruh and Provost James Coffman Feb. 5 in a meeting with the Computing and Network Services staff.

The phaseout would mean all of K-State's academic, enrollment and financial aid records would move to KU.

K-State's mainframe was installed in December 1989, and the University continues to pay for the system.

The reason behind the idea, Coffman said, was concern for the future, including a way to be able to afford expected cost increases.

"We're fine for today, tomorrow," he said, "but you can't wait two or three years to decide what you are going to do in two or three years. The wait will eat you up."

Betsy Edwards, CNS staff assistant, said the idea was unexpected.

"It came as a surprise to most of us in the department. We weren't clear why it even was being considered," she said.

An unofficial announcement from the CNS staff based on the Feb. 5 meeting said the phaseout was being blamed on problems with slowness during enrollment.

But it is a program problem, not a hardware problem. A random check showed that while enrollment screens were slow to pull up, the actual usage of the mainframe was only at 60 percent, the announcement said.

Coffman said it was "a glitch in the software that has nothing to do with this."

Kruh said the purpose of the meeting was to inform people and to obtain feedback from CNS staff.

He said the idea is in the exploratory stage, and nothing had been decided yet.

"It's possible that nothing may come of it," he said.

Staff members within the department, however, are not so sure.

Some technical staff members, communicating through BITMAIL on the mainframe, said the proposal is fact and is in its final stages of being put into effect.

"That's just not true," Coffman said. "It's a juggling act.

"If you don't keep staff informed, you're not doing them justice. But, at the same time, it gets rumors started and people worried unnecessarily."

Two staff members who said they are afraid of losing their jobs in the phaseout said it was done behind closed doors and announced without warning, like the past reorganization proposal.

"We have to pull together like when we thought the colleges of Architecture and Design and Human Ecology were on the chopping block," a BITMAIL message said. "If we make enough noise, there's no way this can happen."

During the Feb. 5 meeting, staff members said they were told that if KU's mainframe was leased, they would not have access to BITMAIL.

In the future, staff members would have to use a Unix operating system or a personal computer.

They said the current CNS Unix equipment would not be able to handle

SOUTH AMERICA

Venezuelans tried to oust 'bad guys,' alumnus says

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian

It was the good people trying to take over the government, in hopes of getting rid of the bad guys.

This is how a K-State student who grew up in Venezuela summed up the recent coup attempt in his home country.

Cesar Garcia

"If I would have been in Venezuela when the coup took place, I would have been a part of it," said Cesar Garcia, a K-State alumnus who graduated in December with a bachelor's degree in electrical engineering.

The recent coup attempt in Caracas, Venezuela, not only brought chaos to the country, but raised frustrations for people living there, who claim the system is unfair.

"If it's a democracy, it's not fair," Garcia said.

Garcia returned home for the Christmas to visit his family. He said it was easy to detect from the people that they were ready to speak out.

"You could kind of tell something was going to happen — people seemed unsettled," he said.

Garcia was born at Fort Leavenworth, and his father attended the Command and General Staff College.

His father, an officer in the Venezuelan army, then returned to Venezuela. Cesar grew up in Venezuela and when he came of age, he acquired a dual citizenship and considers himself American.

He relates to the recent attempts of Lt. Col. Hugo Chavez, one of the coup leaders. Cesar, once a cadet in the Venezuelan army, said politicians are the root of the problem, buying off the people for votes during elections.

"The politicians and the armed forces are separate," he said, " but the army, too, has become desperate with corruption because the politicians buy off those in charge, and the people still suffer."

Garcia said the general attitude of the politicians of the country is to maintain an image. These images, he said, are used to gain respect and popularity among other nations.

FACULTY

New recuiting policies needed

Normal hiring methods fail to draw minority professors to K-State

BECKY DARBY
Collegian

Better and more creative recruiting practices are what is needed to attract more black faculty to K-State, Assistant Dean of Student Life Bernard Franklin said.

Mordean Taylor-Archer, assistant provost for multicultural affairs, said there are 25 black full-time faculty and administrators. Five of them are teaching; the rest are administrators who do some teaching.

There are no legitimate excuses why the number of black faculty is low, Taylor-Archer said.

She said traditional recruiting efforts may not be effective in locating potential faculty members.

"The people are out there who will come to K-State. We just have to make the connections," she said.

There has to be a more vigorous thrust to recruit and retain black faculty members, she said.

Rather than dwelling on why there aren't more black faculty members, she said, it is more important to try to develop strategies to rectify the situation.

ENVIRONMENT

Problems require international attention, Kassebaum says

Concerns include water, increased ozone depletion

PAM FRAHM
Collegian

Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., said environmental concerns are an international problem.

"The environment is very important," said Kassebaum, who spoke in K-State Union Forum Hall Tuesday. "It encompasses not only energy policy, but water, wetlands.

"And, clearly, now we have concern about the ozone level and the depletion of the ozone level to be greater than we had realized earlier.

"I am pleased that President Bush is going to the international conference in Brazil in July, because it is an international effort."

Kassebaum's speech was sponsored by Mortar Board, a national senior honorary.

The event was part of Wildcats for the World Week, through which Mortar Board members are promoting environmental awareness in the Manhattan and K-State communities.

Beverly Primm, Mortar Board vice president, said Kassebaum was invited to speak because of her concern for environmental issues.

Kassebaum was also chosen because Mortar Board members believed she could address all types of environmental concerns at a national level, she said.

Kassebaum stressed a balance between economic issues and environmental concerns.

"There is a line in the sand, and I don't think you can say, 'Either, or,'" she said. "So often, so much of what we do has unintended consequences.

"We think we've done something that solves the problem, and down the road a way, we may have only created five other problems. So I feel we have to balance those considerations."

Specific environmental issues Kassebaum addressed were the development of a national energy policy, development of nuclear energy plants, oil import fees, wetlands and other water issues.

"Not to deal with a national energy policy just didn't make any sense," Kassebaum said.

She said she voted to limit debate on the National Energy Security Act, which will be addressed in the U.S. Senate again next week.

Kassebaum said she supports development of nuclear energy plants and other alternative energy sources. She said an oil import fee would enhance domestic oil production.

On another issue, Kassebaum said

NEWS DIGEST

▶ IRANIANS CELEBRATE

NICOSIA, Cyprus (AP) — Hundreds of thousands of Iranians poured into the streets of Tehran Tuesday, shouting "death to America" as they celebrated 13 years of the Islamic republic that supplanted the pro-Western monarchy.

Official Iranian news media estimated 2 million people — equivalent to a fifth of Tehran's population — flowed into Freedom Square to renew allegiance to the teachings of their late patriarch, Ayatollah Ruollah Khomeini.

The rally climaxed daily celebrations that began with the anniversary of Khomeini's return from exile on Feb. 1, 1979, 10 days before his Islamic revolution seized power.

▶ PANEL APPOINTED

TUCSON, Ariz. (AP) — A panel of scientists has been selected to review Biosphere 2, the project accused by critics of cheating on its goal of creating a self-contained world-under-glass that produces its own food, air and water.

The group, which includes scientists from NASA and the Smithsonian Institution, will examine Biosphere 2's scientific credibility, said Thomas Lovejoy, a Smithsonian biologist and ecologist heading the review.

The nine members were appointed without pay by Space Biospheres Ventures, the for-profit company that runs Bioshpere 2. They report to Edward Bass, the Texas millionaire who bankrolled the $150-million, glass-enclosed world.

▶ WORKER APOLOGIZES

COLUMBIA, Md. (AP) — A man who complained about faulty brakes on his 1992 Buick got an apology, but not the one he expected. It came directly from the auto worker responsible for the mistake.

Rich Richardson, a foreman in the Flint, Mich., plant that built John Jacobs' LeSabre, thought he was calling a dealer when he dialed Jacobs' number last week. When he realized he had the car owner on the phone, he went ahead with the call.

"I thought we ought to talk to him. The defect was so important that I thought we ought to tell him we are going to see it never happens again," Richardson, a 29-year GM veteran, said Monday.

▶ IRELAND PICKS LEADER

DUBLIN, Ireland (AP) — Parliament confirmed Albert Reynolds as prime minister on Tuesday, and he swiftly purged his Cabinet of ministers chosen by his predecessor, Charles Haughey.

Haughey resigned last week as leader of Ireland's dominant political party, Fianna Fail, following charges he knew about a decade-old wiretapping scheme.

Reynolds appointed David Andrews to serve as foreign affairs minister. As an attorney, Andrews was involved in public campaigns to overturn convictions of 10 people jailed in Britain for Irish Republican Army bombings.

Reynolds built a fortune operating dance halls.

▶ THIRD WORLD HIT HARD

CARTAGENA, Colombia (AP) — The economies of the world's 47 poorest countries grew by only 2.7 percent last year, frustrating the hopes of millions of people living in poverty, a U.N. official said Monday.

But he expressed hope that the end of the Cold War would result in increased foreign aid to the Third World.

Kenneth Dadzie, secretary general of the U.N. Conference on Trade and Development, said developing nations were hit hard last year by increases in oil prices, stagnating exports and growing foreign debts.

The conference began a two-week meeting in Cartagena Saturday.

RECOGNITION

▶ROBEL NAMED MAPCA EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

CHRISTA CONGROVE
Collegian

K-State's adviser for greek affairs has been named executive director of the Mid-American Panhellenic Council Association.

Barb Robel was chosen after an interview, and Margaret Miller, greek adviser at the University of Kansas and MAPCA member, said Robel was chosen because on her knowledge and personal traits.

Miller said all greek advisers in the region were notified of the position.

"Barb was selected because of her experience in the field and her ability to coordinate this type of association," Miller said.

MAPCA, a regional organization of members from 16 states, guides panhellenic systems.

Robel has a history with MAPCA.

She served as MAPCA executive director from 1980 to 1986. She then retired and was asked to serve as editor of the Monograph, a publication that reports on topics such as date rape, hazing and academics.

The opportunity to serve as executive director a second time came about, and Robel said she took it for many reasons.

"I wanted to continue my professional development," she said. "I believe strongly in the resources MAPCA has to offer and want to contribute to those.

"I also think that everyone needs a new challenge."

As executive director of MAPCA, Robel will administer all operations of the association.

"I will be in charge of all of the programming, logistics for the annual conference, member recruitment and record keeping," she said.

"I will supervise the awards program, officer training and all the services offered by the association."

Robel said she believes her position will have a positive affect on the K-State greek system.

It will increase the visibility of K-State, she said, as well as give the Panhellenic Council the opportunity to be on the front line of current trends in areas such as ethnic diversity, scholarship and leadership.

Robel will begin her term at the annual conference in March.

She said her goals as executive director are to expand and computerize the resource file for easier access to other universities and to begin networking through the computer mail.

▶ARTIST RECEIVES FULBRIGHT LECTURESHIP

CHRISTINA CARBAJAL
Collegian

A K-State professor will share his knowledge of ceramics with the people of Argentina.

Angelo Garzio, professor emeritus of art, has received a Fulbright Scholar Professor Senior Lectureship.

Garzio, who has won Fulbright awards in the past, applied for the award when a colleague told him of an opening to work at an Argentine university.

As of now, Garzio said, he's not sure when he'll be leaving. He said he won't know until he receives an itinerary.

Charles Stroh, professor of art, said this Fulbright award is set up as an international teaching and research program.

"Professors from the United States can go to other countries, and professors in other countries can come here," Stroh said.

"There was an opening for a ceramics expert at the University of Misiones-Obra, which is in the northern part of Argentina," Garzio said.

Garzio said he will serve as a consultant to improve ceramic classes and will lecture about the technicalities and history of ceramics.

Stroh said there are many different kinds of Fulbright awards, ranging from Fulbright awards for students to the one Garzio received.

The award Garzio received typically goes to senior faculty members who have established a reputation in their field.

Garzio said he received a master's degree in fine arts and began the ceramics program at K-State in 1957, after working for a year in Finland at one of the largest ceramic firms in Europe.

He has also taught in Pakistan, Korea and Nigeria as part of his previous Fulbright awards.

Garzio retired last May, but he still works with a couple of graduate students and continues to work daily in his own campus studio.

Stroh said there are the usual benefits that come from winning the Fulbright, such as improving one's area of concentration.

REVIEW

Raw soul makes up for plot weakness

TOM LISTER
Collegian

Throw those books in the corner, grab that bottle of Night Train out of the fridge and check out "The Commitments" tonight at the K-State Union.

Soul — that's what you can expect. Raw soul.

As you catch yourself tapping your foot to the soundtrack, you'll watch the turbulent rise and fall of a Dublin, Ireland, soul band.

You'll see everything from the band's first formation to its shot at a recording contract.

Director Alan Parker has brought together a non-star cast that holds your attention throughout the show.

Jimmy Rabbitte (Robert Atkins) brings the band together and attempts to manage it. After a long series of auditions, Rabbitte pulls a band together from the slums of Dublin.

Deco (16-year-old Andrew Strong), the band's vocalist, has the voice of Joe Cocker and the personality of John Belushi.

Although he passes wind and stuffs his face throughout the course of the film, you can't help but respect his vocal ability.

Deco leads the band through classics such as "Mr. Pitiful," "Mustang Sally" and "Try a Little Tenderness" like the born natural he is.

Johnny Murphy plays Joe "The Lips" Fagan, the band's aging trumpet player.

The little details are what make this movie.

But with the scenery of on-location Dublin in the background and enough soul to make you dance in the living room to old James Brown tunes once you get home, who needs plot?

FACULTY SENATE

Professors disturbed by regent's letter

Quality issues ignored in Sampson's planning-document outline, Richter says

DENNIS O'KEEFE
Collegian

President Jon Wefald gave Faculty Senate a controversial letter he received from Kansas Board of Regents Chairman Jack Sampson that left many faculty members upset.

Linda Richter, professor of political science, presented a letter that pointed out questions and directives that are to be applied to K-State's campus planning document.

The plan is a two-part process.

The first part evaluates all programs that grant degrees, and the second looks at what the University wants to become and what it can sacrifice to get there.

The letter Wefald received from the board was identical to the one sent to all regents institutions.

"It ignores all that has gone on, in terms of planning, growth and reallocations at K-State," Richter said.

"It councils against across-the-board cuts, but it makes across-the-system assumptions about what each university needs to do next, while ignoring the fact that we have been doing a lot for several years."

A section of the letter asked institutions to identify their maximum and optimum enrollment for 1994 and 2000 and how they will address the issue of program reduction or elimination.

"Its initial premise is not program specific at all," Richter said.

"It talks about absolute size or absolute downsize and says nothing about the issues of excellence or quality that was supposed to be the underlying motivation for this whole approach."

In addition, the letter asked for a review of opportunities for administrative savings, reorganizations and reallocations.

"The regents appear to ignore what has happened at K-State in the last couple years," Richter said.

Faculty Senate President Kenneth Klabunde, professor of chemistry, said he was more optimistic.

"Maybe K-State is not on the hit list," he said, referring to the fact that every regents institution received the article.

That thought was not shared by all, however.

"This letter is an insult to all presidents. They are being talked down to. It is rude, downright rude," said Aruna Michie, associate professor of political science.

Barbara Stowe, dean of the College of Human Ecology, said the response from the regents is further evidence of how little the board understands how the University operates.

"There are some stereotypical ideas about waste of resources, lack of ability to manage resources, and I could go on and on," she said.

"We need a face-to-face conversation with Mr. Sampson to have him interpret his questions and directives and to help him understand their possible implications."

Talat Rahman, professor of physics, agreed in part with Stowe. She said she was disturbed, however, with the board's recent actions.

"I'm actually upset that they send the same letters to every university, because if the regents are trying to find a way to justify their existence, I don't see why I have to waste my time with that," Rahman said.

"Why don't they give us a bottom line? Why don't they say, 'These are the resources, and this is how you will have to make do,' and then we can come up with an idea."

Rahman said the board might be just trying to find a way to be useful, and if that is the case, Senate should just ignore the letter.

"Enough is enough; you find some use for yourself," she said. "I think this kind of mental exercise is ridiculous."

Richter said it seemed the original purpose of the campus planning document had been changed by Sampson's letter.

"If in the process we achieve some economy, wonderful," she said. "But essentially, the approach that we went into this with — that we were encouraged to do — was that we were going to have a better University as a result.

"I don't think we can make those assumptions anymore."

Klabunde said he plans to meet with Wefald, Provost James Coffman and the executive committee to determine an appropriate response.

CRIME

Dahmer claims he eluded police a number of times

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MILWAUKEE — An officer who was fired for taking a 14-year-old boy back to Jeffrey Dahmer's apartment, where the youth later was killed and dismembered, testified Tuesday that Dahmer "appeared to be a normal person."

The encounter was the last of several times Dahmer evaded police detection during a 13-year period in which he killed and mutilated 17 young males, according to testimony during Dahmer's insanity trial.

Defense attorney Gerald Boyle contends Dahmer had an uncontrollable sexual attraction to corpses, driving him to kill. But prosecutor E. Michael McCann said Dahmer could have controlled himself.

In other testimony Tuesday, Dahmer's former apartment manager, Sopa Princewell, said he confronted Dahmer several times about a strong odor coming from Dahmer's apartment.

The smell later was identified as that of body parts.

Dahmer told him the smell was caused by a broken freezer and a fish tank, Princewell said.

Former officer John Balcerzak and his former partner, Joseph Gabrish, encountered Dahmer on May 27, 1991 while responding to a call about a naked, dazed boy on the street.

Dahmer told them the boy, later identified as 14-year-old Konerak Sinthasomphone, was his adult, homosexual lover.

They left his apartment after they saw photographs of the boy posing in black, bikini underwear, which led them to believe Dahmer was telling the truth, Balcerzak said.

"He remained calm and forthright throughout the entire interview," Balcerzak said of Dahmer. "He appeared to be a normal person."

Balcerzak and Gabrish were fired after Dahmer told police following his July 22, 1991 arrest that the boy was among 11 victims whose dismembered body parts were found in his apartment.

Dahmer told police he killed the boy soon after the officers left.

He said if officers had looked in the next room, they would have found skulls, frozen body parts, severed heads, torsos in an acid-filled vat and preserved genitals.

Earlier testimony showed Dahmer had at least four other close calls with police:

—He first dodged police in 1979 when he killed an 18-year-old, his first victim, in Ohio and put the dismembered body in a car to take to a dump.

Dahmer told authorities an officer stopped him on suspicion of drunken driving, flashed a light in the back seat of the car and allowed him to drive away after Dahmer said the plastic bags there contained garbage.

—Two police officers testified they found nothing unusual about Dahmer when they questioned him in 1988 about a man's claim that Dahmer robbed and drugged him at Dahmer's grandmother's suburban Milwaukee home. Police dropped the case after Dahmer denied the allegations.

—Police Lt. Scott Schaefer testified Dahmer helped officers search his apartment for evidence after being arrested in 1988 for sexually assaulting a teen-age boy. Dahmer was later convicted and served nine months in jail.

—Dahmer admitted hitting a 15-year-old boy on the head with a rubber mallet after luring him to the apartment with plans to kill him in 1990. The boy reported the attack to police, but records show they never questioned Dahmer.

Dahmer has pleaded guilty but insane to 15 slayings in Milwaukee. The jury's verdict will decide whether he goes to prison or a mental hospital.

He is not charged with one Wisconsin killing because of insufficient evidence.

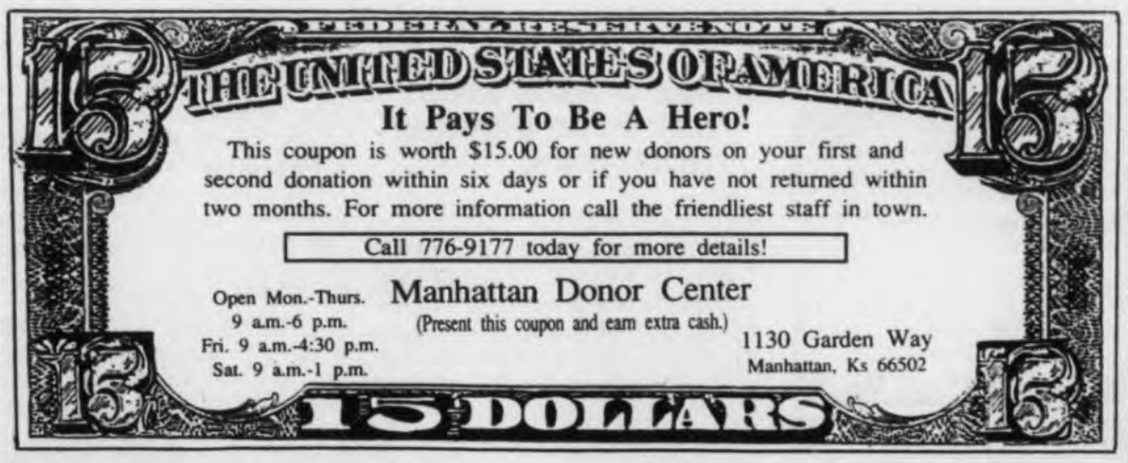
may be one reason the University doesn't attract more black faculty members.

K-State is not in a major metropolitan area like many black people are accustomed to, Franklin said.



He also cited the low number of black faculty as a reason the University has trouble attracting more.

Erika Freeman, junior in biology, said she believes there needs to be more diversity in the faculty on campus.

"As a minority, you want to see minorities in leadership positions," she said.

Freeman said she plans to get her master's degree and go on to teach at the college level in order to help provide a positive role model for other minority students.

Taylor-Archer said a minority visiting scholars program will be started at K-State this spring. She said it will let visiting scholars teach in their given area, develop a post-doctoral program for minorities and provide a program for minorities with doctorates to serve as post-doctoral fellows.

Bush discusses war, not issues

Aside from stealing ideas from Pat Buchanan and the Democratic hopeless hopefuls, President Bush is running a one-platform campaign: his quote-unquote victory in the Persian Gulf.

The only victory in the Persian Gulf War was that it didn't take all that long. It was shorter than this year's pennant race. It was shorter than the Olympics will end up being. And it wasn't as long and tedious as this year's presidential campaign is becoming.

There have been many reports in the past few weeks that the CIA is stepping up efforts to remove Saddam Hussein from power in Iraq. Some of this could be attributed to a leftist media, but Bush himself last week said he would like Hussein "out of there."

So, logically, why was the Persian Gulf War a victory if Bush's arch-enemy is still in power? One could say in a fit of imperialistic passion Uncle Sam pulled out too soon. However, Bush has covered himself by saying Hussein's removal was never an objective, but one has to ask why it wasn't an objective. Isn't war the overthrow of the enemy government and its policies?

It could be that King George is trying to ride the tide of his only, repeat only, accomplishment in office. He "won" the Gulf War, making no mention of the forgotten "no new taxes" pledge, the AWOL thousand points of light and the missing in action education/environmental/poverty president.

Our government and military had the chance to get rid of Saddam Hussein, and they blew it — just like Bush had the chance to take care of some of America's problems that plagued the Reagan era.

Bush should drop another Reagan tradition and quit acting. Speeches about his glory days in last spring's blockbuster media event, which we call the Gulf War, can no longer hide the "victory" that never was and the policies that never were.

Farrell awaits state funding

K-State needs to say thanks.

Last Saturday it was formally announced that H.D. "Joe" and Joyce Hale of Overland Park contributed $2 million to Farrell Library. The Hales donation will go toward expanding and renovating Farrell.

People are noticing it is in bad shape, and now some have taken enough notice to do something about it.

The Hales, for instance, aren't even K-State graduates. Joe graduated from the University of Kansas and Joyce graduated from Mills College in Oakland, Calif. The Hales, who did have three out of six children graduate from K-State, said it was "fun" for them to give to something that was in such desperate need.

Too bad the state of Kansas doesn't think it's as much fun.

Instead, the students of K-State need to depend on charitable people like the Hales to keep up the quality of the institution. The legislators at the Statehouse, who spend our tax dollars, don't always respond when needed. They would rather wait for people like the Hales to give them a break.

Since November, Farrell has been promised $7 million — $5 million of that came from a fee referendum passed by the students. The students voted with the understanding that the other $5 million would come from extramural sources, or else their money would go somewhere else.

After the Foundation secures the additional $3 million from alumni, the University will have provided $10 million for the $27 million project. The Legislature is out of excuses for not addressing Farrell's needs.

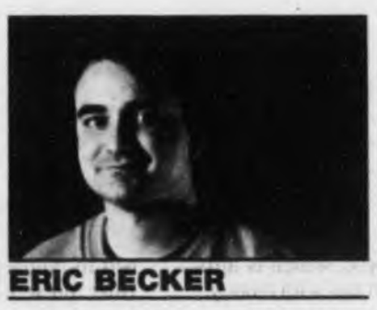
The Hales have significantly helped the students toward their goal of improving Farrell. It's time for the Legislature to do its part.

Lovin' the blues – 78 style

I sure do like the blues, but I probably shouldn't claim to understand them.

Last week I came across an old set of Billie Holiday 78-speed records in a local thrift shop. There were four records with one song on each side.

I didn't know where or if I'd be able to play them, but I had to have them. I picked up the set and paid for it at the counter.



I found a record player that would play 78-speed records on the fifth floor of Farrell Library and took the collection over. The records were in fair condition. I excitedly put the first on the turntable and triggered the needle.

The sound was muffled through the headphones. I turned the record player up to hear better. The needle bounced on the old record. Issued in 1947, the records in the set were inevitably flawed, but the music found its way through the crackle. It was beautiful.

I'd heard Billie Holiday before — on compact disc. But despite the poorer sound quality (in fact, because of the poorer sound quality) I found these earlier 78s much more fascinating.

I'd liked Billie Holiday's music on CD, of course, but there was something more authentic about these LPs, and it appealed to me. I felt closer to the original recordings, closer to Billie Holiday herself.

> "I sure do like the blues, but I probably shouldn't claim to understand them."

ERIC BECKER

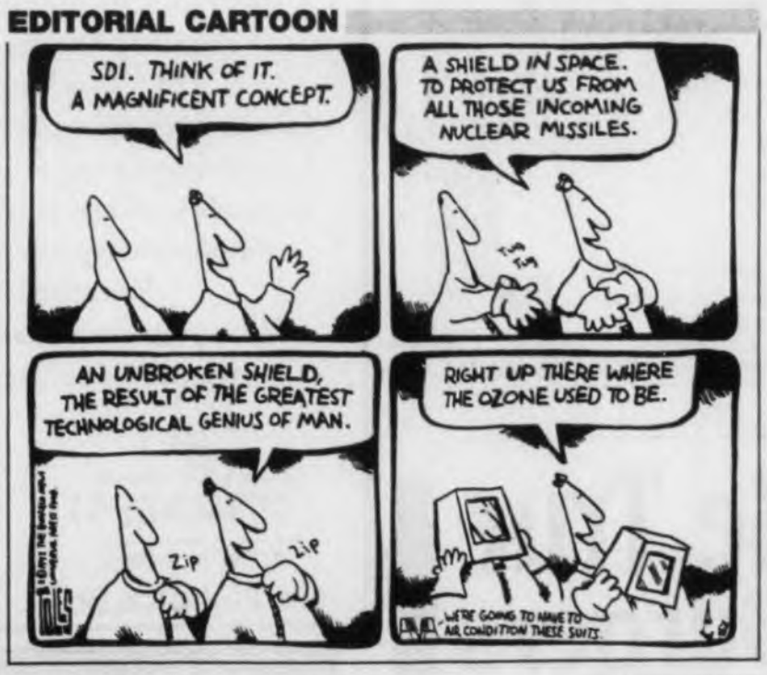
When I took off the headphones I realized that I knew almost nothing about the woman whose voice I had been listening to. I'd heard excerpts of her biography in a recording of her Carnegie Hall concert, but besides these small passages from her life, I knew nothing.

I never know if I should say that Billie Holiday sang the blues, or if I should say that she sang jazz. Either way, her music, like the blues, is a thing I experience only in the translation her records provide. In it, I can touch her pain, but I doubt that I really understand her music. To some extent I may relate to it or empathize with it. But I wonder if it's possible for me to understand it, being so far removed from the time and experience which helped produce it.

It has been said you don't sing the blues — you live them. But without the experience of the life that produced them, what do they become to us?

The question can be applied to the music and other art of the 1960s, as well. The recent tendency for me is to romanticize about this time.

The "Dead Heads" are still at large, following The Grateful Dead in their concert tours. And the band's recent albums and exposure have attracted a new generation of followers.



I like The Grateful Dead. I've got some of their albums (CDs). But out of touch with the time that produced their popularity, I again wonder what the music reflects and what it's supposed to mean.

I think it my be impossible for those of us who weren't there to ever really know, to ever really understand. We get glimpses of it (For a while every cop on TV was a Vietnam veteran). We hear the music. We read about the times, but all we really get are impressions and reflections of what it was all about. Our romanticism gives the icons of the time a new meaning, but it's one that may not be much related to their original meanings.

It's almost as if the entire experience of the time — whatever time — is recorded, related and "translated," so to speak, in the art of the time for future generations. But just as it is not possible to do a literal translation of a foreign language into English, this experience cannot come to us exactly. We cannot always really know what it was all about.

Still, I sure do like the blues.

▶ADVISER PROVIDES INACCURATE ADVICE

Editor,

I think it is time that our advisers realize that what they are doing is truly important. I don't know about you, but I consider graduating a very important part of my life. In a sense, these people are playing with your life.

We've all heard the nightmare stories of being advised we only need 12 more hours to graduate, then, two months later getting a grad check in the mail that says you are short five hours. You think, how unfair, poor guy. But wait until it happens to you. It's your last semester and it's three weeks into school. Most classes are closed, your schedule is set and what can you do?

This happened to me. The advice of my adviser: "There's always summer." Well, the fact of the matter is that this guy screwed me up. Another fact is that not all of us are here until it is convenient for us to graduate. Especially those of us who are military dependents who are only guaranteed two years at each duty station.

My problem was transfer hours. Up until last week, I had 60 hours transferred in. Suddenly, some of those hours don't count. I built my whole degree plan around those 60 hours. I could have taken extra hours a little at a time if I had known of this problem. But according to my adviser, there was no problem. Then the Dean of Arts and Sciences took a look and decided I can't graduate unless I pick up these hours. Great. Do I quit work to pay for this guy's mistake? If I'm going to graduate on time, I may have no choice.

Advisers are important. They are supposed to know the requirements and direct you so you can graduate on time. Instead, they hurry you in and out. They advise you to take the classes they think you should have. And you end up barely passing the electives they suggest! Why not slow down and pay attention to each individual student? Look at the load the student is carrying academically as well as personally.

And at least know the requirements. Know about transfer hours and what will and will not count. How is this possible with advisers who have group appointments? How many students have had to pay for their adviser's bad advice? To them it's a 10-minute appointment. But to me, it's the difference between graduating and not.

▶ROE V. WADE STORY WAS MORE OPINION THAN NEWS

Editor,

I would like to point out a mistake that was made in the Feb. 10th Collegian. The article "Rethinking Roe v. Wade," which appeared on the front page, should have been placed on page 4, the Opinion page. Obviously, such one-sided articles cannot be considered news reporting.

▶K-STATE ATHLETICS ON THE ROAD TO "FUTILITY U." AGAIN

Editor,

I have read all the Collegian articles, Todd Fertig's column and now an Associated Press article. I do not want to read another Sports Illustrated "Futility U." article. I would like to take some time and address a few athletic woes here at K-State.

First, the men's basketball team. I support this Cat team, but I think we need to look at its coaching. Dana Altman has done some fine things at K-State as a recruiter. He is responsible for bringing some fine talent to our school. As for comparisons to coach Jack Hartman and Lon Kruger, I think we are reaching for straws. I am not really old enough to remember coach Hartman's first years as coach, but I am familiar with his legacy and the respect he earned in the Big Eight and across the nation. I was here for Lon Kruger's early years. He may not have had a tremendous record, but I never had the dismal feeling I have now. Unfortunately we missed out on Larry Brown, but basketball's equivalent to coach Bill Snyder has to be out there.

As far as filling Bramlage goes, I think we need to look at the budget deficit. Now I am no Milt Richards and I don't want to be Steve Miller, but here is my two cents worth. Eighty bucks is too much. The campout made students believe they had to camp out to get tickets. This allowed Steve Miller to create a false demand and raise ticket prices. Well, the fact is that for the last two years there has been a ticket surplus. A false demand!

Students, you already pay for Bramlage, don't pay for it again with inflated ticket prices. Also do not ask for the campout back if you ever want fair ticket prices.

The next section is for Dr. Milt Richards. I have every confidence that you will turn the department around. Here is a suggestion that may help fill Bramlage, keep the students happy, and raise more money. Lower ticket prices. Selling 2,000 tickets at $80 gives you $160,000 and 4,000 empty seats. That's not good. If we offer those 6,000 seats at $50 you make $300,000. You also get happy fans in a full Bramlage Coliseum, and you start rebuilding a tradition. When I arrived at K-State, tickets at Ahearn were $38.50, and it was always packed. We can never replace Ahearn Field House. It was the best arena in the nation. I know that when we can fill Bramlage consistently we can make it a scary place for the opponents to play.

▶MAGIC NOT A HERO, JUST ANOTHER NUMBER

Editor,

In regards to the attention given to Magic Johnson, I feel the public is giving him too much publicity. There are many people in the world with AIDS, and none of them are put on pedestals like the public has done with Magic. In my mind, Magic's portrayal as a so-called "hero," is given to him because he has big bucks and is a celebrity.

The public needs to take another look at this over-publicized Magic Johnson and look at him in the way that all other AIDS victims are — a statistic.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Dow Corning's image at stake

Crisis management expert takes reins of company trying to regain public trust

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DETROIT — The outcome of Dow Corning Corp.'s debacle with its silicone gel breast implants depends on whether it can regain the trust of women who have the implants, analysts said Tuesday.

One expert compared the challenge to those faced by two other companies whose products were tainted by health concerns: A.H. Robbins Co., maker of the Dalkon Shield, and Procter & Gamble Co., which made Rely tampons.

At stake for Midland-based Dow Corning is its ability to remain viable whether it ever makes another breast implant.

Company documents released Monday showed it has known for two decades about potential health problems from leaking and rupture of its implants.

The company voluntarily pulled the implants from the market last month after the U.S. Food and Drug Administration issued a voluntary moratorium.

Doctors said the implants can cause a range of medical problems, including cancer and damage to the immune system, if they rupture.

Dow Corning took the first step in salvaging its image Monday by replacing its top executives with Keith McKennon, an expert in corporate crisis management, the analysts said.

"The relationship is exactly the same with a baseball team," said Mel Helitzer, a professor at the E.W. Scripps School of Journalism at Ohio University and a former Madison Avenue advertising and public relations executive.

"They fire the manager when they have a bad year."

An estimated 1 million U.S. women have breast implants, mostly silicone gel implants, and twice as many have them worldwide.

Dow Corning, a joint venture of Dow Chemical and Corning Inc., is the world's leading maker of silicone gel implants.

In New York Stock Exchange trading Tuesday, Dow Chemical stock finished down $1 at $56.25. Corning Inc. stock closed down $1.37 1/2 at $29.87 1/2.

Some lawyers have estimated Dow Corning's potential liability in the breast implant case at $2 billion.

But more dangerous than any legal liability is the damage that could result from a frightened public left to wonder whether a product will cause them harm, said Gerald Meyers, a business consultant who wrote "When it Hits the Fan," a guide to managing corporate crises.

"Yesterday's action is a turning point in my view," said Meyers, a former chairman and chief executive of American Motors Corp.

"They've now made a move that shows they are trying to manage the situation, rather than being controlled by it."

McKennon, Dow Chemical Co. executive vice president, performed well in helping steer that company out of potential public relations disasters concerning its Agent Orange defoliant and dioxin, Meyers said.

"He helped turn that whole corporation around, and the company reestablished itself," Meyers said.

But Meyers said McKennon already has made a mistake by saying the company would be willing to offer financial help to women who couldn't afford to have the implants removed.

"What the hell is wrong with him?" Meyers asked. "What are they going to do, establish a means test for deciding who gets financial help?"

Dow Corning spokesman Scott Seeburger defended McKennon's statement.

"He was asked off the top of his head what kinds of things he was thinking about, and that was one of the things he said he was a consideration." Seeburger said. "It was nothing he was implementing as a policy."

Meyers said Robbins mishandled the crisis over the Dalkon Shield, an intrauterine birth control device that was blamed for thousands of spontaneous abortions, hysterectomies, infections and at least 18 deaths. The company eventually was forced into bankruptcy court.

"Dalkon Shield went right over the cliff with the lawyers. The caseload became so heavy there was no way the accountants would allow them to show anything other than a potential bankruptcy," Meyers said.

He praised Procter & Gamble's handling of reports linking Rely tampons to toxic shock syndrome.

The company knew there was no way a definite link could be proved, but it pulled the product anyway at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars.

"The P&G guys said there is something more at stake involved here," Meyers said.

Dow Corning's problem is potentially more serious and ultimately harmful to Dow Chemical and Corning, who are desperately trying to avoid being tainted by their joint venture's problems, Meyers said.

LEGISLATURE

Opposition to casino growing

But Kickapoo say gambling vital to boost economy

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — If Indians cannot conduct casino gambling on their reservations, they might have to start toxic waste dumps for economic development, lawmakers were told Tuesday.

Opponents of a bill that would outlaw all forms of casino gambling in Kansas told the Senate Judiciary Committee that poverty on the Kickapoo reservation, about 50 miles northeast of Topeka, has forced the Indians into the gambling business.

"This is the last gasp," said Lance Burr, general counsel to the Kickapoo tribe.

"The next move will be toxic waste dumps on the reservations. They don't want that."

Burr also testified before the House Federal and State Affairs Committee to oppose a constitutional amendment that would limit all legal gambling to games presently operated by the Kansas Lottery and pari-mutuel dog and horse racing.

Both proposals are efforts to prevent the four Indian tribes in Kansas from starting casinos on their reservations.

The Kickapoo tribe has signed a gambling compact with Gov. Joan Finney.

U.S. Interior Secretary Manual Lujan, however, declined to approve it because Attorney General Bob Stephan said the Kansas Legislature must play a role in the negotiations.

The three other tribes are interested in starting casino gambling. They are the Prairie Band Potawatomi, the Sac and Fox and the Iowa. All three have reservations in northeast Kansas.

Stephan issued an opinion that a 1986 state constitutional amendment allowing the creation of the Kansas Lottery also permits Indians to begin casino operations under the terms of a 1988 federal law.

There appears to be mounting opposition to reservation gambling in the Legislature, although Finney supports it.

"If we were talking about morality, we'd be talking about the average life span of the Kickapoo male. It's 36," Burr told the senators.

"Let's talk about health care for the Kickapoo people, which is atrocious. It has to do more with money."

Some lawmakers are concerned about the impact casino gambling would have on the revenue the state receives from the Kansas Lottery.

"I do not believe the public thought they were legalizing casino gambling," said Sen. Wint Winter Jr., R-Lawrence, the Judiciary Committee's chairman.

"Why not pass a law prohibiting Kansans from going to Las Vegas?" Burr responded.

Steve Cadue, Kickapoo tribal chairman, accused lawmakers of attempting to pass "selective legislation" aimed at Indians.

He told the committee the most serious threat to Indian gaming came from the horse- and dog-racing interests in the state. There is a horse- and dog-racing complex in Kansas City and a dog track in Wichita.

Cadue also said the "ugly specter of racism is rooted in the origin" of the anti-casino legislation.

Winter said he did not believe anyone on either side of the issue was motivated by inappropriate reasons.

"I think it's important that we not engage in name calling," Winter said.

Cadue replied: "I am not engaged in name calling. I have been hurt many, many times by discriminatory polices, in your hometown of Lawrence, in my hometown of Lawrence."

Some senators complained they have not seen the compact Finney signed in January.

Burr presented letters from 25 mayors and county commissioners in northeast Kansas who support casino gambling to the committee.

"Our community is in dire need of economic development," said Gary Weiland, Hiawatha's city administrator. "We had five businesses close last week."

Weiland also said that every week, 15-30 buses of Kansans leave for Minnesota, where Indian gambling is established.

"I believe we should keep that money in the state," he said.

The Senate Judiciary Committee did not vote on the bill.

During the House committee hearing, some lawmakers pointed to reports that organized crime had infiltrated Indian casinos in California and Arizona.

"It's very disconcerting," said Rep. Elizabeth Baker, R-Derby.

"Some of us are concerned about economic development. We really do not believe this is economic development."

Burr said tribal officials met with FBI agents last week, who told them federal agents were unaware of any proven infiltration of Indian gambling casinos by organized crime.

"I think the Kickapoo nation wants to make it as easy as possible to monitor this," he told the House committee.

NCAA, Nebraska goverment at odds

Nebraska universities are finding it difficult to find any side to root for.

Scheduled to go into effect on July 1 of this year, a new bill in the Nebraska legislation requires athletes at Nebraska Division I and II institutions to receive their full amount or "worth" of scholarships and funds. The law, passed last year in the unilateral statehouse, would surpass the present policy governed by NCAA . Their motive was based on sentiments that student athletes had been denied financing because of NCAA limitations on athletic scholarships.

If Nebraska adheres to their state law, Division I and II universities in Nebraska would be providing more money to athletes than any other NCAA university.

On the flip side, the NCAA allows all other sports besides men's football and basketball and women's basketball, gymnastics, tennis and volleyball to use equivalency scholarships. With the new law, those smaller team sports, once able to split one scholarship between five athletes, would have to be receive one full scholarship each. Nebraska would have to award larger, but considerably fewer scholarships.

Blatant discrepancies in guidelines between the state and NCAA place the state's university athletic departments in a precarious position.

Sidelining universities for violating NCAA rules is headline news at least once a year, but now universities in Nebraska could be on probation for awarding more scholarship money to athletes than the NCAA guidelines allow.

"We contacted the NCAA and they informed us if we would not have the authority to get them to change the law, then we would be forced to self-report and be subject to probation and probation with sanctions," Al Papik, University of Nebraska-Lincoln assistant athletic director, said.

Papik, who works with compliance and academic services, said 40-50 students will be affected.

At the NCAA convention in January, Nebraska pushed for changes in the specifications of monetary funding.

"We went to the NCAA convention and were in favor of an honorary athletic bill that was defeated. That put us back to square one. I'm hoping that some Nebraska legislation will come down the pipe," Papik said.

The new bill will be effective July 1 of this year, unless the Legislation passes another bill that would postpone the operative date until July 1, 1994. The bill introduced to the Nebraska Legislature called LB963 is sponsored by a Lincoln senator and is a top priority of the Legislature, according to Papik.

While Nebraska seems to be the only state with a law specifying scholarships awarded to collegiate athletes, other states, including Kansas, have discussed bills to control the NCAA's due process.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan and member of the Kansas Senate judiciary committee, said there has been no discussion of sponsoring an athletic scholarship bill. However, the committee is working on Senate Bill No. 234 which specifies due process requirements for athletic associations.

In the meantime, while Kansas discusses the merits of SB234, Nebraska will consider the merits of LB963 to extend the date until 1994. Nebraska universities should be given at least two years in which they can figure out a way that both entities can follow the same rules

LADY CATS BASKETBALL

Improving on the boards top priority for Yow's crew

STEVEN ROCK
Collegian

The K-State Lady Cats hope some of the Globetrotter magic is left over on the Bramlage Coliseum floor.

The Cats, 2-6 in Big Eight conference play, host the Oklahoma Sooners, 3-5, tonight in Manhattan, and Coach Susan Yow sees the game as an opportunity to get back on a victorious roll.

"We are wanting to get back on the winning track," Yow said. "I think the team is really focused."

Tonight's matchup is the second meeting of the year between the two squads. Led by a career-high 35 points from senior guard Mary Jo Miller, the Lady Cats won the first outing, 91-86, in Norman.

"I'll have no complaints if Mary Jo Miller has 35 points again," Yow said. The performance of Mary Jo Miller, however, will not be the key in tonight's game.

However, rebounding might be. The Sooners outrebounded the Lady Cats in the Jan. 18 meeting.

"In Oklahoma, we felt like we dodged a bullet," Yow said, in reference to the 48-32 edge the Sooners held on the boards. "We've got to box out."

Coach Yow wasn't the only one to notice Oklahoma's rebounding dominance.

"They crash the boards like you wouldn't believe," said Jennifer Grebing, senior center for the Cats. "That was basically their offense — getting the offensive rebound and sticking it back in."

The Lady Cats are looking to make amends.

"We would like nothing more than to redeem ourselves," Yow said. The team has been working, on a daily basis, to improve its rebounding game.

"That's an area that we've been weak in all year," she said. "We've really gone back to the drawing board."

Another concern for the Lady Cats is Carin Stites of Oklahoma. Stites is averaging 14.9 points a game and leads the Big Eight conference with 49 three-pointers.

"Our team has a lot of respect for her," Yow said. "We have to."

The players do indeed recognize Stite's ability.

"She's an intense player," Grebing said.

The Lady Cats have won six of the last seven meetings between the two clubs. That mark includes three in a row at Bramlage.

Tonight's game, when all is said and done, may be determined by the team with the strongest mentality.

"The team that has the focus, the desire, and the drive will come out on top," Yow said. "We need to play hard."

A mark in the win column may not be the only driving force behind the Lady Cats tonight; the Cats want to win one for the crowd.

"I would like to play real well for the home crowd," Yow said.

GLOBETROTTERS

Tricky Trotters trounce Generals

COLLEGIAN STAFF

The fancy tricks aren't what they used to be, yet the excitement remains intact. So who cares about mistakes?

The Harlem Globetrotters greeted about 4,000 Bramlage Coliseum fans with their usual hijinks played to the strains of "Sweet Georgia Brown" Tuesday night.

Oh, sure, "Sweet Lou" Dunbar and his troupe had their moments, and they trounced the hapless Washington Generals, but, gee:

"Didn't it all seem funnier when we were children?" asked one mother of another.

Others said they wondered, "Doesn't that water-confetti trick get a little tired after so many years?"

Then again, when Curly "Boo" Johnson tried to shield himself from a water-dousing by hiding behind a child, we still laughed.

And then when one of the Generals was charged for attempted murder after fouling Matthew "Shonus" Jackson, some of us still fell on the floor.

Certainly, it wasn't a basketball game for the purists. But those who were there to rekindle childhood memories and introduce their children to classic Americana were themselves children again.

"They're traveling all over the floor," said one disgruntled fan.

"Shut up," replied a neighbor.

Missouri next road test for Cats

COLLEGIAN STAFF

K-State will renew its second longest series at 7 tonight, when it takes on No. 9 Missouri at Hearnes Center. The game will be broadcast on Prime Sports Network (cable channel 24) and on WIBW-AM 580.

Missouri is 16-3 overall and 4-2 in Big Eight play. The Cats enter the game 12-7 and 2-4. Though the Cats hold a 100-92 series edge, Missouri leads the series 52-34 in Columbia, including last year's 62-60 conquest. The Tigers have a seven-game winning streak over the Cats at Hearnes.

In that game, MU's Jeff Warren rebounded an Anthony Peeler air ball and laid it in with 1.4 seconds on the clock for the game winner. K-State trailed by as many as 12 points during the second half of that game, but Jean Derouillere knotted the game at 60-60 with 21 seconds showing.

Last Saturday, the Cats picked up a much-needed 70-66 win over Nebraska, who had slain No. 2 Oklahoma State earlier in the week. After the Huskers built a 64-54 lead with 6:42 left to play, the Cats went on a 9-0 streak fueled by Gaylon Nickerson free throws.

Wylie Howard then tied the game at 66-66 with a 15-foot jumper and a free throw, and Ski Jones hit his Bramlage Coliseum record seventh trey to seal the win.

Jones' game-high 25 points on 9-of-18 shooting shed memories of recent lackluster outings. Over his previous seven outings, Jones had been averaging just 9.3 points and had connected on just 32 percent of his shots.

With just seven points against Missouri, Jones will pass Steve Henson for fifth place on K-State's all-time sophomore scoring chart.

Another standout of late has been Marcus Zeigler, who continues to lead the Big Eight with a 3.9-1 assist-turnover ratio. Against NU, Zeigler had 10 assists.

As a team, K-State has the second-highest scoring bench in the Big Eight, averaging 25.7 points a game. The Cats are 7-1 when the bench scores at least 25 points.

Another facet of K-State's game is the team's clutch free-throw shooting. Although the Cats' season free-throw percentage is a mediocre 66.7-percent, they are shooting 75.5 percent during the final three minutes of the game.

After Missouri, the Cats will continue their road trip, traveling to Norman, Okla., for a nationally televised Sunday meeting with 14-6 and 2-5 Oklahoma.

OLYMPICS DIGEST

How can we make it up to you, Norway?

The U.S. Alpine team has offered Norway the use of some of its coaching staff after an American skier crashed into a Norwegian coach and broke his leg.

Norwegian coach Ole Magne Valaker remained hospitalized Tuesday in Chambery, where doctors were considering operating, said Armand Carlsen, assistant chief of the Norwegian Olympic mission.

Valaker, 23, was struck Monday by Megan Gerety, 20, after she ignored warnings that the super giant slalom had been closed so coaches could mark the trail edge with twigs.

"We definitely are taking it upon ourselves to make sure that we provide whatever assistance we can," said Tom Kelly, press officer of the U.S. women's Alpine ski team.

"We can't replace their coach, but we don't want their athletes to be disadvantaged by this.

"One of our coaches helped them set up a slalom course (today). We will continue to do that throughout the games," Kelly said.

U.S. hockey team hands Germany 2-0 shutout

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MERIBEL, France — Ray LeBlanc did something that even the flag-draped Jim Craig couldn't manage.

LeBlanc made 46 saves Tuesday, posting the first U.S. shutout since 1964, as the United States beat Germany, 2-0, and got off to its best start since the unbeaten, gold-medal team of 1960.

Not even Craig, the gold-medal goalie in 1980, had a game in Lake Placid in which he stopped every shot. And not even America's "Miracle on Ice" team won its first two games.

"You always want to do like Jim Craig did in 1980 and be a hero," LeBlanc said.

"I just wanted to make the team. A lot of these people had never heard of me."

"We're riding high, we're riding the tide right now," defenseman Moe Mantha said. "We've got a lot of young guys, and we're riding the emotion."

Mantha helped preserve LeBlanc's shutout by sweeping away Gerd Truntschka's first-period shot after the goalie got trapped behind the net.

"I saved him that time, but he saved us a lot of times," said Mantha, who also assisted on Marty McInnis's tiebreaking goal in the second period.

"You can't ask for more. What Ray did was awesome."

What Ray did was historic.

Patrick Rupp, in 1964, was the last American goalie to record a shutout, also against Germany. Their's are the only two U.S. shutouts since World War II.

LeBlanc's was also the first shutout of these Winter Games.

Not bad for a guy who has been ignored by NHL teams for six successive seasons.

In October, the 27-year-old LeBlanc — whose entire NHL career consists of one game on the bench as a backup — was sent down to the International Hockey League's Indianapolis Ice by the Chicago Blackhawks.

"Ever since I was little, I always wanted to play in the NHL," LeBlanc said. "Maybe this will help me out."

Out of the "I," as pro players call the IHL, which is known as a hockey graveyard, and maybe even out of the Pepsi-Cola plant in Indianapolis, where he spends his offseasons filling commercial soft-drink cylinders.

"I mix the carbonation into the pop," LeBlanc said.

He provided the right mix Tuesday, stopping shots from everywhere in the Olympic rink.

Though he made 31 saves in the first two periods, many of Germany's shots came from long range.

It was in the third period, when he made 15 saves, that LeBlanc was at his best.

He stopped Raimond Hilger and Georg Holzmann from point-blank range and slammed the door on Dieter Hegen's breakaway attempt.

Finally, with 8:04 to play, Ted Donato's power-play goal gave LeBlanc and the United States some breathing room.

"There's no question that Ray's performance was outstanding," said U.S. coach Dave Peterson, who was critical of 1988 goalies Mike Richter and Chris Terreri.

"It would be our hope that he doesn't have to make that many saves in the future."

It was the second strong game for LeBlanc, who made 20 saves — many of them tougher than his typical save against Germany — as the Americans opened the Olympics with a 6-3 victory over Italy.

"That's what's going to help us win," Mantha said.

"You need a hot goaltender to win in the Olympics, and, with Ray, you just shake your head and say, 'Holy cow, how can he make that save?'"

RESIDENCE HALLS

Outlet shortage not crucial enough to merit rewiring

AMY CLARK
Collegian

The lack of enough electrical outlets in residence hall rooms has been a concern of some students.

There are no plans in the near future, however, for the addition of outlets in these rooms.

Eric Rasmussen, junior in mechanical engineering, is one student who said he believes the lack of outlets doesn't seem safe.

A resident of Goodnow Hall, Rasmussen said he has 18 items plugged into the five outlets in his room. They include a television, a refrigerator and a computer.

He said he isn't sure how safe it is to have so many things plugged into the outlets.

"It's not a big problem," he said, "but it doesn't look like the safest way to do it."

And it could be a long time before K-State residence halls have electrical outlets added to the rooms.

Gene Wiley, maintenance superintendent of the housing department, said there are no plans to add outlets.

He said it would be expensive to add outlets to every room.

Since all of the funds for the residence halls come from the residents themselves, the addition of outlets would cause the residents to pay a lot more money.

This addition would also be a complicated task.

"We can't provide the same amount of electricity you would have in a house," Wiley said.

Because many of the residence halls were built between the 1950s and 1960s, he said, they weren't designed for all the electrical appliances currently available.

He said there isn't enough power in Boyd or Putnam halls at the present time to rewire, since they were built in the early '50s.

Wiley also said he hasn't heard about any recent formal complaints.

"We don't like to hear complaints. We try to do everything we can," he said.

In the meantime, students are going to have to deal with the amount of outlets in dorm rooms.

Food service class requires working in local restaurants

TRACI WHITTEN
Collegian

One of the requirements for K-State hotel and restaurant management students is to work in different restaurants in Manhattan.

They get to experience something different when taking Food Service Systems, it has a requirement to work three weeks in a restaurant and three weeks in either Kramer or Van Zile food center.

Pat Pesci, program director for the department of hotel and restaurant management and instructor of the class, said he assigns the restaurants to the students.

If students have past experience in fine dining, they will be placed at a fast-food restaurant. If students have experience in a fast-food restaurant, they will be placed at a fine dining restaurant.

By doing this, the students get experience in areas with which they are not familiar.

Students also have an opportunity to see how different facilities operate.

They observe the staff and procedures used at the restaurants, which gives them a chance to decide what is done right and what needs improvement, Pesci said.

"I think this class is a tremendous experience if the students approach it in the right way," Pesci said.

Students have to be self-sufficient and take initiative in the program, he said.

Carlos O'Kelly's Mexican Cafe has been participating in this program for the past three years.

Jim Wright, Carlos O'Kelly's manager, said the restaurant handles seven to 10 students a semester. These students work in various aspects of food production and management.

The students start with learning food preparation, cook on the front line and eventually move to the front of the restaurant, where they are hosts, bartenders and assistants to the managers.

"We find each student is unique in various levels of awareness and experience," Wright said.

"While working at Carlos O'Kelly's and Kramer Food Center, I thought the people were friendly and very helpful," said Jeff Forkenbrock, senior in hotel and restaurant management.

"I think Carlos O'Kelly's is one of the best restaurants in town, and working there has been a great experience," said Philip Perkins, senior in hotel and restaurant management.

Students also get the opportunity to work at places such as the Manhattan Emergency Shelter and the Quik Cats convenience store in the basement of Van Zile Hall.

Computer

the load of all the CNS staff, so a lot of people would have to use PCs.

Kruh said that if the mainframe were moved to KU, an effort would be made to continue all services available now to students, faculty and staff.

He said all BITMAIL accounts and mainframe services would still be available and, most likely, at no cost.

Staff members also voiced a concern that the proposal was created to help KU pay for a new mainframe.

Several staff members said they had heard KU was having trouble paying for its mainframe.

But Coffman, who said the idea came up in informal discussion with directors of computing services at KU, said it was one that would be of mutual benefit to both K-State and KU.

Mike Miller, associate director for University Computing Activities, said CNS currently employs five full-time staff, six student operators and five student dispatchers/output processors.

Miller said the department had not been told what would happen to those employees if the mainframe is phased out.

"Should this idea actually become a proposal, employees would be our No. 1 concern," Coffman said. "But that's too far in the future to speculate what would happen."

Transmission of records would be through phone lines leased from Southwestern Bell or AT&T, Coffman said, and security could be ensured by the sophistication of computer technology.

"Companies do outsourcing all the time," he said. "There are a number of ways you can ensure security."

Kruh said records would still be handled by only authorized K-State officials and controls would be well-positioned.

"Only our people would access our records. Anything else would be unacceptable," he said.

Leasing could be financed through the money saved on annual licensing fees, having a common set of software and maintenance of the system, Kruh said.

Kruh said location of the mainframe is immaterial.

"It could be in Boulder, Colo. If it works well, no one cares or even notices where it is," he said.

CAMPUS CRIME

Police kill Kent State suspect after he shoots at apartment windows

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KENT, Ohio — A man killed by police near Kent State University was identified as the gunman in one campus shooting and may be linked to another shooting in which a university employee was killed, investigators said Tuesday.

Mark Cunningham, 35, a 1985 Kent State graduate in fine arts, was shot Monday night after shooting out windows at an apartment complex near campus, police said.

The shooting was the third at the northeastern Ohio school since Dec. 12. In addition, three other people have been shot to death on other Ohio campuses in the last five months.

Police did not release any other information on Cunningham, who lived in Kent, about 10 miles northeast of Akron.

But University Police Chief John Peach told reporters Tuesday that Cunningham closely matches the description of a man sought in the other two campus shootings.

Peach said ballistics tests would be conducted to determine if the .38-caliber handgun used in the Monday night shooting is the same one used to wound Sarah Smith, 25, on Jan. 29, and kill university janitor John Frazier, 51, on Dec. 12 in the student union building.

Smith identified Cunningham as her attacker Tuesday.

Peach and City Police Chief William Lillich said Cunningham fired five rounds at pursuing campus officers late Monday after he shot at the apartment building. The officers fired back but missed.

Then city Officer Jack Herman fired at Cunningham, wounding him in the right side. Cunningham died at Robinson Memorial Hospital in Ravenna, police said.

Peach said a task force of city and campus police officers investigating the two earlier shootings had prepared a psychological profile of the type of person who would stalk the campus with a loaded gun.

That profile had been compared with what police have learned about Cunningham.

"A number of things seem to match," Peach said, refusing to elaborate.

Kent State President Carol Cartwright urged the 24,500 students on campus Tuesday to be cautious

Bush steps up CFC phaseout

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Alarmed by forecasts of a new ozone hole, President Bush changed course Tuesday and announced a significant speedup in phasing out ozone-destroying chemicals by American manufacturers.

Bush said the United States would phase out production of ozone-damaging chemicals, mainly chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs), by the end of 1995, five years earlier than agreed upon under an international treaty.

The president said the United States was acting unilaterally. He urged other nations to follow suit.

Bush had been under pressure from environmentalists to accelerate the phaseout, particularly after the findings of increased levels of ozone-depleting chemicals. Until John Sununu's resignation late last year as Bush's chief of staff, the administration had refused to move faster.

The move comes on the eve of Bush's formal declaration of candidacy for re-election and could strengthen his hand among environmentalists.

Ozone in the upper atmosphere helps shield Earth from the destructive effects of ultraviolet radiation. Excess exposure to ultraviolet rays is known to cause skin cancer and cataracts and to suppress the human immune system. The natural radiation can also damage plants and ocean plankton.

Under terms of an international agreement called the Montreal Protocol, the United States and other industrialized nations had pledged to halt production of CFCs by 2000.

Bush's action comes after last week's government report saying the ozone layer was being depleted at a much faster rate than had been believed.

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration reported discovery of dangerous levels of ozone-destroying chemicals over Canada, the United States and Europe.

That prompted renewed calls for a stepped-up effort to eliminate industrial chemicals thought to cause the problem.

The NASA report said aircraft and satellite studies show chlorine monoxide, a chemical that destroys the ozone layer, reached record levels over parts of the Northern Hemisphere during some days in January.

In some measurements, the chemical was found to be as high as 1.5 parts per billion, a level that one

CITY COMMISSION

Lack of incentives holds back curbside recycling programs

LISA TINNIN
Collegian

As long as there is no financial value on trash, many people feel there is little or no incentive to recycle.

Recycling problems were discussed at Tuesday's Manhattan City Commission work session.

"There is an enthusiasm for recycling, but people don't want to pay," Commissioner Roger Maughmer said.

Composting yard waste, although it cannot technically be considered recycling, eliminates 17 percent of the space in the landfills and is the most effective.

Several curbside recycling programs have been implemented, but people aren't willing to put forth the effort or the money. In the northwest section of Manhattan, 1,000 homes were solicited a year ago to start a curbside program.

"Of those 1,000, only 100 or so homes agreed to try the program. The cost of sorting at the curb was $1.70 per household per month," said Dan Harden, director of Public Works in Riley County.

It did not catch on as well as hoped, he said.

With so few participants, the program was terminated.

A similar program was started in Lenexa.

"One trash hauler was hired, and everyone in the city pays $1.50," said Bruce McCallum, Manhattan Public Works director. "But only 50-60 percent of the households participate."

The other 40-45 percent of the households are paying for it, yet not utilizing the program, he said.

"We can't tell the public the best decision for them," Maughmer said. "No one did curbside recycling when it was less than 10 cents a day. I can't see the public involved with it now.

"Recycling has not caught on here or nationwide," Commissioner Helen Cooper said.

There is no market for recycling, Harden said, and there is also no financial incentive for the waste companies.

"We must make recycling economically feasible and economically beneficial for it to work," said Karen McCulloh, Riley County Recycling Committee member.

Shooting

until authorities determine if Cunningham was involved in all three shootings.

"None of us are going to breathe any sigh of relief until we have the lab results and more conclusive information," she said.

Student Matt Houghton, 20, a sophomore from Carlisle, Pa., said he was not convinced Cunningham was involved in all the shootings.

"I figure I'll wait and find out," he said. "I hope to God he's the person. I don't like walking around the campus with a person like that running around."

Kirsten Simons, 20, a junior from Toledo, said she is taking no chances.

"I don't think it's been resolved. I don't think we can assume it's the same man," she said.

Elsewhere in Ohio, a man with a shotgun opened fire in a lobby at Central State University in October, killing a freshman and wounding a visitor at the southwestern Ohio school.

In November, a shot fired from a passing car hit an Ohio University senior sitting in his rented house four blocks from the Athens campus in southeastern Ohio. The student bled to death.

At the University of Toledo in January, a nursing student was found dead in the snow, shot 14 times.

Campus crime data are not available to evaluate long-term trends, because private colleges and universities were not obligated to compile crime statistics until a federal law passed in 1990.

In Ohio, only the 13 state-subsidized colleges and universities have been reporting crime data to the FBI, and in 1990 they reported there were no murders. Figures from 1991 are not available yet.

Nationwide, the U.S. Department of Justice reports crime levels have been decreasing since 1981, with 8 percent fewer violent crimes in 1990 than in 1981.

The FBI reports a slight decline in the nationwide murder rate in the 1980s.

Minority policy muddy

Scholarships needed to build diversity, Bosco says

RICHARD ANDRADE
Collegian

Universities around the country are waiting for guidelines from the U.S. Department of Education to help schools decipher the status of minority scholarships.

"The whole thing has been a total muddle," said Dorothy Thompson, associate University attorney.

"The question is, 'In what circumstances and in what ways can institutions operate a scholarship program that takes race and ethnicity into account?'"

The question was brought into the spotlight in December 1990 when a Department of Education official told Fiesta Bowl officials that plans for a $100,000 minority scholarship program would run afoul of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Title VI prohibits discrimination on the grounds of race, color, or national origin in any program or activity receiving federal financial assistance.

Although all K-State scholarship funds come from private sources, under Title VI, the school technically could not distribute race-exclusive scholarships unless they were created by Congress or used to remedy proven discrimination.

The outcry to such a reading of the policy has been clear.

U.S. Secretary of Education Lamar Alexander said in a press release put out by the Department of Education that "a college president with ... some common sense and a minimum amount of good legal advice can provide minority students with financial aid and may use financial aid to create campus diversity without violating federal laws."

Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life, said one of the basic principles of minority scholarships is that they are crucial to building cultural and ethnic diversity on college campuses.

"K-State is committed to improving overall diversity," Bosco said.

"Minority scholarships are essential because they reward academic performance, extracurricular activities, and they allow us to establish a program that glorifies differences."

He said that of the $3.5 million used for scholarships, only $50,000 is set aside for minority students.

"Trying to establish a diverse student community is a legitimate goal," Thompson said.

She said the first draft of the guidelines has been made public, and the Department of Education is now soliciting comments about it before it goes back to be modified.

Literacy Corps shuts down

Too little money, too heavy workloads take toll on tutoring program for children

TRACI WHITTEN
Collegian

This is the last semester for K-State students to participate in the Literacy Corps program.

The program, which tutors at-risk children, started two years ago when K-State received a federal grant. The money was originally supposed to help continue friendship tutoring, a volunteer tutoring program.

But the program required volunteer students to tutor 60 hours a semester.

Karen McColloh, coordinator for the Literacy Corps program, said this was a difficult work load, and that part of the program did not work well.

The program has been discontinued because the grant money is gone.

McColloh said she would like to see the grade schools and middle schools continue the program by funding it themselves. Or, she said, a graduate teaching assistant could coordinate the program and get involved with recruiting students to volunteer.

The problem is there would be no paid staff to keep it going, she said.

K-State students do receive credit and grades, but to do so, they are required to tutor four hours a week at Manhattan Middle School or Woodrow Wilson Grade School. They must also do paperwork throughout the semester, McColloh said.

Danielle Iacovetta, sight supervisor, said the number of at-risk children who attend the tutor sessions varies from day to day, but most of the time, there are more students to be tutored than there are tutors.

"I think the program is successful, but I wish the ratio of tutors to tutorees was smaller," Iacovetta said.

At-risk can have many definitions. The children may have a problematic home life, be failing classes in school or be at-risk of not graduating from high school, Iacovetta said.

Once the tutor defines the problem with the at-risk child, it is easier to help them, said Pam Cyphers, tutor and senior in elementary education.

KANSAS BOARD OF REGENTS

Suspended member investigated

State-aid scheme one of 15 allegations against McDowell

ASSOCIATED PRESS

INDEPENDENCE — A formal inquisition has been scheduled this week into alleged wrongdoings at Independence Community College, the Independence Daily Reporter said Tuesday.

The newspaper said the secret sessions Wednesday and Thursday would be conducted by an assistant to Attorney General Bob Stephan, whose office would not confirm the investigation.

The inquisition follows the suspension last week of Jo Ann McDowell, who has been president for nearly five years.

The Kansas Board of Regents also notified McDowell, who is a member of the board, that it intended to fire her.

Trustees gave McDowell's lawyer a list of 15 allegations that led to their action.

They cited her alleged role in a scheme to boost state aid by reporting an inflated enrollment, intimidation of trustees by threatening lawsuits and failure to manage the college business office.

McDowell dismissed the allegations as ridiculous, false and politically motivated.

"It hurts me that they would create a laundry list of reasons to justify a decision they had already made," she said.

"I know this list was put together after they took the vote to begin termination proceedings ... ."

The Reporter said records listing the specific allegations that are the subject of the inquisition as well as the names of those ordered to testify are on file, but they are sealed in Shawnee County District Court in Topeka.

An inquisition is an infrequently used investigative tool — similar to a grand-jury investigation — that must be approved by a judge and in which witnesses are called under subpoena and required to testify under oath before a prosecutor.

scientist called "alarming."

Atmospheric molecules of chlorine monoxide and bromine monoxide react in the presence of sunlight to cause a thinning of the ozone layer. Thus, by measuring the levels of these chemicals, scientists can predict the level of ozone destruction.

Most of the destructive chlorine and bromine chemicals come from releases of industrial CFCs and halons. CFCs are used principally as refrigerants and halons are used as fire suppressants.

Bush said current U.S. production of ozone-depleting chemicals already was more than 40 percent below the levels currently allowed by the Montreal Protocol, and more than 20 percent ahead of Europe's non-aerosol production phaseout.

FACULTY

Low pay hurts University all around

K-State instructors paid less than counterparts at most peer institutions

DENISE UPHOFF
Collegian

Average faculty salaries at K-State fell in 1990-91 to 15 percent below the average of five peer institutions, according to a report released by Faculty Senate in December 1991.

According to the report, K-State ranks fifth out of six peer institutions with an average faculty salary $6,127 lower than the average salary of its peers — Colorado State, Iowa State, North Carolina State, Oklahoma State and Oregon State.

The report further ranked K-State last among the Big Eight Conference universities with an average salary of $5,096 below that of other universities in the Big Eight.

Bradley Fenwick, Faculty Senate president-elect and associate professor of pathology, said the report is used to document the current state of faculty salaries and also the trends.

"It gives us a sense of how well the faculty here at K-State is doing on a national scale with faculty at institutions very similar to our University," Fenwick said.

"This report is the result of a first-rate study," said University President Jon Wefald in a press release after the report. "It details the most significant challenge facing this institution in its efforts to maintain quality programs in academics research and service."

Historically, state appropriations for faculty salaries at K-State have been lower compared to its peer institutions, Provost James Coffman said.

"The current salary deficit compared to peers and the average land grants took 25 years to develop," Coffman said.

The report also shows that because of its low salaries, K-State is experiencing increasing difficulty in recruiting faculty.

For example, the economics department reported it had filled two positions, but the top three candidates for the jobs all declined K-State's offer because of higher offers elsewhere.

"It makes it difficult to attract as new faculty members the best and the brightest," Fenwick said. "And what you end up getting are the third- or fourth-string new Ph.D. people."

Fenwick said K-State also has trouble retaining faculty.

"K-State is becoming a training center for junior faculty who come here and then leave for higher paying positions elsewhere after gaining experience," he said.

"The data clearly shows that we lose more faculty here to other institutions then our peers."

According to examples in the report, the College of Education had one assistant professor resign to take a position as an elementary school principal for twice the pay.

Similarly, an atomic physicist left the physics department for a larger salary at Tulane University.

"To find that the greatest loss has been among our senior faculty is a real injustice," Wefald said in the press release.

"Basically, this indicates that those faculty who made a commitment to make this institution a national leader in education while providing essential research and service to the citizens of Kansas have been ignored," he said.

"Such injustice can no longer be accepted."

In 1988, the Kansas Legislature passed a three-year plan designed to address the salary situation at K-State and the other Kansas Board of Regents schools.

The Margin of Excellence, however, was dropped before the third year because of a lack of funding needed.

"The Margin of Excellence helped, and we would be in a far worse situation had it not been for those two years," said John Havlin, chairman of the Faculty Senate Salaries and Fringe Benefits Committee.

"But we're back to ground zero again."

To help increase K-State's competitiveness at the higher ranks, Coffman said, K-State has implemented a promotion-related salary increase.

Effective fiscal year 1992, promotion to associate professor have an automatic add-on of 5 percent of the current faculty salary, he said.

Promotion to full professor will have an add-on of 7.5 percent of the current average faculty salary.

Havlin said the promotion-related salary increase is not enough.

"Kansas has got to find the consistent resources to maintain faculty salaries at a minimum of the average peer," he said.

Salary inversion, compression dulls competitive edge

DEREK BOHLKEN
Collegian

Low faculty salaries and salary compression, worsened by state budget cuts, may soon make it difficult for K-State to compete with its peer institutions in hiring and retaining quality faculty.

Sixteen letters from department heads appeared in the Faculty Senate's report on the status of faculty salaries and fringe benefits published for the first time in three years November 1991. These letters described problems with salaries within the departments.

Roger Trenary, member of the Faculty Senate subcommittee on faculty salaries and associate professor of economics, said in fields where salaries are increasing at dramatic rates, "you're just going to have compression."

Compression, Trenary said, occurs when departments must offer higher salaries in order to hire new faculty, and the salary gap between new faculty and senior faculty diminishes.

The colleges most likely to have problems, Trenary said, are business and engineering, and fields related to business and engineering.

However, the heads of several non-related departments responded to the Senate's request for feedback about salaries.

In his letter to the Faculty Senate, Department of Physics Head James Legg said his department is in a crisis.

He reported the physics department has lost faculty and has been unable to hire new faculty to fill the vacant positions.

"The assumption," Trenary said, "is that those departments that responded are the ones having the most problems."

With salaries increasing faster nationally than at K-State, he said, departments have to use more of their budgets to hire new faculty and less of their budgets for salary raises for senior faculty.

Compression is the result, he said.

David Soldan, head of the Department of Electrical and Computer Engineering, expressed alarm at the growing salary compression in his department.

"When the situation is like it is now," he said, "where people have been doing an outstanding job for nine or 10 years, and they're making the same salary as new professors, two things happen: The high achievers get discouraged, and the new professors are less aggressive in their jobs.

"They ask ,'Why should I bust my butt if I'm not going to be rewarded for it?' It has an immeasurable effect on faculty performance.

"Some departments have actually given more to new professors than they give some associate professors who have been here for years. That creates some real morale problems."

In his letter to Faculty Senate, Thomas Roche, head of the Department of Biochemistry, described his department as having "gone beyond problems of compression to very serious problems of salary inversion."

Salary inversion occurs when it is necessary to pay salaries higher than what some current faculty make in order to hire new faculty members, Trenary said.

"In America, the ethic is if you work hard, you will get rewarded," Soldan said.

"We have people who've been with us for eight or nine years — one associate professor has won four or five teaching awards — but we have no way to reward people like that."

The faculty members "know what they make, and they know what their peers at other universities are making, and that doesn't help morale, either," Soldan said.

"When the economy recovers, the situation will get worse, because the offers will start coming in from all over the country," he said. "And even if they like teaching in Kansas, they'll start leaving.

Music!

Terry Waldo's Gotham City Band
Friday, February 14, 8 p.m.
Make Valentine's Day special with a concert of hot jazz, songs, and dances from the Roaring Twenties. Witty and widely-recorded Terry Waldo leads a masterful tribute to Jelly Roll Morton, the legendary New Orleans pianist, hustler, pool shark, and self-proclaimed inventor of jazz. Gotham City played an unprecedented two months in Michael's Pub in New York, winning raves from Time and Variety. Guest artists include singer Ruth Brisbane and "eccentric" dance specialist Betsy Baytos, who'll teach you the Charleston and conduct a dance contest.

"A perfect combination of authenticity and affection that makes this gig truly celebratory of Morton and the spirit of New Orleans jazz. (Newark Star-Ledger)

TUITION

Students may pay $66 more next fall

Fees wouldn't be affected
if increase passes

KEITH LEFF
Collegian

The Kansas Board of Regents has tentatively approved an increase in tuition from $662.00 this semester to $728.00 for next semester.

Doug Ackley, assistant controller for cashiering and student loans, said these figures account for tuition only. The remaining $187.45, for a total balance of $849.45 this semester, constitutes campus privilege fees.

Ackley said the board has not yet determined if the campus privilege fees will change.

If they do not change, the total amount students will pay next semester could be $915.45, he said.

Sally Routson, assistant dean of student life, said the amount each student contributes when paying fees depends on whether the student is full-time and a Kansas resident.

She said 25 percent of a student's education is paid for with tuition. The rest is paid with state funds.

University Registrar Don Foster said $662 of the $849.45 students paid this semester goes for tuition.

Routson said the remaining $187.45, which makes up the campus privilege fees, goes to various programs such as Student Services Support.

Routson said Student Services uses the money for things such as the renovation of Holton Hall.

Student fees also fund University revenue bonds, which finance refunding bonds and coliseum bonds, she said.

Refunding bonds encompass the funding for KSU Stadium, the K-State Union and the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Coliseum bonds encompass the funding of Bramlage Coliseum.

LEGISLATURE

Vehicle tax revision considered

Dealers, manufacturers support bill, which calls for state to set fee schedule

AMY COX
Collegian

TOPEKA — Although the bill appeared to have broad support, some members of a House committee remained skeptical Tuesday about a proposal to change the way motor vehicles are taxed.

The House Taxation Committee is considering a plan to abolish property taxes on motor vehicles and replace them with a schedule of fees set by the state.

The bill would cut vehicle taxes in some counties, but it would increase them in others.

Supporters of the measure included a Shawnee County citizens' group, car and recreational vehicle dealers, and recreational vehicle manufacturers.

They said passage of the bill would help taxpayers and could stimulate vehicle sales.

"The adverse perception of the public toward these property taxes is really our biggest enemy," said Tommy McGeeney, president of the Kansas Independent Automobile Dealers Association.

Currently, vehicles are taxed based on their appraised values and on the property tax levies in each of the state's 105 counties.

Under the bill, the vehicle taxes would depend on the original dealer's cost for the vehicle and its age.

For example, a person who bought a car worth between $10,000 and $20,000 new next year would pay a $400 fee. If the car were 15 years old, the tax would be only $12.

One group, Citizens Against Vehicular Extortion, said Kansas has the highest vehicle taxes in the nation and that those taxes can be more than four times the national average.

"How high is the personal property tax in Kansas?" said Don Christman, president of a Topeka recreational vehicle dealership.

"It is high enough that I regularly have customers tell me they cannot buy my product."

The bill would cut vehicle taxes in Shawnee County by $3.93 million, or nearly 19 percent. Taxes in Sedgwick County would decline by about 5 percent, or $2.38 million.

However, taxes in 53 counties would increase.

In Johnson County, they would increase by almost 9 percent, or $4.74 million. In Stevens County, they would increase by a whopping 224 percent.

"Someone in Stevens County might notice that," said Rep. Gene Shore, R-Johnson, whose district includes the county.

"It seems to me we never get around to discussing how you really reduce property taxes, and that's cut spending," said Rep. Vince Snowbarger, R-Olathe.

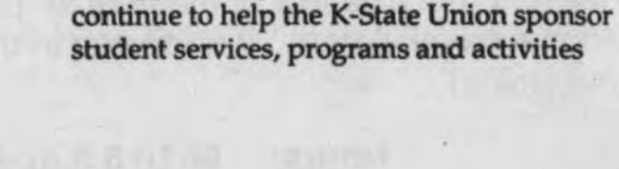
Announcing low-interest loans for high-performance machines.



Here's how you can afford an Apple® Macintosh® computer, even if you can't afford a Macintosh.

Qualifying students, parents borrowing on behalf of students, and faculty and staff members with an annual salary of at least $15,000, can purchase a Macintosh using the Apple Computer Loan program.

Apply to borrow from $1,500 to $10,000 for the computer, other Apple products—including the AppleCare® extended service plan, and up to three software packages.

If you're a student, you'll be able to defer principal payments for up to 48 months while in school, making interest-only payments until 30 days after you graduate or leave school. Interest rates are surprisingly low, and you can take up to eight years to repay.*

So stop by and fill out an Apple Computer Loan application today. You could be driving a very powerful machine sooner than you think.

*The interest rate is the average of the higher of the 30-day or 90-day commercial paper rates as reported in the Wall Street Journal, plus a spread of 4.35%. After June 30, 1992, the spread may increase if program costs increase, but will not exceed 5.6%; existing borrowers would be notified at least 30 days in advance. The loan may be prepaid at any time without penalty. For the month of October, 1991, the rate was 10.068%, with an annual percentage rate of 11.4035%. This rate would result in monthly payments of $18.81 for every $1,000 borrowed. The total finance charge for each $1,000 borrowed would be $442.87. If you elect to defer principal payments for four years, the APR on your loan will be 11.0327%. Your monthly payments during the deferment period will be $8.28, and your first monthly payment of principal and interest will be $29.67 per every $1,000 borrowed. The total finance charge on every $1,000 you borrow will be $647.24. The interest rate is subject to increase after you have received the loan. Each applicant pays a $20.00 non-refundable application fee. Approved borrowers will be charged a 4% loan origination fee. Loan applications after June 30, 1992, may be subject to a higher loan origination fee. The loan origination fee will be added to the requested loan amount and repaid over the life of the loan.

ECONOMY

Market weak for December graduates

STACY WATERS
Collegian

While it's still too early to tell what the job market is like for last December's graduates, it is also too early to give up the job search.

Jim Akin, director of Career Planning and Placement Center, said he believes K-State graduates are well prepared to face the competition.

"Many or most of our people will get jobs," Akin said.

The deteriorating economy and the Persian Gulf War have led to stiff competition and a more competitive job market, he said.

Jim Ragan, professor of economics, said it will take longer for people to find jobs, there will be less multiple job offers, and graduates may have to take jobs below their expectations.

Mike Kalpin, December graduate in human resource management, said the job market is not good.

He said, however, that he expects to have a job within a few weeks.

"It's not something I went to college for, but at least it will get me by."

The number of companies visiting campus dropped from 182 during fall 1990 to 161 during fall 1991.

On-campus interviews dropped from 4,251 during fall 1990 to 3,923 during fall 1991, Akin said.

The recession and the gulf war caused company cancellations, he said. Some companies lost government contracts, and the lost business made it harder for them to hire college graduates, he said.

"In anticipation of a tight job market, I tried to make contacts with employers ahead of the contacts made through campus interviews," said Ryan Goering, December graduate in accounting and finance.

"The job market, after talking to other people in my classes, seemed pretty damn grim," he said.

Ragan said the economy is still weak.

"I have the opinion that this is one of the weaker job markets since 1982," he said.

Akin said technical and professional fields, such as milling science, computers and engineering, are good fields in both good and bad economic times. He said these fields transfer class experience directly to the job.

The Nov. 11, 1991, issue of U.S. News and World Report showed the fields that likely will continue to be in demand are accounting, architecture, education, electronic engineering, finance, health-care management, human resource management, law, marketing and nursing.

Because of the poor economy and the stiff competition of the job market, some students decide to wait before searching for a job.

Becky Taylor, December graduate in journalism and mass communications, is in an apprenticeship program through the Kansas Regents Educational Communication Center.

The experimental program simulates a first job. The purpose of the program is to see if it helps students get a step up in the job search ladder, she said.

Taylor said she did not look for a job after graduation because of this option.

HOUSING

Apartment supply, demand about even

ANDY WOODWARD
Collegian

Despite Fort Riley layoffs and K-State's increased enrollment, city officials and landlords say finding living accommodations in Manhattan is not a problem.

Randy Martin, Manhattan Chamber of Commerce president, said normal troop strength is at 106 percent right now at Fort Riley.

"Because of the closing down of American bases in Europe, we're at more than full strength in the first division," he said. "At this point, there's no problem with housing.

"The troop reduction will have some impact, but it shouldn't be a problem unless they take about 20 percent of the force out of Fort Riley."

Joe Tiao, proprietor of 250 of the about 8,000 apartment units in Manhattan, said he agreed, and the demand and supply for housing is equal.

"Right now, I think the Army ... is coming in quite a bit. The housing is not tight," he said.

Tiao is currently building a new apartment complex on Sunset Avenue and said the housing situation in Manhattan is average.

"I think we are in a normal situation. No high prices; no low prices. We are in the middle," he said. "But you can't build any apartments near campus."

Ruth Schrum, local landlord and Landlord Association member, said a look at a newspaper's classified advertisements indicates the basic availability of apartments.

Schrum also said a major problem is the lack of realization that when tenants sign a contract, it is a legal document.

"Students or people don't realize this," she said.

"People should read the contracts. People should live up to them and take good care of the apartment."

Schrum said although landlords are not worried about a shortage of housing, increases in water rates and trash services concerns them.

NAACP urges blacks not to buy Japanese

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BALTIMORE — The head of the NAACP on Tuesday urged blacks not to buy Japanese cars because of what he called a reluctance among Japanese automakers to establish dealerships owned by blacks or build plants in inner-cities.

"This is not Japanese bashing. We don't hate anybody," said Benjamin Hooks, the group's executive director.

"But we want to take care of our own."

Hooks made the announcement during the 83rd anniversary celebration of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Blacks have a big stake in the survival of the Big Three U.S. automakers, which have treated them far better than their Japanese counterparts, Hooks said.

More than 140,000 black Americans are employed by General Motors, Ford and Chrysler, in the plants where the cars are made and in the corporate offices, Hooks said.

"I just resent people saying that we don't make a good product. That's like someone talking about your wife or mother and saying they don't do a good job," Hooks said.

Hooks said he has never owned a foreign car and drives a Chrysler van.

There were 259 minority-owned dealerships among the Big Three automakers last year, compared to 11 Japanese dealerships — eight selling Toyotas and three selling Hondas, he said. He didn't give total numbers of Big Three and Japanese dealerships.

Recent talks between the NAACP and Japanese officials have been disappointing, Hooks said.

He said the idea his organization is getting is that the Japanese won't go out of their way to promote blacks or build plants in inner-city areas.

"The (American) automobile industry has in fact been a leader in providing expanded employment and entrepreneurial opportunities for African-Americans," Hooks said.

Bob Butorac, a spokesman for American Honda Motor Co. in Torrance, Calif., said the Japanese car manufacturer has made progress in minority hiring and promotion and will continue to do more.

He said Honda has about 3.7 percent minority dealers.

Edd Snyder, who is black and is the owner of Mid-State Toyota in Delaware, Ohio, said Toyota treated him very well when he wanted to become a dealer.

He said when he told the company he wanted to own a dealership they required three things — experience, training and strong financial backing.

"The economy has had a very bad impact on minority dealers," he said.

"We aren't blessed with the fact that our fathers owned a dealership, died and passed it along to us, as it is with many white dealerships."

Venezuela

"For example, the Haitian government suffered a coup, and the president was exiled and granted asylum in Venezuela," he said.

"He has received only the best treatment from government officials, and why? There are starving and poor Venezuelan citizens who deserve to be treated better than they are.

"I think Chavez was doing what he thinks is right. When the coup took a turn, and he saw danger and that it was too hard to continue his mission, he stepped down. But I think the people agreed with what he was doing and were grateful.

"My relatives who watched him on television said people in the streets cheered at his efforts and when he said, 'This is not over yet,' everyone was hysterical."

Garcia explained there have been past coup attempts in Venezuela. He said years ago, the people spoke out, rebelled and looted cities. Also, there was a small coup last year.

"People read and know about corruption, but they can't do anything about it," he said.

Garcia said he knew some of the men involved in the coup — several were cadets with him when he was in the Venezuelan Military Academy years ago, and others were once his leaders.

"I understand the Venezuelan army," he said. "I back its attempts and anything to help the economy of Venezuela and the people."

Garcia said there are many problems in the nation today.

There is a large gap between rich and poor, he said, and it is a constant struggle just to survive because of the rise crime and the cost of living.

Garcia said the system has deteriorated, especially in the last 15 years. He said people get paid almost nothing.

"I am a graduate and have a degree in engineering," he said. "And when I went home for Christmas, I was offered a job that paid the equivalent of $500 a month in comparison to about $2,000 I might have received in the United States with a similar corporation.

"I feel for the people who are workers and get paid so much less in Venezuela. They are simply out of luck, and there are no unemployment benefits or anything."

Minority

"It looks like the law, when it is defined, will allow for the allowing of money to students of color when that is one criteria," said Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance.

"Whatever the outcome, I know K-State will be in compliance with the law."

After the guidelines have been finalized, the Department of Education will allow schools a four-year transition period, so there will be no danger of any current recipients losing scholarships.

Mark Harms, admissions representative, said minority scholarships provide an incentive for many first-generation college students.

"The purpose would be to give opportunities that otherwise would not be available," he said.

Bosco said he hopes criteria for all scholarships eventually could be established so that each student could compete on a "level playing field."

"Unfortunately, that's not the case," he said.

Salary

"Who would forfeit $20,000 a year in salary just for the privilege of teaching in Kansas? They may even put up with it for years for other reasons — like their kids like the school or their spouse's work.

"But eventually, they'll be ready to leave, and they will. If someone is truly outstanding, they will get other offers. Some will leave, and I don't blame them."

Trenary said some colleges are alleviating the problem by "eating" positions.

In other words, vacant faculty positions are not filled, and the money that would be paid to a new professor is used to give raises to current faculty.

This practice results in larger classes, fewer lines of each class and possibly inferior instruction, he said.

Soldan said he lays the blame on the Kansas Legislature.

"It's up to the Legislature," he said. "There's nothing we can do. The solution has to come from there."

He said his department can only work with what they have.

"We'll do what we can to keep them here," Soldan said.

"It will become a major issue if something isn't done soon."

Kassebaum

the question of wetlands will be addressed in the Clean Water Act.

"The administration has relaxed its definition of wetlands, and this is what is under review now," she said.

Kassebaum said water is America's most precious resource.

"If we hope to have water for the future, we have to begin now to focus our attention on the best way to handle our water resources. I salute Kansas State University on its leadership on water issues," she said.

Kassebaum said in every area of the state where there is recreation, as well as irrigation use from reservoirs, water is becoming a crucial issue.

Other issues Kassebaum also addressed national health care, the economy and the end of the Cold War.

CNS staff questions proposal

Mainframe users spread concerns through BITMAIL messages after meeting

AMY COX
Collegian

"Dear all,

This is in regards to a terrible situation that has just come to the attention of those outside the administration. Please read and consider this mail carefully — if we make enough noise, there's no way this can happen ..."

The above BITMAIL message was typed in at 11:03 p.m. Feb. 8 after the Feb. 5 meeting of the Computer Networking Services staff and Provost James Coffman and Vice Provost Bob Kruh.

"The meeting tossed out the idea" of phasing out K-State's mainframe and leasing the University of Kansas' new mainframe to be more cost efficient in the future, Coffman said.

The tossed out idea, however, has thrown the CNS staff and all who use the mainframe into a barrage of questions and rumors.

Betsy Edwards, CNS staff assistant, said they were so shocked during the meeting that no one immediately thought of good questions.

"But now that it has hit us, we have a lot of questions," she said.

Some of those questions anonymously showed up immediately after the meeting in BITMAIL messages:

"What happens in five years when KU decides that they need that extra computer space we are taking up for academic records and says bye bye?

"What happens if in two years KU decides to raise their prices for letting us use their computers?

"How can they guarantee us BITMAIL accounts when KU students don't have open access to accounts, and the students who get accounts for classroom use have to pay a fee?

"What happens if we have a problem with one of our screens? Who do we call — long-distance to KU? From what I hear KU is having a problem with keeping experienced consultants. Do we really think they are going to have time or even want to help K-State people with our questions?

"What is the cost of the (telephone) lines to connect us and the training of secretaries campuswide to use a different system?"

Elizabeth Schreiber, graduate teaching assistant in the statistics department, voiced her concerns directly to student government representatives and interns in a letter Monday.

"As a non-traditional student and parent, it is important that I be able to do my homework at home. With a modem and KSUVM, I can do that," she said. "I cannot afford to buy the SAS software program I use and upgrade my personal computer to run it.

"Eliminating KSUVM would eliminate my ability to do homework at home and would present a serious obstacle to timely completion of my master's work."

Some students were angered the idea was even being tossed around, and one anonymous BITMAIL user offered suggestions.

The sender mentioned calling the AIDS education money redistributed

Riley County office will no longer provide services

STEPHANIE FUQUA
Collegian

The Riley County Health Department's AIDS education money will be cut as of July 1, 1992.

AIDS officials, however, have confusingly different perceptions of just where the lost money will go.

Chuck Murphy, director of the Riley County Health Department, said the education money will be cut and redistributed to the treatment of AIDS.

"The health education money targeted toward AIDS will be cut this July, leaving us without any education money," Murphy said. "There will be no AIDS health education money through this agency. People will have to go to Topeka."

The education money is being eliminated to provide for those who already have AIDS, Murphy said.

"The focus of the state is changing towards treatment of those already affected. The AIDS testing and counseling money is being put into a treatment pool to buy AZT and drugs for treatment," he said.

Murphy said the Riley County Health Department will try to obtain a grant or try to squeeze the money out of existing resources to continue AIDS education in the area.

However, Sally Finney, director of AIDS education for Kansas Health and Human Services, said there is not a need for that. Riley County will not be without AIDS education.

"We're going to a system where we're regionalizing education. Instead of one person doing AIDS education, we'll have one person in a region who is highly specialized," Finney said. "The money isn't being cut, it will go towards education in an area across the state. There will be an educator in each district."

And while the state finances AIDS

'I want to be your leader for 4 more years,' Bush says

U.S. President announces run for re-election

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CONCORD, N.H. — President Bush formally announced his bid for re-election on Wednesday.

In his announcement, Bush said he wants to declare on March 20 that the liberation of America's economy has begun.

Campaigning in New Hampshire for a second term, Bush also said that Democrats who control Congress should pass his economic program intact by the deadline he set and not to tamper with it.

"They say they are taking up my plan but they are not," Bush said. "Just pass this plan and give the American people a chance to see if it's going to work as I'm confident it will."

"I want to be your leader for four more years," he said in a speech to the New Hampshire Legislature as he plunged into a heavy campaign schedule after officially announcing his candidacy in Washington.

"Today is a special day for me. I know there is no higher honor than serving this great nation," he told legislators in the state that launched his 1988 presidential drive but where he now faces a spirited Republican challenge in next week's leadoff primary.

Although Bush is being challenged by conservative Patrick Buchanan, the president's speeches here and in Washington clearly were aimed at the general election beyond.

"Send a message to the Congress. Tell them the time has come to act," Bush said.

"The deadline is March 20, and we're going to hold their feet to the fire," he said.

With polls showing his popularity diminished and voters anxious about the economy, Bush declared: "On March 20, I want to be able to report to the American people that the liberation of America's economy has begun."

The president's announcement was a formality. His re-election committee has been in place since October and has already raised $11 million. Bush is on the ballot in every state with a primary.

Bush announced his candidacy before an audience of about 1,000 supporters in a hotel ballroom in Washington, "I fight to win. And I am determined to win."

The ballroom erupted in cheers of "four more years."

He then flew to New Hampshire, where he shook hands in a restaurant in Manchester, spoke to the Legislature and met with Gulf War veterans, then law enforcement officers and firefighters.

"These are tough times, I know," he said to the police and firefighters. "These are cynical days now because we're in this crazy political season and it's a dance that we go through every four years."

He also planned a tour of a General Electric plant in Hooksett, a visit to a shopping mall in Bedford and a technology center in Manchester.

He will be back in the state campaigning on Saturday and Sunday.

Both in Washington and in his speech to New Hampshire lawmakers, Bush stressed the allied victory over Iraq, which last year sent his popularity soaring before the faltering economy dragged it down.

And he suggested in both speeches that, with the liberation of Kuwait completed, the liberation of the U.S. economy could now begin.

Bush aimed a clear blow at Buchanan and the former columnist's "America First" theme, although without mentioning his challenger by name.

"Free trade has come under attack these days. The drum beat mounts for some new isolationism ... this one, an economic retreat from reality," he told the New Hampshire lawmakers.

He attacked patriotic posturing and called protectionism "a smokescreen for a country that's running scared, and that's not the America you and I know.

"Our national symbol isn't the ostrich, it's the eagle, and that's the way it should be," he said.

Buchanan, who has been campaigning almost nonstop in New Hampshire for weeks, said in a phone interview from Manchester that "the problem the president has is one he's had a long time now, a hard conflict between rhetoric and reality."

"I think we have a chance to stun New Hampshire and to stun New England and to stun the whole nation up here Tuesday," Buchanan said.

CRIME

Carrying firearms risky

Using guns will lead to serving jail time, Kennedy says

TAD MUSSELWHITE
Collegian

Students aware of the violent crime throughout Manhattan should also be aware of the consequences of carrying a firearm.

If a person were to have a concealed pistol and get caught with it, it's a misdemeanor punishable by serving time in jail, according to Bill Kennedy, Riley County Attorney.

When that person pulls that gun out and threatens somebody, then the person who pulls the gun is looking at mandatory time served in prison, he said.

Kansas law allows a person to carry a firearm anywhere as long as it is not concealed in any way.

"As far as the state law is concerned you can play Matt Dillon all day long. You can sling a rifle or a shotgun over your shoulder and walk down Main Street," Kennedy said. "The question is if it is hidden."

Capt. Allen Raynor, investigations division commander at the Riley County Police Department, said, "You can walk down the street with a gun on your hip in this community, there's no city ordinance (contradicting state law). Some cities have ordinances. For instance, Junction City has one."

Kennedy has a warning for those people who commit crimes with guns.

"What I want young people in Manhattan to know is that if you get caught committing a crime with a gun, I will send you to prison," Kennedy said. "What college students and soldiers don't realize is that if you do harm with a pistol, there is no probation. You go straight to prison. You don't even have to shoot it, just use it in the crime.

"I have seen in the past six to nine months an increase in the number of crimes by young people carrying loaded Saturday night-type trash pistols," he said.

"What is happening is young people are in a bar, and one may say, 'You son-of-a-bitch!' and the other will say, 'You're a son-of-a-bitch!'" Kennedy said. "This turns into a contest to find out who is the biggest dude.

"It ends up the one with the gun is the biggest dude," he said.

Raynor said the aggravated assaults in Riley County have decreased in 1990, but recently the rate has increased slightly, by about 9 percent.

This is not something Kennedy or Raynor said they are alarmed about because the sample they are using is small. It is somewhat unscientific, Kennedy said.

"If you had eight assaults last year and you had 10 this year, then that is a 20-percent increase, and you are only talking about two people," he said.

Raynor said aggravated-assault rates in the Johnson County metropolitan area have increased 17.7 percent, Sedgwick County 19.2 percent, Shawnee County 15.8 percent, and Wyandotte County 9.9 percent.

"So you see, we aren't really that bad," Raynor said.

▶ WICHITA SCHOOL EVACUATED

WICHITA (AP) — Fumes leaking from an old refrigerator forced the evacuation Wednesday of about 2,000 students, faculty and staff at Wichita East High School. Four students were sent to a nearby hospital for treatment because they had difficulty breathing. The four were later released.

▶ COMPUTER MAIL INCLUDES DEATH THREATS

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) — Death threats aimed at minority teachers and students have popped up on computers at an exclusive prep school that was nearly all white before an affirmative action drive in the mid-'80s.

The computer hate mail at Albuquerque Academy may have resulted from a failure by the administration to prepare the school for the new admissions policy, said a consultant hired last month to lead workshops against racism.

Schnauzer named 1991 Pet of the Year for rescuing owners

Farm hound barks to warn family of carbon monoxide

SARA JAAX
Collegian

A farm hound from Ransom was named top dog of 1991 by the Kansas Veterinary Medicine Association for saving the lives of K-State student Cindy Rufenacht and her family.

Cindy Rufenacht

Zak, officially registered as Zacharias Jones the miniature schnauzer, was awarded the Kansas Veterinary Medicine Association Pet-of-the-Year Award for his January 1988 rescue of the Rufenacht family.

The schnauzer warned Rufenacht's parents and younger brother, Alex, of danger when Cindy, then a senior in high school, collapsed in her basement bedroom from exposure to carbon monoxide gas.

Rufenacht's parents and Alex discovered Cindy after hearing Zak's bark for help. Zak, also suffering from poisonous gas inhalation, could not leave the bedroom until Kirk Rufenacht, Cindy's father, carried him upstairs. By then, Cindy's lips had turned blue, and she had begun convulsing.

The family was unaware of the gas leak, and before medics could arrive, Doris Rufenacht, Cindy's mother, had also fallen unconscious.

Cindy and her mother were transported to a local hospital where they recovered after being administered 24-hour oxygen therapy, Lucinda said.

Cindy, senior in accounting, said her parents decided to enter Zak in the contest after they noticed a TV commercial advertising the pet-of-the-year contest.

"The kids are all out of the house, and all my parents have at home is the dog," Cindy said. "So my parents sent in his name."

Zak was one of about 15 dogs and two cats considered for the award, said Dr. Richard Webber, chairman of the awards committee for the Kansas Veterinary Medicine Association.

Webber said the five-member committee had a difficult time selecting the first winner of the new award. Many of the pets were loved companions of the elderly, but none had performed as outstanding a deed as Zak.

"We thought that was the most spectacular life-saving thing any pet had done," he said.

The Rufenachts purchased the 6-year-old salt-and-pepper colored schnauzer in 1987 from a breeder in Great Bend. He was among a variety of pets the Rufenacht children accumulated during their youth including cats, mice and grass snakes, Cindy said. But their pet dogs have been the family favorites, she said.

"We always thought he was exceptionally smart," she said. "We never really taught him tricks like sitting, rolling over or shaking hands. He just sort of does it."

Zak has also proved himself as a dutiful watchdog by barking whenever a stranger enters the yard, she said.

"He's really attached to the family, and pretty special to Cindy," Doris said.

These days Zak spends his time carousing the country with Cindy's father in his tractor or truck and whenever her parents travel, Zak is seldom left behind, Cindy said.

DIVERSITY, VARIETY, CHALLENGE

"An unchallenging 8-to-5 job? I couldn't do that"
I came to Woodward-Clyde to work on a diversity of water resource projects - water quality, hydrology, fisheries - I haven't been disappointed yet. Diversity in a career, at least to me, is crucial.

At Woodward-Clyde you can find variety, diversity, challenge. More importantly, they encourage it; they make it worth it. I can't imagine working any other way.

Rain forests destroyed by tropical farming

Dennis Law has alternative plan using hydroponics tubes

ROB DE CORTIE
Collegian

Rain forests comprise only 6 percent of the world's earth surface.

Every minute, people destroy 100 acres of the forests. If this continues, there will be no rain forests left within 25 years.

One way the rain forests are being destroyed is by tropical farmers cutting down trees to grow crops.

Dennis Law, professor and head of the department of landscape architecture, has developed a concept for a sustainable tropical farm.

The plan is meant to serve both economic and environmental concerns. It gives tropical farmers the opportunity to make a living by growing crops, and at the same time, protect the tropical rain forest from destruction.

"In order to solve the environmental problems, we have to address the problem from an economic standpoint," Law said. "Otherwise we would be treating the symptom instead of the root problem.

"Farmers and industry don't cut down trees just for fun. They do it for economic reasons. My hypothesis in this particular proposal is to give the tropical farmer an economic alternative for destroying the rain forest."

The essence of Law's plan consists of hydroponics tubes. These tubes are made of clay and are about 60 centimeters in length.

The use of tubes on a large scale allows the growth of plants in the air that are normally grown on the ground. The tubes would be hung from tree branches at places where they get enough light.

"This plan calls for the farmer to grow crops within the trees, rather than at the expense of the trees," Law said. "The basic idea is growing plants without soil, such as vanilla and even tomatoes. Numerous crops that have been grown in open fields can now be grown in the trees."

Law said the reason the rain forest is being destroyed is the lives of the soils and nutrition within the soils are very short.

"The abundance of vegetation in the rain forest assumes that there is a lot of energy in the soils to support plant life," Law said. "And there is, but it is leaked out very quickly, because of the heavy rainfalls.

"As long as this recycles itself, it's OK. But once you cut the trees down, there is no supply of organic nutrition, and the rainfalls will wash everything away."

Law said he is looking for longevity.

"I think you get a pretty good crop the first year," Law said. "The second year it will be much less and the productivity in the third year will be way down. So, in terms of longevity, obviously this plan would be better solution."

The hydroponics tubes are just a part of the plan. The whole plan is a scientific integration of existing methods and techniques, such as solar energy, water and nutrition recycling irrigation, and composting.

"The plan is like little pieces falling together. An important implication is that the farmer doesn't have to move to a new 60-acre side every two or three years. He can build a permanent dwelling."

A scaffolding system is also part of the proposal. This system will take the farmer away from the hillside. The further the walkways and work platforms move from the hill, the closer the farmer becomes to the top of the trees. This enables him to take care of the crops in the trees.

In April, Law will present a paper and a conference on the concept for the Environmental Design Research Association in Boulder, Colo.

Many colleagues have shown a lot of interest and there are a lot of people who want to try it, Law said. However, the project is not without problems.

"I am sure we are going to find problems," Law said. "I'm concerned about the longevity in the rain forest where materials decay very quickly. The system of scaffolding is going to be in a constant need of maintenance.

"I am concerned about some species of animals, too. Some monkeys for example, might find the crop very tasty. I don't know what to do about these things, yet. There are many, many problems to be resolved as we go on," he said.

Law said the idea for the plan came from various sources.

"One is having been in the rain forest, seeing it being destroyed. There is this emotion that takes over," Law said.

Aggieville needs maturity, a few cool heads

Aggieville is not so friendly anymore.

There is consistent fist fighting in bars and streets. One recent fight escalated into the stabbing of a K-State student.

The blame for this unfortunate trend can be placed on many, but namely us, the students.

We could adopt the popular perception that the violence is the fault of Fort Riley soldiers, but not only is that a cop-out, it would do nothing to mitigate the violent situation.

Sure, there are some trouble-making soldiers who come to Aggieville toting weapons, but the truth is, there are probably just as many disruptive students.

A few bad apples on either side are no reason to start harmful stereotypes.

These stereotypes are the root of discriminatory door policies, which only serve to exacerbate the already tense situation.

They also cause people to heckle other people from a crowd, which is not only immature and stupid, it is asking for trouble.

The fighting, discriminating and heckling are proof that are there is a problem with most Aggieville patrons co-existing.

That said, there are two alternatives.

We can either ignore the blatant problem and watch violence increase in number and severity. Or, realizing this alternative is unattractive, all Aggieville patrons, doorpeople and bar owners could strive to be cool and mature.

One simple way to do this is to steer clear of the stereotypes. Treating everyone as an individual will inherently ease tensions among patrons and stop a fight before it starts.

But, if a physical altercation does arise, do the smart thing and walk away. Saving one's life or limb is worth swallowing a little pride.

If we can all act mature and responsible, avoiding and walking away from fights, the problem of violence in Aggieville can be avoided and could just walk away as well.

Dow Corning must pay for mistake

Dow Corning Corp. released memos, letters and documents Monday that should be the demise of this powerful corporation.

The documents revealed Dow Corning has known for two decades about potential health problems associated with its silicone breast implants.

With this news, the company quickly replaced its chairman with Keith McKennon who helped Dow Chemical Co. avoid another public relations disaster with Agent Orange defoilant and dioxin.

The company has cooperated with the FDA by removing the implants from the market last month after the FDA issued a voluntary moratorium to further investigate the effects of breast implants.

The issue is that a greedy American corporation looked beyond some of its own dissenting evidence to take advantage of a needy public. Dow Corning was out to make a buck, and the public was out to make a bigger boob.

It's sad that society has virtually imposed a "perfect female" mentality among males which creates a demand for such inessential products such as breast implants. What's even more ludicrous is a business' disregard for producing safe products.

Dow Corning's potential liability has been estimated at $2 billion, which seems rather minute considering there are an estimated 1 million U.S. women who have breast implants.

The victims of this preventable disaster should sue the pants off Dow Corning and use this event as an example for other medical-product producers to remember.

A Common Link: The Bible and pornography

BRAD SEABOURN

"Good afternoon, sir. I am Brother Peters, and I belong to the Campus Crusade for Christian Righteousness Against Pornography. We are currently doing a phone survey to evaluate and garner support against the sinful, pornographic filth they show at the K-State Union movie theater. Would you like to join us in signing a petition to ban pornography from the University environment?"

(Heh, heh) Why, sure friend! You know, I am so glad you called. This is Brother Seabourn, and I have been thinking a lot lately about Christianity and pornography and what should be done about the apparent conflict ... and now you call. The Lord does work in mysterious ways, Brother Peters. Can you give me an "amen" on that?

"Praise Jesus and amen! Why, just thinking about it makes me tingle all the way down to my saved-in-the-blood toes!"

I'm tingling too, Brother Peters.

"As I was saying, Brother Seabourn, I belong to an organization that desires to purge this campus of the Satan-serving heathens that flock to the student-funded theater to watch cinematography that is of a highly pornographic nature.

"As you know, and I am sure you must agree, this is a Christian nation — we must instill Christian values. We must teach what is in the Bible."

Yes, yes, I agree. The Holy Word of God is wonderful, is it not? Everyone must listen to and follow what is written in the Good Book. What the Almighty says, we must do. His word is law, hallelujah and amen!

Besides, if we are not obedient, the heavy hand of the Lord will smite us with emerods.

"With what?"

Emerods ... you know, hemorrhoids — the infernal itch that can not be stopped. It says so in the Good Book, Deuteronomy 28:27: "The Lord will smite thee with the botch of Egypt, and with the emerods, and with the scab, and with the itch, whereof thou canst not be healed."

It really did happen to the people of Ashdod (Samuel 5:6-12). It also happened to the pope. That's why he always rides in the popemobile standing up.

This curse was effective before a few heathens created Preparation H. Brother Peters, as a Holy Curse, emerods just are not what they used to be.

However, — we could still be smited with emerods AND poo-poo in the face. Oh boy! Emerods and poo-poo — a fearsome combination let me tell you.

"What in the world are you talking about?"

Brother Peters, I am referring to Malachi 2:3, where it says: "Behold, I will corrupt your seed, and spread dung upon your faces, even the dung of your solemn feasts; and one shall take you away with it."

"Are you sure we're talking about the same Bible?"

Of course. You know — the Holy Word, the Good Book, the book with the Golden Rule: "Yea, verily, I say unto ye, do ye unto thy neighbor as ye would have done unto thyself, ye bloody boob ye," or something to that effect.

> "Behold, I will corrupt your seed, and spread dung upon your faces, even the dung of your solemn feasts; and one shall take you away with it."
> Malachi 2:3

However, there is more to the Word of God than just emerods and poo-poo. For instance, take the Song of Solomon, which is right there in the Bible. Whew! The heavy hand of the Lord must be starting to weigh on me, because I am beginning to get emerods just thinking about Solomon and all his talk of lips and hips and breasts and ...

Hallelujah! Praaaaaaise Jeeeeeeesus! The Holy Spirit has just given me a great idea! Forget the petition, Brother Peters. Just pray to the Man Upstairs to smite all the porno-peepers with emerods and poo-poo in the face the next time they go to a porno film.

"What makes you think that will work?"

If you suffered from emerods, would you want to sit for three hours watching a skin-flick with poo-poo on your face?

"You know, that's not a bad idea! Praise the Lord!"

And the best part is, Brother Peters, it will give you a chance to hand them a copy of the Holy Word of God as they head out the door. Hallelujah!

You know, with all the stories about rape, incest, pillaging, murder, adultery and fornication found in the Bible, they just might appreciate the free literature.

"How do you figure, Brother Seabourn?"

Because, Brother Peters, there is one thing Christians, the Bible and pornography have in common.

"And what might that be?"

Boobs.

Paradise Lost - Contradictions Found

STEFFANY CARREL

This world just smacks of contradiction.

You really can't escape it.

Politics.

Family.

Work.

School.

All dripping with stark contradiction.

Put a little more clearly — full of shit.

It's ... well ... depressing as hell, actually.

A prime example: I've been placidly watching the polite and not-so-polite poop fly back and forth between the United States and Japan these days.

Miyazawa says we're lazy. Bush says we're not. Iacocca says, "Buy American." Honda says, "We are American."

It's all so very educational. And entertaining. Much more so than waiting for those depressing quarterly reports that only verify "Yes, we are in a recession." (What a revelation, eh, Curly?)

The contradiction?

Well, for those of you who don't watch "60 Minutes," it's pretty sly, actually.

It seems that "The Big Three," consisting of Ford, GM and Chrysler, build American cars, sure — but they build them with Japanese parts. Fords with Mazda engines. Chryslers with Mitsubishi engines. So, even if you wanted to "Buy American," you couldn't.

It's so clever, especially the way they've been playing on our American patriotism lately. Japan is the handy scapegoat. What's frightening is that people swallow it whole, giving way to Japan-bashing. It's sick.

Just one whopper of a contradiction.

But we certainly don't have to travel to Detroit just to find these babies.

There are some mighty hefty contradictions plodding over hill and dell here as well.

That's right — K-State is chock full of 'em too.

Just check out the tenure system for professordom. It's totally screwed.

Let's create a scenario together, okay? Completely hypothetical — of course.

Dick Blow is a teacher.

He researches like no other has before him.

He's been published (Ooh ... that magic word) more times than any other in the school.

He's a minority (the only one in the department, mind you).

And finally, he's up for tenure.

The contradiction?

He can't teach his way out of a wet paper bag.

Now, in my mind, and in the minds of other sane, rational individuals — if Dick Blow can't teach, Dick Blow should go home. He has NO place in the classroom.

Lock him away in a research lab. Lock him away in the library to be published. But, God have mercy, don't put him into a classroom. And by all means, don't give him tenure! That's like handing over a gold medal for coming in last. What the hell is wrong with these people?

Um-hmm — excuse me.

So anyway, contradictions abound.

Another, rather close to home, is this business with Aggieville and the noise ordinance.

People are complaining "drunk college students" are wandering into their yards and disrupting their peace in the late-night hours of the weekend.

Well, that's swell and dandy and all, and I suppose there's a certain point involved with rights being infringed upon and so forth, but ...

The contradiction?

Fort Riley shells the crap out of itself, and we get these incredible shock waves — sonic booms if you will — as late-night presents.

They shake houses and windows and cats.

They come at all hours.

They're so loud that a friend of mine witnessed one of the blasts setting off a car alarm.

And they affect a helluva lot more people than the ones who live near Aggieville.

But I don't see any city commissioners or concerned citizens jumping up to complain about that noise.

It's because they've accepted it as part of their lives.

So why can't they accept the college students' Saturday night fun?

A monster contradiction if you ask me.

So what's an optimistic gal like me supposed to do in such a world full of contradiction?

Hmm ...

I think I'll just blow it up and start over.

FINANCIAL AID

New loan IDEA may not work in Kansas

DEREK THOMAN

A Wisconsin congressman has an idea on how to improve America's student loan program and save taxpayers billions of dollars at the same time.

The Income-Dependent Education Assistance Act, developed by Rep. Thomas Petri, R-Wisconsin, is designed to be self-financing and a better deal than current student loan programs.

Financial aid directors, however, disagree with the plan, saying it is not as good as it may sound.

Under Petri's plan, money would be borrowed directly from an agency of the federal government. The money would come from the sale of bonds, and repayments would be collected by the Internal Revenue Service in annual amounts based on the individuals post-education income.

This program would make available a maximum of $70,000 for most college and graduate-level students, and up to $143,000 for medical students.

"The middle class is largely locked out of current student loan programs," Petri said in a press release. "We need fresh thinking to produce a simple, affordable and universal student loan program."

George Conant, legislative assistant to Petri, gave several reasons why the IDEA plan is better than other current loan programs.

First, student loan defaults would almost disappear. Since the loan repayments are based

Need for blood in region big concern

3 lives can be saved with 1-pint donation, 1 1/2 virtually painless hours

PAM FRAHM
Collegian

A virtually painless one and a half hours and less than one pint of an average person's 10-12 pints of blood can save up to three lives.

The almost critical need for blood in the region is bringing the Red Cross Bloodmobile back to campus Feb. 18-21.

In recent years, competition with off-campus blood collection centers has hurt the K-State Bloodmobile.

After blood is collected during a bloodmobile campaign, it is brought back to the Wichita Red Cross center and tested. Then it is sent directly to 120 hospitals in the office's two-state region, said Kalen Larson, director of the Office of Communications at the American Red Cross in Wichita.

Donations made to a plasma center or other collection centers do not go directly to hospitals, Larson said.

"We basically take plasma donations that are further manufactured into pharmaceutical products," said Kurt Mortenson, manager of the Manhattan Donor Center.

Mortenson said the plasma donor center does not see much of a decrease in donations when the bloodmobile is at K-State because most people are regular customers.

Larson said even though donations made during bloodmobiles are not generally given to a specific person, there are two types of special donations that can be made to personalize a donation.

If a person having surgery makes specific arrangements with their doctor prior to the surgery, a friend or relative can make a directed donation for them. When a donation is made, the donor will fill out a card to be given to the patient which says, "I donated blood in your name."

Another type of special donation is an autologous donation, which is a self-donation from a relatively healthy person for his or her own use at a later planned date.

Because the shelf life of blood cells is 42 days, the donation must be made within that time of the surgery.

Larson said many people will not give blood because they are afraid they are at risk of contracting AIDS. She said this is not true.

All needles, syringes, tubing and bags used by the American Red Cross are sterile and thrown away after each use, she said.

In the event of an emergency, such as a plane crash in the area, Larson said there is no back-up supply.

For this reason, and to prevent future surgeries from being canceled, the Red Cross needs new donors and those who have not donated for some time to do so to build up the blood supply in the region, she said.

Although 57 percent of all Americans are eligible to give blood, less than 10 percent do.

Jennifer O'Brien, senior in English, has donated blood in the past and said she plans to again at the February bloodmobile.

American Red Cross sets goal of 350 units per day

PAM FRAHM
Collegian

The American Red Cross hopes to collect 1,400 units of blood on campus next week.

The Red Cross Bloodmobile will be in the K-State Union K, S and U Rooms from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Feb. 18-21.

The goal, which is set by the Red Cross regional office in Wichita, means the organization will try to collect 350 units per day over the four days.

"Our job is to get the word out to the students. We're hoping we can get the support to reach the goals set by the Red Cross," said Tim Ward, sophomore in journalism and mass communications and student chairman for the bloodmobile.

Besides advertising in the local papers, Ward spread the word at Manhattan Christian College and throughout the community.

He said although campus participation has been good, it could be better.

"We've always had good support from the greek community, and we're hoping we can get the support of the residence halls," Ward said.

Awareness programs have been conducted in the residence halls to inform students that there are no health risks in donating blood.

In recent semesters, K-State bloodmobiles have not met their goals. Ward said the main reason is competition with the off-campus plasma center.

"We're really up against a wall with what the plasma center has done," he said. "For the last three semesters since the plasma center has opened, numbers for the bloodmobile have been down."

Ward is trying to coordinate with the Interfraternity and Panhellenic Councils to have the fall bloodmobile in conjunction with Homecoming activities to create more interest and promote further participation.

treatment to a minor extent, the education money will not go toward the purchase of AZT, it will go toward the area educators, Finney said.

"Education also includes prevention for those who have the disease. The affected are in need of prevention services so they will not pass the disease on," Finney said.

But Joan Smith, health educator for the Riley County Health Department, said the education money will be cut and will go instead to treatment centers.

"Many physicians refuse to see AIDS patients because of money reasons. They might not have insurance, or they have Medicaid," Smith said. "The state has come up with four regional medical centers that will see clients on a monthly basis. It's wonderful. When clients don't have insurance, they can go to Topeka."

While Murphy said the money would be cut, Smith said the department will still have funds to test for AIDS and counsel those who have the virus.

"We will continue testing and counseling," Smith said.

The budget cut is also not definite, Smith said. She said she doubts the Riley County Health Department would not receive money for education.

"Supposedly, there will be a cut," Smith said. "But, we might receive formula funds from the state that would total somewhere under $10,000."

CATS BASKETBALL

Late MU spurt sends Cats home with another loss

PATRICK OBLEY
Collegian

COLUMBIA, Mo. — The three-guard game plan was clicking, the inside game was taking a toll and the Cats were shooting pretty darn well, too.

Take away 35 seconds from Wednesday night's K-State-Missouri game, and the Cats might have won.

Though the Cats played one of their most solid games of the year, back-to-back treys by Melvin Booker and Anthony Peeler during a key stretch in the second half proved to be the difference in the 67-59 Missouri victory.

The crucial shots came after the Wildcats had evaporated MU's 35-27 halftime lead with a 23-13 run gave the Cats their second and last lead of the night at 50-48 with 9:40 showing.

Instrumental in the stretch was the Cats' inside play, particularly that of Wylie Howard. Howard scored the first 8 points of the half for K-State.

"I thought we were going inside well early, so we made an effort to do that in the second half as well," said Cats' coach Dana Altman. "I thought we were doing pretty good, then I think Wylie got a little tired. We began taking some shots we shouldn't have, and then we didn't go back inside to him."

"We looked pretty good," said Howard, who hadn't realized he had scored the first 8 points of the second half. "Playing with three guards out there really helped me out. We execute better, we play better, and it gives me a little more room to roam under the basket, which is probably why I did so well during that time."

During the early second-half domination by the Cats, the Tigers were beginning to sweat.

"At times, yeah, it did look like we were in trouble," admitted Tiger coach Norm Stewart. "We would take shots that should have went but didn't and there were times on the boards when we were outplayed too.

"I think those things were why K-State got back into the game."

"We didn't block out well, and we were a little sluggish," Tiger center Jevon Crudup said. "We got a little bit lackadaisical there in the second half, and that was when they started coming back big.

"If Anthony and Melvin didn't hit those threes, K-State almost comes up with a big victory."

After Crudup's jumper knotted the game at 50-50, both teams and the rowdy Tiger fans fell silent for the next minute and a half.

Several quick MU passes then found Booker open for the first trey at 7:59. The Cats tried to answer with a trey, but Ski Jones' attempt missed badly. Peeler took the outlet pass and hit the second trey at 7:26 to bring long-lost momentum back to the Tigers.

"Those definitely hurt us," said Altman, who called a timeout following Peeler's shot. "They got the momentum back and we just couldn't recover."

Howard was more upbeat.

"Yeah, it discouraged me when that happened, but we were playing the No. 9 team in the country, and we were playing with them. We looked pretty good, and we definitely executed better," he said.

Vincent Jackson scored 15 points to pace the 12-8 and 2-5 Cats. Howard added 13 points and Gaylon Nickerson 12. Jones had two key treys during the second half Cat run to add to his 9 points.

Peeler and Jamal Coleman each had 19 for the Tigers, who improved to 17-3 overall and 5-2 in league play.

"We played with a lot more confidence tonight," Howard said. "We're starting to play a little smarter now. I think we definitely know now that we can play in the Big Eight."

Stites' 7 bombs lead OU past Lady Cats

STEVE ROCK
Collegian

Before Wednesday night's Lady Cat basketball game against Oklahoma, K-State coach Susan Yow hoped her squad would crash the boards and keep the rebounding total close.

The Lady Cats did just that.

What they didn't do, however, was contain the Sooners' inside game.

Nor the outside game.

As a result, the Sooners, now 4-5 in conference play and 13-8 overall, came into Bramlage Coliseum and picked apart a Lady Cat defense en route to an 88-73 victory.

"If you would have told me before the game we'd only get outrebounded by two," Yow said, "I would have told you we'd win the ballgame."

In fact, the Cats held a 27-19 rebounding advantage at the half.

During that opening half, however, K-State's man-to-man defense was picked apart by a pair of freshmen. Mandy Wade and Angi Guffy, both forwards, combined to score 10 of the Sooners' first 14 points.

Wade went into the locker room at the half with 8 points. Guffy led all scorers with 12, which included a 6-for-6 shooting performance. All but four of their combined total of 20 first-half points were scored inside the lane.

"They scored so easy on us in the paint," Yow said. "That's why we went to zone."

The zone defense did in fact slow down the freshman tandem, but opened up yet another offensive outlet for the Sooners.

Senior guard Carin Stites, who went into the game leading the Big Eight conference in three-pointers, responded to the loose zone by drilling five, relatively-unguarded treys.

"She (Stites) did a great job," Yow said. "She's a shooter."

And a record-tying shooter at that. Stites finished the game with seven buckets beyond the arc, tying both a Bramlage Coliseum women's record as well as a Big Eight conference record. She led all scorers with 23 points, but finished two treys short of her own single-game mark against all foes.

Yow, whose team defeated the Sooners in Norman earlier this season, was impressed with Oklahoma's offense.

"They had a great offensive performance," Yow said. "There's no question about that."

Yow wasn't convinced, however, that it was Oklahoma's offense that made the difference in the game.

"Our defense was not strong tonight," she said. "It was there in spurts, but it was not something that was solid.

"I don't think we had a lot of defense."

Indeed, the Lady Cat defense yielded the highest number of points in any game this season.

The Lady Cats, who trailed by as many as 21 in the first half, used a late surge in the opening 20 minutes to pull within nine. K-State finished the first half with a 14-2 run. That stretch, which included a 6-for-6 shooting performance from the charity stripe by Jennifer Grebing, who tied her career high of 14 points, sent the team into the locker room with a positive attitude.

"I thought we were in good shape at halftime," Yow said.

Yow compared the game to the meeting in Norman, which the Lady Cats were trailing by 14 at the half. The squad came back and posted a 91-86 victory in that game.

Not this one.

Leah Honeycutt, junior forward for the Lady Cats, along with Grebing, led K-State at the half with 10 points. Honeycutt then limped off the court at the 11:06 mark of the second half, fighting back tears. She didn't return.

"That was a real blow to us," Yow said.

Honeycutt, despite missing most of the second half, finished the game with her fifth double-double of the season — 10 points and 11 rebounds.

Mary Jo Miller led the Lady Cats with 17 points, despite scoring just two points in the first half.

The loss for the Lady Cats, now 5-17 overall, hurt.

"I really hate it for the players," Yow said.

Yow acknowledged, though, that the team, and nobody else, needs to make the difference.

"We're the only people who can change it," Yow said, "and we have to figure out what we have to do."

Yow, in spite of the tough stretch the team is experiencing, remains upbeat.

"We did some really nice things," Yow said of the game. "When they're working, they have a magic about them.

"They just haven't had it in a long time."

INSIDE STUFF

Coleman's return gives Tigers a lift

Senior leader back after decision almost ended year

PATRICK OBLEY
Collegian

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Happy times are here again for Missouri's Jamal Coleman. In Wednesday's 67-59 Tiger victory over K-State, Coleman scored 19 points and grabbed eight rebounds, both team highs.

"I think I have a little way to go yet," Coleman said. "With each game, I'm getting a little more confident in myself. I think things are looking up for me now with my confidence and my game."

Things have been looking up for the 6-foot-5 senior ever since the end of his junior year. He played the best basketball of his career down the stretch of the 1990-91 season, scoring in double figures in each of his final 13 games.

He was third in the Big Eight with 8.3 rebounds a game, and his 46 steals during that season was eighth-best in Tiger history.

After he scored 41 points and grabbed 38 rebounds against K-State, Colorado and Notre Dame in a week's span, he was named the league's final player of the week.

But when Tiger coach Norm Stewart imposed what would become an 11-game suspension at the beginning of his highly anticipated senior year, Coleman's role on the team was in doubt.

Compounding matters was Missouri's 11-0 start without him, a stretch which catapulted the Tigers into the nation's Top 10. Could Coleman make a contribution to an already impressive team, or would his presence shatter the winning Tiger recipe?

The answer seems obvious to Stewart. Although the record shows Missouri as 6-3 with Coleman, the Tigers are playing better ball.

"We're a different team than we were at the beginning of the season, and that's partly due to Coleman returning," Stewart said. "It gives us another senior out there on the floor every night and I think lately, it has helped us be, in some ways, a better team."

Coleman said having basketball stripped from him for a time made him realize how important the game is to him.

Older athletes should bow out while they still have their skills

BRIAN ANDERSON

I'm sure the government knows about it.

And just like it usually does, it has tried to cover it up.

But we press people can find the hidden truth, just like my hero, Geraldo Rivera.

Not!

Somewhere in the United States — the government is keeping the location top secret, except to professional athletes — someone has found a miracle drug that is making our athletic heroes of the past want to play with the youngsters.

Someone has found the Fountain of Youth.

Don't get me wrong. I'm glad to see the human body being put to the test. But why can't athletes past their primes retire and get a life, or go make Miller Lite ads like most ex-jocks use to?

It is nice to see heroes of long ago — such as George Brett, Nolan Ryan and George Foreman — being able to compete as hard the younger generation.

But these guys are exceptions to the rule.

Two years ago, Brett won the American League batting title and in 1992 is ready to battle for the No. 3 batting spot — where a manager usually puts his team's top offensive threat — in the lineup of the Kansas City Royals.

All of this from a guy who will turn 39 during the upcoming season.

Ryan was on the 1969 New York Mets team that won the World Series. Last year, he was striking out nine batters a game for the Texas Rangers and pitched his seventh no-hitter. Sometime this year — at age 45 — he hopes to pass the milestone of 5,750 career strikeouts.

Boxer George Foreman was the heavyweight champion in the early 1970s. Last year, he was able to last a full 12 rounds against Evander Holyfield, the current heavyweight champion. Plus, he brings that certain attention-getter boxing hasn't had since the days of Muhammad Ali. Foreman is 45.

There are others, despite years off, who think they are still in their prime. But they're dead wrong.

Let's look at 44-year-old Olympic swimmer Mark Spitz. He won seven gold medals in the 1972 Summer Olympics and wants to compete for the U.S. swim team in this year's Summer Games. He competed in two races against the world-record holders of their distances last year. In each race, he lost by more than a second.

Another example is Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, formerly of the Los Angeles Lakers. As his career was ending in 1989, he would only play 20 minutes of a 48-minute game. On the court, his fastest speed would be a jog.

Now, he wants to play again in honor of Magic Johnson. Hey, Kareem, just keeping on making commercials like the one of you on the airplane with the computer and think about being a movie star like you were in "Airplane."

Of course, how can I forget the Senior PGA? Golfers that are a half-century and older play on golf courses that would make the average golfer look great.

The only sport I don't have a problem with is football. After a couple of broken ribs, mangled limbs and being hit for 10 years or so, football players know that the end of their career is near.

Once an athlete has finished making his mark on the sport, he should leave. If we want to see him in action, we'll get the video tape of him playing and stick in the VCR. If we want to see if he is alive, we'll watch him/her in a Miller Lite commercial or selling Mr. Coffee with Joe DiMaggio.

HOLIDAY

Valentine's Day traditions have roots in varied legendary tales

Florists, storeowners owe thanks to European stories, English practices

GINGER BURD
Collegian

Florists and other storeowners owe one of their biggest days of the year to a man named Valentine.

Toward the end of that long work day on Feb. 14, those florists and storeowners might wonder who started this holiday and the tradition of sending gifts to those you love.

One explanation of Valentine's Day is that Roman Emperor Claudius II in A.D. 200 forbade young men to marry, because he thought single men made better soldiers.

During this time, a priest named Valentine disobeyed the emperor's wishes and married young couples.

In another story, a man named Valentine, who was an early Christian, made friends with young children of the area. He was jailed because he refused to worship Roman gods.

When the children found out he had been jailed, they made cards and letters and threw them in through his jail cell window.

Yet another story relates that while in jail, this man named Valentine fell in love with the blind daughter of one of the jailers.

Through his faith, Valentine miraculously restored her sight.

Right before the day he was executed, which some say was Feb. 14, A.D. 269, he wrote a farewell message to her and signed it "From your Valentine."

Then in A.D. 496, Pope Gelasius named Feb. 14 St. Valentine's Day.

Along with these ideas of where or how the holiday began are also Valentine's Day traditions of different origins.

In Europe, it was a tradition to give songs or gifts of candy, fruit or money to loved ones for Valentine's Day.

In Great Britain and Italy, it was superstition that on Valentine's Day before sunrise, a young single woman should stand by a window. She would marry the first man she saw, or a man similar to him, within the year.

People in Denmark sent pressed, white flowers called snowdrops.

'No problem with quality of water'

Sodium only element to read high, Shineman says

KRISTEN TURNER

While the body's need for water is second only to that for oxygen, some Manhattan residents said they wonder what is in the tap water they drink and use.

"I'm worried about the different chemicals that might not get treated — but I do drink tap water," said Kristin Miller, junior in elementary education.

Wendy Alexander, junior in apparel and textile marketing, said she was also concerned about the water quality in Manhattan.

"I've seen what it has done to my plants," she said.

Other residents, however, are not concerned.

"I've never really thought about it. I've always drank the tap water in Manhattan," said Margie Johnson, junior in journalism and mass communications.

Alan Shineman, Manhattan water utilities superintendent, said there is no need to doubt the quality of city water. He said the water distributed in Manhattan by the local water-treatment plant is carefully monitored 24 hours a day.

Levels of chlorine, the chemical used to treat the water, are checked every two hours.

"At this time there is no problem with the quality of water in Manhattan that I am aware of," Shineman said.

Each month, 30 water samples are sent to Topeka to be tested by the Kansas Health and Environment Laboratory. A recent water analysis reported levels lower than state-recommended standards. Sodium was the only element to read somewhat high.

"Those on a low-sodium diet should not drink a lot of Manhattan tap water," Shineman said.

'Home' focuses on faith, crisis situations

DeBrown directs Ebony Theatre in Samm-Art Williams play opening tonight

LISA EDMUNDS
Collegian

God is alive and well, but on vacation in Miami.

Or so it seems to Cephus Miles.

The trials and tribulations that bring Cephus to the conclusion God has abandoned him, or has at least gone fishin' for a spell, are the heart of a play by Samm-Art Williams which will be presented by Ebony Theatre tonight, Friday and Saturday in the Purple Masque Theatre.

"Home" centers on the life of Cephus, played by Jayson Strickland, as he ages from 16 to 50.

"He's got a good life," director Margaret "Ret" DeBrown explains, "but he also has seen a number of crisis situations in his lifetime, including the loss of family and a girlfriend."

In the modern story, Cephus is also drafted, but leans on his faith in God to help him decide whether or not to fight in Vietnam. He decides he will not fight and is thrown in jail, DeBrown said.

For a while, Cephus abandons his faith, for he believes God has abandoned him. And then Cephus falls into temptation. Crucial players in the temptation are two other characters, played by Carlotte Moore and LaFern Watkins.

The essential battle for Cephus, DeBrown said, is internal. He must make serious decisions when confronted with the meaning of life. In his past, when a problem existed, Cephus confronted "the one above" for guidance.

The problem is, now that he is older, can he rely on the same one?

"Home" is DeBrown's directing debut for the Ebony Theatre, and she said she is especially excited to be working with the group.

Productions like "Home," DeBrown said, play an important role in cultural education as well as entertainment.

Growing up in the Midwest did not give her much multicultural education in school, she said, or even much about black heritage.

"I've always wanted to work with theater for education," she said.

A graduate student in speech and theater, DeBrown said she hopes to direct a multicultural play in the future, one that weaves the stories of a variety of people and their cultures into one production, veering away from the mainstream.

Coleman

"I'm so grateful to be back and playing," Coleman said. "I appreciate every game I play now. I realize that, at this level, not many get this great of an opportunity.

"The tremendous support I got from the community both when I was off the team and when I returned was so uplifting. I'll never forget that."

"Jamal means a lot to our team," said All-American candidate and fellow senior Anthony Peeler. "He had a lot of things going on at the beginning of the year, but he's working on basketball now, and it shows."

Jevon Crudup and Melvin Booker echoed Peeler's sentiments.

"Jamal knows his job is shooting that shot along the baseline and rebounding, and he does his job better than anyone on the team," Crudup said. "That has been uplifting for the whole team."

"Jamal helps Jevon and Jeff (Warren, another Tiger forward) play our power game," Booker said. "We didn't have much of a power game before Jamal, but now, with his baseline shot and rebounding, we're a lot more powerful down low now. He's a real leader for us in there."

Being a leader is what Coleman calls his most important duty now that he's a senior. It has also been the hardest task to conquer.

"I feel like I can be a leader. It's just that I've never had to do that before," Coleman said. "A leader is more of a team player and hits the key buckets when the team needs them.

"I don't quite do all of that right now, but I'm working on it. The more confident I get with my game, the better the leader in me will be."

"The second thing is the inspiration of Wes Jackson. His efforts to alter the way we grow crops in the United States and his concept of biodiversity have influenced me, too."

Jackson is the director of the Land Institute in Salina. He is a strong advocate of biodiverse settings. This means a larger number of different kinds of species, as more protection against environmental stress such as heat waves, cold spells and droughts.

Law has not yet presented his plan to Jackson.

"This plan certainly follows his philosophy. I should take it over to him."

Law said the final idea for his plan came when he visited the food exhibit in the EPCOT center in Orlando.

"You are riding a little train that is going through the greenhouses. I looked up, and I saw tomatoes growing up in the sky. And I thought: Why not? This is a greenhouse, the rain forest is a greenhouse. Why not use this?"

GREEKS

Control policies implemented at K-State, nationally

Membership decrease due to risk-management programs, publication says

JULIE LONG
Collegian

The greek system has habitually been challenged by problems such as hazing, alcohol and other risks often associated with alcohol and parties.

In response to the challenges the greek system is facing, alcohol policies and risk-management programs have been implemented, both at K-State and on a national basis.

These problems have caused a decline in memberships in some places.

Campus Commentary, a publication of National Interfraternity Conference, reported membership is down for a variety of reasons.

One of the reasons stated is "drunks" aren't joining anymore because of the risk-management programs being implemented, which includes a BYOB alcohol policy.

Other reasons are: the restrictive rush rules that make it difficult for freshmen to go through the rush process; the bad publicity some of the houses have received; declining enrollments; and undergraduates saying fraternities just aren't fun anymore.

Some colleges have even gone as far as to eliminate or ban greek systems.

Amherst College in Amherst, Mass., has eliminated the greek system from its campus.

Douglas Wilson, secretary for public affairs at Amherst, said the greek system was banned from campus in 1984.

"It was a combination of several different factors," Wilson said.

One of the factors mentioned was a change in the atmosphere of the greek houses. Wilson said the houses were becoming anti-intellectual. He mentioned one fraternity house would burn a piano every year.

Vandalism was also becoming more common, Wilson said.

Since the elimination of the greek system on the Amherst campus, four organizations have emerged off-campus.

"We do have a small resistance movement of underground fraternities," Wilson said.

Wilson said Amherst has no intention of reinstating the greek system.

Alcohol policies and risk-management programs have also been implemented at K-State.

The joint Interfraternity Council and Panhellenic Council alcohol policy states "any social event at which alcohol is present shall be bring-your-own-beverage or licensed cash bar."

"It was a policy implemented in August 1991," said Mindy Loughman, senior in life science and president of the Panhellenic Council. "It's main purpose was to reduce liability and reduce underage drinking."

Barb Robel, adviser for greek affairs, said the policy is working very well.

"We've had very few violations," Robel said.

About two years ago, all fraternities instituted very strict risk-management policies, Robel said. There are guidelines for social events, hazing, and harassment.

The hazing policy defines it as "any instance of physical abuse, psychological abuse, or improper obligations, requirements, or time restrictions associated with or involving new members."

The officers are responsible for informing members of the hazing policy, Loughman said. She also said each chapter must sign an anti-hazing agreement.

Robel said the primary problem with the greek system is they need to be more responsive to society in general. This includes alcohol use and abuse, and human dignity issues such as treatment of women and hazing.

"Society's expectations have changed," Robel said. "Society expects people to be more responsible now.

"If people choose to ignore the issues, nobody will want them around," she said.

Some of the things that will be needed to keep the greek system strong at K-State are continuation of the new alcohol policy, continuing to work on diversity, and being more responsive to the community, Robel said.

Dennis O'Keefe, senior in journalism and mass communications and Interfraternity Council president, said during the 1960s, '70s and '80s the greek system got out of control much like the world today. Now initiative is finally being taken to stop it, he said.

STUDENT SENATE

SGA to discuss goals for K-State-Salina relations, community involvement

JOHN SHARTZER
Collegian

Student Senate will have goal orientation for the semester in mind at its regular meeting tonight.

Senate will review a number of goals designed to enhance the image of Student Governing Association. A preliminary list was developed during last week's meeting.

Creating better relations with students through trust and communication is one of the goals. Other goals include involvement in community affairs, smoothing integration with the K-State-Salina campus, creating change for new ideas in academics and becoming more efficient by promoting shorter meetings.

Tonight's meeting will also mark the beginning of the five-minute presentations of Fine Arts Fee funded organizations.

Joni Franklin, communications chairperson, said a representative from each department receiving funds allocated by SGA will provide an informational summary of the department's use of the money.

"Senate has assigned teams to each of the groups for a more in-depth look at the organizations," she said. "The five-minute speeches are simply to familiarize the Senate with the organizations."

In other business, final voting will take place on a special allocation for the Campus Safety Task Force. The funds are to allow the department to place an advertisement on one side of the centerpieces of the Union cafeteria tables.

Also, a new bill will be introduced concerning an addition of a non-traditional affairs director to the Cabinet. Under the current K-State-SGA Constitution, the student body president is not required to appoint a representative to the Cabinet for this position.

Bone marrow drive produces positive results

Red Cross matches 6 K-Staters with prospective transplant recipients

TODD KNAPPENBERGER
Collegian

The K-State Bone Marrow Donor Drive, sponsored by the American Red Cross Association, has matched six people from K-State as possible donors.

Tammy Caffrey, office assistant for animal sciences and industry, said she was contacted and told she was one of six people from the K-State donor drive with the preliminary antigen match as a possible donor.

"I was surprised, very surprised," Caffrey said. "I wasn't sure if I believed her."

Caffrey said because so many people from K-State were matched, the next set of tests will be run at Lafene Health Center.

Dr. David Johnson of the Kansas Cancer Center said blood will be drawn from the possible donors to see how it matches with the patients.

A mixed lymphocyte culture will be ran in a head-to-head reaction between the donor and the host. Johnson said this will help determine the possibility of graft vs. host disease.

Graft vs. host disease is when the bone marrow rejects the body, Johnson said.

Johnson said all possible donors must go through a pre-transplant work up. This includes an overall physical, chest x-rays, and blood work looking for HIV or hepatitis.

One to one-and-a-half liters of bone marrow will be taken from the donor, Johnson said. This is equivalent to about 10 percent of the body's total bone marrow.

Johnson said the bone marrow is removed from the donor's pelvis and transfused into the host.

Student's donor search may soon come to an end

TODD KNAPPENBERGER
Collegian

A donor with the same six matching antigens as Julie Fabrizius has been located.

Fabrizius, senior in animal science and industry, who was diagnosed in April 1991 with Chronic Myelogenous Leukemia, has been searching since then to find a donor that matched the six specific antigens on her white blood cells.

After checking her mom, dad and sister and finding out none of them matched, the only alternative was to use the National Donor Bank in Minneapolis, Minn., she said.

"Every three weeks they would run my name through the computer," Fabrizius said. "By Oct. 3, we had three donors with five of six antigens, and one of those was better than the other two."

There are some more tests to run before the transplant can occur, Fabrizius said. One test is to see what level of graft v's host rejection the transplant will have.

Of the tests Fabrizius has had to go through, the Major Histocompatibility Antigen Test is very important, said Dr. David Johnson, of the Kansas Cancer Center in Wichita.

Johnson said the MHC test determines what the chances of graft-versus-host disease will be after the transplant occurs.

Graft-versus-host disease occurs when bone marrow is rejected by the patient and will not bond with the body.

On the number six chromosome of the white blood cell, there are three regions: A, B and D, Johnson said. There are two antigens on each of these regions, and those are what need to match.

Even when the six antigens match,

FCA, developed in the '50s, continues to grow

CRYSTAL SAWALICH
Collegian

It all started as a vision for Don McClanen at Oklahoma A&M, now Oklahoma State University, and evolved into a $15 million-a-year reality.

Fellowship for Christian Athletes was developed in the 1950s by McClanen to use sports and athletics as a platform to share the gospel of Jesus Christ in schools and on a professional level, said Don Hilkemeier, vice-president for public relations at the FCA National Headquarters in Kansas City, Mo.

Since its charter in 1954, FCA has spread to 5,000 junior high schools, high schools and colleges across the United States. FCA currently has about 33,000 members nationally, Hilkemeier said.

Tim Robertson, state director of FCA, said Kansas has 16 colleges with FCA huddles. One of those huddles is located at K-State.

K-State's huddle consists of 35 student-athlete members, said Jerry Palmieri, K-State FCA adviser.

Recharted in September 1987, Palmieri said he set out to help establish a religious fellowship group to learn more about Jesus Christ and to lift each other up.

Russ Campbell, senior in education and FCA member, said he feels the same.

"It's interesting to see how others believe in the Lord, and it's fun also," he said.

Palmieri also said he feels it is necessary to provide a fellowship for each other outside of the usual routine.

FCA sponsors many activities that benefit not only members of the huddles, but the entire community, Robertson said.

For example, FCA brought in about 600 high school students for the K-State — Colorado game last season.

He said every year there is a state conference at Rock Springs Ranch in Junction City. In late February, FCA will sponsor a College Weekend at Pittsburg.

FCA also will be host to an annual golf tournament, Robertson said.

Truly resigns position as head of space agency

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Under White House pressure, Richard Truly resigned as head of the space agency Wednesday.

"Frankly, it wasn't what I had planned, but it's American history for you," Truly said in an interview. "It's a situation where the president decided ... to make a change. I've always said I served at the pleasure of the president."

Truly, a former astronaut, has been administrator of the agency since 1989. In the three previous years, he headed the NASA effort to return the shuttle to flight after the Jan. 28, 1986, Challenger disaster in which seven astronauts died.

Truly will remain on the job until April 1 "and the search for a new NASA administrator has begun," President Bush said in a written statement, adding the resignation was accepted "regretfully."

A NASA source said Truly was puzzled by the pressure to resign, which came from the new White House chief of staff, Samuel Skinner. The discussions over the job involved Skinner, Vice President Dan Quayle as head of the National Space Council and Bush, the source said.

The Space Council has been at odds with Truly over several issues which one Capitol Hill source characterized as "nothing less than a struggle over control of the space program."

Sen. Albert Gore, D-Tenn., said the council may have forced Truly to leave by its insistence "on running NASA from the vice president's office even when the professionals at NASA advised strongly against the vice president's constant overruling of policy decisions at the agency."

Gore, chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee's subcommittee on science, technology and space, said he saw that as a troubling sign. He called Truly "a good man who did a good job under difficult circumstances."

Rep. George Brown, D-Calif. and the chairman of the House space science subcommittee, said Truly had been under pressure from the space council for years. "I didn't think that the vice president and (executive director Mark) Albrecht carried that much weight," Brown said.

The NASA source said the council "works on agendas instead of business solutions. They meddled in the running of anything. They go to subterranear. methods and never made a phone call to Truly to come up and talk about their problems."

Truly said he has not decided on his future. "I'm young and not ready to retire, and I want to do something important and something fun."

Neither Truly nor the White House would say who the leading candidates are to become administrator.

"It was under Dick Truly's able leadership and steady hand that NASA was able to rebuild the space shuttle program and return it to safe operation in 1988," the White House statement said. "The nation owes Admiral Truly a great debt of gratitude."

VALENTINE'S DAY

Dueling twins, Valentine grins

ROGER STEINBROCK
Collegian

There's something special about Valentine's Day.

I don't know what it is, but I always remember the paper heart I made for my parents in kindergarten.

I sat at the Red Table, because it was my favorite color. And I distinctly remember the other three kindergartners at the table with me.

There was a set of twins, and I was always confused. I always called one by the other name and vice versa. Looking back, I can't believe their mother would dress them in the matching clothes — every day.

The table was covered with red butcher paper. A box of crayons was in the center.

Also in the center was a tin can wrapped in red construction paper with Laddie pencils and curved-edge safety scissors that couldn't cut paper — only rip it.

We all fought over the scissors with the green protection cover on the finger holes. Of course, we didn't know what it was for, but we thought it was neat. One of the twins grabbed hold of those scissors first. Boy, did she think she was cool.

Mrs. Larson, the teacher, handed out the paper, and we started by folding the paper in half. Well, we did the best we could for kindergartners.

Then Mrs. Larson handed out the half-shaped hearts, and we began tracing the shape with the oversized crayons.

Then we cut around our crayon tracing. The twin who had the scissors with the green plastic thumb holes traced her half-heart on the wrong side of the paper and got a heart that was broken into two halves.

I remember her sister laughing, but she didn't think it was too funny. She started bawling.

Then she hurled the scissors across the table at her laughing sister. I thought she'd leap over the table and tackle her, strangling her, as they fell to the floor.

Mrs. Larson quickly solved the problem by sending the laughing twin to the Blue Table, and she also quickly cut out a heart for the teary-eyed twin.

My heart wasn't the greatest, but I knew it was better than the laughing twin's. She sat at the Blue Table, still laughing. Her heart was the most jagged heart in the class.

Mrs. Larson must have learned by experience, because she had pre-cut smaller hearts for the center of our bigger hearts. She handed out the hearts and put a styrofoam tray with glue in the center of the table.

We used popsicle sticks to spread the glue on the back of the heart. Everyone seemed to like glue, and those who didn't end up eating theirs put more than enough on the back of the heart.

After it dried, I wrote "Mom and Dad — Happy Valentine's Day! Love, Roger."

Of course, some of the letters looked funny, because I had to hunch up in my seat to see the blackboard with the words written on it.

The crying twin had trouble writing her words, and many of the letters were backwards. When she was done, her sister came back over to the table and started laughing again. Again, the sister didn't think it was funny, and the other twin started crying.

When I walked home, I didn't put it in my book bag. I wanted to admire it as I walked home with my brother.

The wind started to blow. I held on to the heart, even though I had mittens on my hands. It ripped a little, but I was glad I didn't drop it, because the snow would have destroyed it.

That night when my parents got home from work, I handed it to them. I'm sure I had one of those ear-to-ear grins on my face that seems to be my trademark.

With smear marks and clumps of dried glue all over it, the paper heart held tightly together. Despite the jagged edges and the small rip near the bottom, Mom and Dad took it and smiled at me.

The heart may have been jaggedly cut, but it represented more than just a shape — it meant love.

Tradition

write men's names on scraps of paper, roll them up and place each one in a little piece of clay.

They dropped the clay into a bucket of water. The first piece of paper to come to the top would have the name of their true love written on it.

Also in the 1700s, unmarried women pinned five bay leaves to their pillows, one in the center and one in each of the four corners. If this charm worked properly, the woman would see her future husband in her dreams.

One of the oldest customs, however, was the lottery.

Single women's names would be placed in a hat. On Valentine's Day, the village's single men would draw a name. For that day, the man was to treat that woman special and, if he chose, give her gifts.

there still is a risk of graft-versus-host disease, Johnson said, but prevention is possible with the use of medication.

Johnson said the only time medication is not used in bone marrow transplants is when bone marrow is taken from one identical twin and used in the other.

Fabrizius said she doesn't know anything about the donor, other than the donor is female, not a Kansas resident and didn't come from the K-State Bone Marrow Donor Drive, sponsored by the American Red Cross Association.

Fabrizius said she will not meet her donor until at least six months following the transplant.

The transplant will not be until after July 1, because of the tests she has left to go through, she said.

It will take place at the Fred Hutchinson Cancer Research Center in Seattle.

"Ten days prior to the transplant, I will go into the hospital." Fabrizius said.

She said she will go through various degrees of chemotherapy and radiation in the hospital, depending on what the doctors determine is best suited for her case.

This process will kill all the bone marrow cells, Johnson said, then the new bone marrow will be infused and spread throughout the body.

Fabrizius said after the transplant she will remain in the hospital for two months and in Seattle for two more months.

IDEA

on income, people should not default. The amount repaid every year would be put on the borrowers tax return, as if it were tax owed, to be collected by the IRS. Missed payments would be considered tax evasion.

Secondly, because IDEA would use direct government capital instead of bank capital, the loan capital cost would be lower. This would eliminate the guarantee agencies and banks involvement. There would be no fees assessed by the banks and guarantee agencies.

Finally, no needs analysis would be required with the IDEA program. The only thing a person would need to do is to go into a school's financial aid office and put his or her name on a list.

"Under IDEA, every student, regardless of his or her parents' income, would be able to take out loans for education with complete confidence that repayment would be affordable, no matter what income the student ends up earning after leaving school," Petri said in the release.

"The interest rate for an IDEA loan would be 2 percent plus the value of the 91-day treasury bill at the time the loan is taken," said Conant.

While IDEA could benefit students, Larry Moeder, director of Student Financial Assistance, gave several reasons why this program would never be implemented at K-State.

Moeder attended a regional meeting for financial aid directors last weekend. He said the feeling there among other financial aid directors was that the IDEA plan was going to fail.

"The IDEA plan will probably not go because it was pushed into Senate rather quickly," Moeder said.

"It would cost about $100,000 to set up a direct lending program," said Moeder. "We would have to hire additional staff and purchase more equipment. A collections process would need to be initiated also."

Moeder said that, although IDEA would not require a needs analysis, an IDEA loan would not benefit students.

"The eligibility for grants and lower interest loans may be gone if a student would use the IDEA program," Moeder said.

The student's eligibility for grants and loans would be less because the IDEA loan would be subtracted from the budget established for the student by the needs analysis.

Moeder said there is already an income-contingent loan program at various schools, but it has not been very successful.

IDEA is currently on the Senate floor awaiting action.

to get at least the minimum sentence for that crime, Kennedy said. Probation, assignment to a community correctional service program or any suspension of sentence will not be granted to any person, he said.

"I am afraid of an otherwise fine young person being faced with criminal law that's going to result in a prison sentence. I want to inform these young idiots that they should rather get punched in the mouth than carry these pistols," Kennedy said.

"You might be Mister Joe Cool, the nicest guy ever, no (criminal) background, have three life-saving ribbons from the Boy Scouts, and an Eagle Scout and an 'A' student, you name it, the judge cannot consider any of that. You'll serve in prison the mandatory minimum prison sentence for the crime charged," he said. "There is no excuse to carry a pistol to go out for a night's fun."

Here's a way to learn faster and work smarter without putting a lot of cash down. It's called the Apple Computer Loan.

Right now, qualifying students, parents borrowing on behalf of students, and faculty and staff members with an annual income of at least $15,000, can purchase an Apple® Macintosh® computer system using a special financing plan set up just for you.

Apply to borrow from $1,500 to $10,000 for a Macintosh computer, other Apple products—including the AppleCare® extended service plan, and up to three software packages.

If you're a student, you'll be able to defer principal payments for up to 48 months while in school, making interest-only payments until 30 days after you graduate or leave school. Interest rates are surprisingly low, and you can take up to eight years to repay.*

So stop by today and fill out a loan application.

Because this is one way to afford a Macintosh, even if you can't afford a Macintosh.

* The interest rate is the average of the higher of the 30-day or 90-day commercial paper rates as reported in the Wall Street Journal, plus a spread of 4.35%. After June 30, 1992, the spread may increase if program costs increase, but will not exceed 5.6%; existing borrowers would be notified at least 30 days in advance. The loan may be prepaid at any time without penalty. For the month of October, 1991, the rate was 10.068%, with an annual percentage rate of 11.4035%. This rate would result in monthly payments of $18.81 for every $1,000 borrowed. The total finance charge for each $1,000 borrowed would be $442.87. If you elect to defer principal payments for four years, the APR on your loan will be 11.0327%. Your monthly payments during the deferment period will be $8.28, and your first monthly payment of principal and interest will be $29.67 per every $1,000 borrowed. The total finance charge on every $1,000 you borrow will be $647.24. The interest rate is subject to increase after you have received the loan. Each applicant pays a $20.00 non-refundable application fee. Approved borrowers will be charged a 4% loan origination fee. Loan applications after June 30, 1992, may be subject to a higher loan origination fee. The loan origination fee will be added to the requested loan amount and repaid over the life of the loan.

New rainstorm threatens

Californians stockpile sandbags, prepare themselves for more flooding

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — Homeowners and emergency crews battered by this week's floods, among the worst of the century, beefed up their defenses Thursday as a big new Pacific storm loomed, drawing energy and moisture from the tropics.

The storms that hit Southern California beginning Sunday have dumped more than a foot of rain in some areas, killed at least seven people, and swamped homes, businesses, streets and highways.

Four people were missing. Preliminary damage estimates in Los Angeles County alone topped $7.6 million.

The region got a chance to catch up a little Thursday during spells of sunshine as showery remnants of the latest storm front rolled through the Los Angeles area with thunder and lightning.

"We're getting ready for the next big push," said Bob Collis, spokesman for the Los Angeles Fire Department.

"We've just ordered another 10,000 sandbags," said Malibu fire Capt. Virgil Lockhart.

The Los Angeles Unified School District, the nation's second largest school district, canceled Friday classes for nearly 600,000 students. The district called it "a prudent common sense precaution."

Meteorologists said the strength of the storms and heavy rain resulted from El Nino, the sporadic warming of surface water in the eastern Pacific that generates strong thunderstorms over the equator.

The jet stream can funnel that energy and moisture northward to fuel storms like the one expected to hit by late today with the potential for an additional 3-5 inches of rain.

And yet another storm farther out to sea was forecast by Tuesday.

Monday's storm, which flooded part of the San Fernando Valley and stranded motorists, "was computed to be a 100-year event," or the worst that might be expected in any 100-year period, said Rick Leifield, assistant chief of engineering for the Los Angeles District of the Army Corps of Engineers.

Residents of coastal, canyon and suburban neighborhoods constructed, rebuilt and reinforced sandbag canals and barriers to protect property from more high water and mudslides.

The Malibu coastal resort was awash in water, mud and debris.

Beaches were littered with uprooted trees, timbers and trash as filthy, sewage-contaminated waves crashed to shore.

Raw sewage flushed out of overloaded treatment plants contaminated a 70-mile stretch of Los Angeles County beaches, which were closed by health officials.

Northwest of Los Angeles in Ventura County, where a flash flood turned the normally dry Ventura River into a muddy torrent, authorities searched the muck for possible bodies. One had been found in the area.

The flood had washed through an area where homeless people camped, carried dozens of motor homes and trailer homes out to sea from a recreational vehicle park, and swept over a freeway.

"If the bodies went into the ocean, they tend to sink, and then they float to the surface days later," said fire department spokesman Barry Simmons.

Since the storms began, three people died in traffic accidents, two drowned and a man and woman who was nine months pregnant were suffocated by a mudslide that poured into their bedroom.

Standing room only available at meeting about mainframe

Kruh calls for discussion to get questions in open

AMY COX
Collegian

About 40 staff and students concerned about the possible move of K-State's mainframe resources to the University of Kansas met with administrators Thursday.

The faculty and staff attended a meeting announced Thursday morning by Vice Provost Bob Kruh.

It was standing room only in the Cardwell Hall classroom meeting with Kruh and John Streeter, associate director of administrative systems.

Kruh announced the meeting to provide an open forum for Computer Networking Services staff and concerned students who had been communicating their questions on the mainframe's BITMAIL.

"I felt it would be useful to get the group back together to spend a little more time — perhaps rehearsing, going into detail and answering any questions you may have," Kruh said.

"When conversations were first being held with KU, and this idea came up, my intention was then to let people know that it was being discussed because so many people here have a stake in this.

"I know that this does raise a lot of questions," he said. "There are probably a lot more questions at this stage than answers."

Kruh said the idea came about during a meeting at KU he attended along with CNS Director Tom Gallagher, Streeter, Vice President for Administration and Finance Thomas Rawson, KU Computing Services Director Dick Mann and other KU administrators.

He said the idea was being considered because the likelihood of more generous resources in the future is not likely.

"The proverbial bottom line is that we probably wouldn't even be here talking about this if K-State were not historically underfunded," Kruh said.

It was asked if the money needed for the future could be generated from outside donors as in the case of Farrell Library and the engineering library.

Kruh said outside donations would be welcomed, but a sustained stream of revenue would be needed to afford any kind of upgrade in the current system, which is not exactly new.

"We can't afford the next upgrade of our mainframe right now, which would be a processor," Streeter said.

"The University went from having a very old system to one that is eight years old, because that is all that was affordable."

Beth Schwindt, senior in social science and mainframe user, asked Kruh about distributing a survey to all mainframe users to determine the computer needs of students.

Kruh said this was a possibility, and that there more likely would be organization of a focus group of users from different computing areas to provide a representation of users overall.

The image ramification of moving mainframe resources to KU also came up in discussion.

"Take any senior in high school who doesn't know about this K-State-KU partnership or consortium," said Richard Summerhill, associate professor of computing services.

"To him, all he is going to see is, KU has this new, upgraded mainframe, and K-State just has these terminals hooked up to KU. They're going to go to KU.

"Take any Kansas Board of Regents member who doesn't know about computing," he said, "To the board, it is going to be justified to give all this money to KU, because they're providing computing services for us."

Kruh said those concerns would have to be addressed before the idea could become a formal proposal.

He said there are three options currently being considered.

The first option is a proposal of outsourcing from IBM in Boulder, Colo. He said that option is expected to be out of the University's price range. Second is the KU option.

CHANGING MAINFRAME

- A meeting between K-State administrators resulted in the possibility of phasing out K-State's mainframe and leasing KU's mainframe resources in an effort to be more cost efficient in the future.
- The possibility was announced to Computer Networking Services staff in a Feb. 5 meeting called by Provost James Coffman and Vice Provost Bob Kruh.
- The announcement came as a shock to the staff and generated questions and rumors communicated throughout the department on the mainframe's BITMAIL system.

Cancer claims professor's life

Stewart specialized in theory, history of composition, rhetoric

JULIE LONG
Collegian

Donald Stewart, professor of English, died of cancer Thursday after 10 days in St. Francis Hospital in Topeka. He was 61.

He was suffering from multiple myeloma, a blood cancer. It was diagnosed about five years ago.

A K-State professor since 1968, Stewart taught 20th-Century British and Western American literature. His specialty was the history and theory of composition and rhetoric.

Pat Stewart, his wife, said he had been in good spirits lately.

"He was teaching his classes until two weeks ago," she said.

Vince Gillespie, associate professor of English, said Stewart was respected by both his colleagues at K-State and nationwide.

"He was a very self-effacing man," Gillespie said. "He was as authentic and genuine a person as you'll ever meet.

"He was the president of the most nationally recognized organization in his field."

Stewart was elected to a one-year term as president of the Conference on College Composition and Communication in 1983.

Throughout his career, Gillespie said, Stewart published about 50 articles, 50 reviews, several book chapters, three major books, 50 professional papers, and 20 short stories and essays.

"He also published one of the most important personal accounts of Yellowstone National Forest where he served as park ranger and naturalist for a decade," Gillespie said.

Ralph Titus, professor in Extension communications and manager of KKSU-AM 580, said Stewart was an asset to K-State, the state of Kansas and the nation.

"He was a good friend, a good man," Titus said.

Cost-cutting bill clears way for primary

Legislation to appropriate $1.5 million anticipated by House

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The Senate concurred on Thursday with House amendments to a bill cutting the projected cost of the April 7 presidential primary election.

The vote, 25-15, sent the bill to Gov. Joan Finney, who is expected to sign it.

The action removed one of the last legislative roadblocks to holding the election.

All that remains now is for the Legislature to appropriate the $1.5 million the election is anticipated to cost, with changes made by the bill.

The House Appropriations Committee endorsed for passage Thursday a bill that includes the $1.5-million appropriation.

The committee accepted without discussion a subcommittee's recommendation that the money for the primary be approved.

Without the bill passed by the Senate, the cost of the primary was estimated at $1.88 million.

Provisions in the bill would cut those costs by an estimated $350,000.

They include having the state print all the ballots, as opposed to counties printing them; not rotating candidates' names on the ballot; and using volunteer workers at polling places.

Finney recommended spending $1.5 million in her proposed fiscal year 1993 budget.

Filing ended at noon Wednesday, with 15 Republican and 17 Democratic candidates placing their names on the Kansas ballot for April 7.

The candidates include President Bush and his chief challenger, Patrick Buchanan, on the Republican side and all five major Democratic contenders — Jerry Brown, Bill Clinton, Tom Harkin, Bob Kerrey and Paul Tsongas.

The Senate Ways and Means Committee endorsed a bill to spend the $1.5 million, but during Senate debate last week, it was amended to cancel the primary.

However, that bill is bottled up in the House Elections Committee and House leaders said it will not be brought to the floor for a vote.

Thursday's Senate vote was a blow to Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, who has been fighting a rear-guard action trying to get the primary canceled.

She went before the House Elections Committee Thursday morning trying to get that panel to endorse the Senate bill killing the primary.

But the committee took no action on it, and House Majority Leader Tom Sawyer, D-Wichita, said he would not bring it to the House floor for debate.

UNITED NATIONS

Teams encounter frustrated Iraqis

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MANAMA, Bahrain — Iraqis increasingly are venting their frustration about U.N. trade sanctions on visiting U.N. inspectors, the leader of an inspection team said Thursday after returning from Baghdad.

But Maurizio Zifferero said his team found no signs on its most recent trip that Iraq was not complying with U.N. efforts to eradicate its nuclear weapons program.

Under the U.N. Security Council cease-fire resolution that ended the Persian Gulf War, Iraq must rid itself of weapons of mass destruction.

The council said sanctions on Iraq will remain until Saddam Hussein complies fully with these terms.

The sanctions have increased prices for food and other basics and caused shortages of medicine and spare parts, making life hard for the average Iraqi.

Zifferero, an Italian representing the International Atomic Energy Agency, said when Iraqis see the U.N. emblem, "they are convinced that it's our fault, and they begin shouting, even women and children, from windows."

The government-controlled media print scathing attacks on the teams.

Some U.N. officials suspect an orchestrated government attempt to counter blame of Hussein for the hardships the nation of 17 million is suffering.

Zifferero led a 36-member team on an eight-day visit to Iraq.

It was his third trip under the U.N. Special Commission.

TRADE SANCTIONS

Restrictions and trade sanctions imposed on Iraq after the Persian Gulf War will stay in effect until Iraq has destroyed all weapons of mass destruction. These weapons include

- Nuclear weapons
- Chemical weapons
- Biological weapons
- Long-range missiles

Problems sanctions are causing

- Higher food prices and other basics
- Shortages of medicine and spare parts

New York representative calls for probe of chemical company

Justice Department should investigate Dow Corning, says Weiss

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Rep. Ted Weiss, D-N.Y., said Thursday he would ask the Justice Department to investigate whether Dow Corning Corp. misled federal regulators about the safety of silicone gel breast implants.

Weiss, chairman of the House Government Operations human resources subcommittee, said he wants the Justice Department to open a criminal investigation of Dow Corning Corp.'s dealings with the Food and Drug Administration about the breast implant issue.

Weiss said the Justice Department should determine whether Dow Corning withheld safety and scientific data from the FDA about silicone gel breast implants.

The company said earlier this week that it remains convinced the devices pose no serious health threats.

Hundreds of pages of internal Dow Corning documents the company released this week show it has known of complaints about the implants for decades.

But the firm said the more serious complaints were unfounded.

Citing the documents, FDA Commissioner David Kessler last month sought — and obtained — a voluntary moratorium on the use of silicone gel breast implants.

Lawsuits filed against implant manufacturers claim that gel leaks cause a variety of health problems, including cancer and immune disorders.

Spokesmen for both the Justice Department and the FDA said they wouldn't comment on Weiss's request because they had not received his letter.

Neither Justice Department spokesman Joseph Krovisky nor the FDA's Susan Cruzan would comment when asked if the government already was conducting an investigation of Dow Corning.

Dow Corning spokesman Robert Grupp said the FDA "has not indicated they are doing a criminal investigation," even though the agency has made repeated requests for information about the product.

Meanwhile, another manufacturer of silicone breast implants has sought a temporary restraining order to bar the FDA advisory panel from meeting next week on the issue.

A federal judge in Baltimore was scheduled to have a hearing Friday on the request for a temporary restraining order by McGhan Medical Corp. of Santa Barbara, Calif.

The company charges in court papers that several members of the advisory panel have shown a bias against silicone gel breast implants.

It also accuses Kessler of prejudging the issue and seeks a court order directing him to turn the matter over to Health Secretary Louis Sullivan.

The advisory panel is scheduled to meet next week to reconsider whether silicone breast implants are safe.

LEGISLATURE

New school finance plan may lead to mediocre schools, critics warn

Tax increase, cuts in spending unfair for students in rural schools

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Students, parents and school officials warned Thursday that a school finance plan drafted by House Democratic leaders would doom children to attending uniformly mediocre schools.

Most of the people who criticized the proposal came from either the Kansas City area suburbs of Johnson County or small towns in southwest Kansas.

The school finance plan would either increase their property taxes or force their school districts to cut spending.

Their criticism focused on proposals to establish a uniform, statewide property tax levy to finance public schools and to have the state determine how much each district could spend per pupil.

About 50 people spoke in opposition to the House Democrats' plan during a joint hearing of the House Education and Taxation Committees.

Legislators heard testimony from supporters of the proposal on Wednesday.

One speaker, Don Concannon, a Hugoton attorney, said residents in his area are ready to secede from the state over the issue.

Concannon, a former Republican state chairman, has encouraged southwest Kansans to consider secession to express their anger.

"If the Legislature resorts to political expediency, rural Kansas will cease to exist as we now know it," Concannon said.

"We will gladly share our assets with all those who choose to live in our area, but we refuse to let others destroy us without pursuing a better alternative."

About 400 people attended the hearing, which was in a room at the Kansas Expocentre instead of in the Statehouse.

The meeting was in conjunction with a convention of the Kansas Association of School Boards.

However, most audience members did not appear to support the plan, as the school board association does.

Many wore orange "Say no to socialism" buttons, and they applauded frequently.

At times, the committee's chairman, Rep. Rick Bowden, D-Goddard, tried to cut off speakers to keep their presentations short. His attempts drew the strongest response from Melinda Rogge, a Sublette High School student.

"I got up at 4 a.m. to be here, and I think I have to right finish speaking," she said. Loud applause followed.

Under the Democrats' proposal, the uniform property tax levy would be 45 mills, or $405 for a $75,000 home.

It would cut property taxes in 253 of the state's 304 school districts, but in some of the remaining districts, especially those in southwest Kansas, taxes would increase dramatically.

The plan also would set a statewide per-pupil spending figure of $3,675, and districts in Johnson County would in theory face large budget cuts.

However, the proposal also would allow them to exceed their state-set budget figure by 10 percent, with poorer districts getting some state funds to help them if they wanted to take advantage of the "local option."

Still, speakers said the plan was not fair.

They also questioned the notion that equal access to a quality education for all students means that districts have to spend roughly the same amount of money.

"By basing our definition of quality on the dollars we spend, we are not creating an accurate, long-lasting decision," said Donald Goss, president of the Olathe Area Chamber of Commerce.

"We are saying, 'Here are the dollars. Now fit quality education into them.'"

In other testimony:

■ Rep. Gene Shore, R-Johnson, said that if residents in other parts of the state are jealous of low property tax levies in southwest Kansas, they should move there.

"We ask for fairness," he said.

STUDENT SENATE

Mainframe dominates debate; ticket campout discussed

JOHN SHARTZER
Collegian

The mainframe dilemma was discussed for about two hours during a Student Senate meeting Thursday night.

There has been talk among University officials recently of phasing out K-State's mainframe and leasing the University of Kansas mainframe for cost efficiency.

Elizabeth Schwindt, junior in social sciences, approached Senate in the defense of the K-State mainframe.

She said her major concerns deal with security and the stability of every computer system.

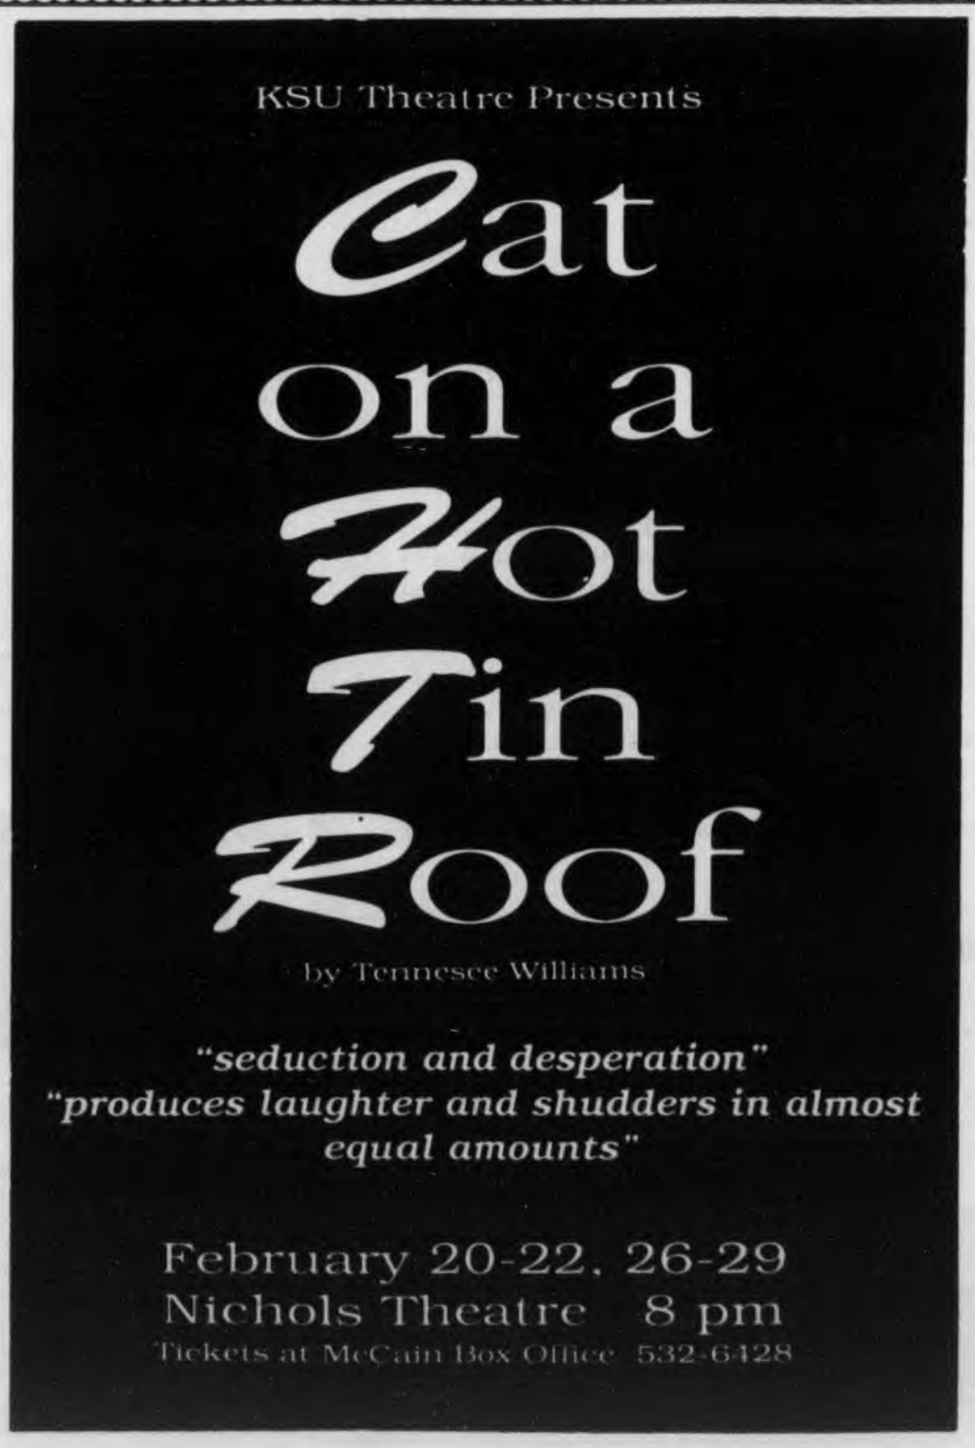
"For this plan to work, the computer would have to run perfectly all of the time and as we all know, computers just aren't that reliable," she said.

"If the system goes down, then someone from K-State would have to go to Lawrence to repair the system in order to protect the safety of our records.

"If you have ever used LYNX, then you have used our system," she said.

"Therefore, it is not only the computer students who have to worry, every student needs to get involved like they did when the colleges of architecture and human ecology were threatened."

Jim Spencer, business administration senator, and Wayne Glantz, graduate senator, told Senate that, as of right now, there is no official proposal for the mainframe switch.



However, the consideration for the switch is no secret.

"The reason the administration is considering this is it would be more efficient for K-State computing," Spencer said.

COLLEGIAN OPINION

THE CLINTON LETTER

"Because of my opposition to the draft and the war, I am in great sympathy with those who are not willing to fight, kill, and maybe die for their country (i.e. the particular policy of a particular government) right or wrong."

EDITORIALS

Clinton shouldn't be persecuted for opposition to war

1969. A young Rhodes scholar named Bill Clinton wrote a letter to a former instructor, Col. Eugene Holmes, at the University of Arkansas. The letter outlined that Clinton was opposed to the draft and did not want to be drafted to fight in an unjust Vietnam War. Clinton asked Holmes to help him get a deferment by joining the University of Arkansas' ROTC.

The letter was dated Dec. 3, 1969. Unbeknownst to Clinton, President Nixon had cancelled the draft two days before in favor of a new lottery system that would pull recruits in. Clinton had drawn a high number, 311, and would not be called.

Clinton never served his time in the Arkansas ROTC, even after thanking Holmes for helping him out.

1992. Bill Clinton is running for president. The letter has surfaced. A "buy American" nation with a newfound patriotism after a brief war in the Persian Gulf is asking the candidate why he didn't serve his country. Voters are turning away, doubting his sense of patriotism.

No one who has ever fought in a war has wanted to. George Bush talks of his days as a pilot in WWII with pride, but he knows he was scared spitless. Bob Dole will tell you the same stories. Bob Kerrey will talk bravado about his days as a SEAL in 'Nam, so it's a bipartisan thing.

Clinton is no Dan Quayle, but he tried to dodge the draft. He should have. The Vietnam War was a stupid war. Clinton should not be publicly witch-hunted for his attempts to get out of the draft's swath, no matter what the American consensus is. Being American is about being an individual and not going along with the crowd. Anybody who was alive and had a choice back during the Vietnam War did everything they could to stay the hell out of that hole.

Some will say that this position is wrong and, perhaps, un-American. They will be the same people that will say they supported the troops during the recent Gulf War. They may have supported them, but before they vote against Clinton on this silly past incident, they better think why they weren't signing up to fight alongside our troops.

Haitian people need help at home

No one likes to be called a hypocrite.

Those who dictate U.S. foreign policy should.

Following the ouster of Haitian President Jean-Bertrand Aristide in September, thousands of Haitian refugees have fled to U.S. shores in hope of being granted political asylum.

They are being sent back.

Why? U.S. officials reason they have no documented proof that the Haitian people are being prosecuted.

Refugees are forced out of the United States and back to their native country as they scream and cry with fear. They tell stories of friends and family members being murdered. They fear they will be next.

That's not enough proof, we say.

We need documented persecution.

But who is going to record the violations? The government responsible for the wrongdoings?

Hardly. We never asked Iraq for a list of Kuwaiti citizens forced out of their homes by Iraqi soldiers.

Yet, we got involved.

The U.S. claims to be devoted to the defense of human rights throughout the world. However, this devotion only seems to be genuine when an economic advantage is apparent.

In Haiti, there is no economic advantage. It's 6 million people from one of the world's poorest nations.

The U.S. recently took a positive step by instructing the U.S. embassy in Haiti to check for human rights violations. If they confirm the horror stories heard by refugees, the U.S. should approach the United Nations on behalf of Haiti.

If we don't want these refugees in our country, we should take the initiative as a world leader and try to make theirs worth living in.

Valentine's Day isn't for Broken Hearts

Excellent wretch! Perdition catch my soul
But I do love thee! And when I love thee not
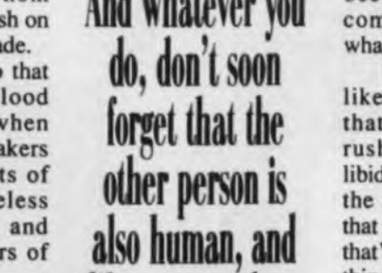
Chaos is come again.
— Othello, Act III, scene iii

I'm relatively sure that when Bill Shakespeare penned these words so many centuries ago, little did he suspect they would begin my meandering reflections on what this day means to me this year.

It's Valentine's Day, that nakedly vain time of the year when tormented souls cast aside their inhibitions and send tokens of affection to the person whom they've had a crush on since the third grade.



Today's also that capitalistic blood harvest when greeting-card makers reap the benefits of exploiting hopeless romantics and desperate seekers of affection.

And for all the lonely people, it's a holiday to be despised as those around them bask in the warming glow of being needed or desired by admirers or better halves.

But none of these descriptions seem to fit my own particular, peculiar motif about what today has come to signify.

This day for me is one wrought with a vague nagging emptiness. Not the kind that turns once strong-willed people into pathetic zombies that sleepwalk their way through life, but the kind that haunts the lunatic fringes of my emotional consciousness like a restless cat.

No matter how hard I laugh, no matter how much I drink, no matter how hard I try to ignore it, the distant emptiness continues to pester me like a rash that can't be scratched. Sleep offers some reprieve, but the distance sometimes manifests itself into those surreal dreams that remain my companions long after I awake.

JARED GREGOIRE

You see, the one person I have any real desire to reveal how much I still care about has gone her separate way, apart from mine. The narrow crack in our relationship somehow grew into a splitting fissure that shattered the entire structure and sent it crashing to the ground last New Year's Eve.

Despite all that had transpired between us, we finally both agreed that we should part from one another and just let it be. It's been six weeks, and for me, at least, the dust of the collapse has yet to completely settle.

I'm sure we all know the tale.

So you may ask why in the hell I'm relating my dating dysfunctions to you. "Everyone goes through it, and sure it hurts, but this too shall pass," would probably be the standard rebuttal.

I simply tell my familiar story in the hopes of reminding you lucky ones, who still have that person who's half of what you are, to not become too comfortable with what you have.

And whatever you do, don't soon forget that the other person is also human, and like you, needs to hear and feel a voice and a touch.

Keep what feels like "spring fever," that warm weather rush of wandering libido, from becoming the chisel that starts that deadly little crack that'll bring the whole thing down.

Deal with the fears of what might happen in the future and prevent them from driving a wedge between you now. This wedge of fear is the strongest and worst of all devices to pummel relationships and their starring characters into so much fine powder.

And whatever you do, don't soon forget that the other person is also human, and like you, needs to hear and feel a voice and a touch.

All of this is ancient advice, to be sure, but the best of sage words are usually the ones most quickly forgotten. Yes, we all know the tale, but with time we turn our backs on the inevitable outcome, forgetting how it ends. And when we do eventually wake up, the one who was the most important has been lost to the impenetrable mist of the irreclaimable.

To the one I let get away, I'll be an excellent wretch for a time, and chaos has come again. I miss her, and in the end I only have myself to blame.

Perhaps someday, when my head is a little clearer of all these damned cobwebs, I'll heed my own preachy advice. But until that time arrives, you can take it for what it's worth, run with it, and don't look back.

THE SEARCH FOR ROY'S HAND

No one was sure who had found the boy by the roadside. The rival radio stations each claimed that their late-night DJs had found the boy, and rumors circulating in the nearby small town said that a local farmer had found him. One thing was sure, though.

His hand was still missing.

The boy had been wandering the field on a cold December night when he decided to climb a windmill. As he neared the top, he later explained, he slipped on the icy frame. During his descent to the ground, his right hand was severed by one of the rusty blades.

Although the boy, Roy Foster, had had the strength to make it to the roadside, he was still quite delirious in his struggle to get there. Consequently, he had lost his hand somewhere in the field.

Because of the cold weather, doctors predicted that the hand would be preserved. If someone found it, they said it could be reattached, and Roy could lead a relatively normal life.

That is, they said, unless some animal had gotten hold of it.

News of the hand spread faster than a case of head lice in a border town.

Jason White, local radio personality, led the pack of hounds to Roy's room at the hospital. They were all foaming at the mouth, ready to hump the leg of society. Jason thrust his right hand out for the boy to shake, brought it back awkwardly and thrust out his left.

Microphones crept forward.

TOM LISTER

"Roy," he said, "I'm Jason White, program director for KJAM — southeast Kansas' home of rock and roll — and we at KJAM heard you have a little problem."

Roy nodded in his medicated daze and lifted the stump.

Jason swallowed hard after seeing the blood creep through the bandages. Staph infection probably lurked within.

"Anyway," Jason said in his commercial voice, "All of us here at KJAM would like to help you solve that problem, and have a K-Jammin' good time while we do it."

"We all know the field where your hand is located, but we don't know exactly where your hand is. Now, do we?"

Everybody shook their heads.

"At this very moment," White said, "our KJAM DJs are stashing cases of Miller Genuine Draft in that field. Think of how lucky you'd be to find a free case of beer— on KJAM!"

"If our listeners happen to find Roy's hand while they're scoping for a case of beer, that's great! But if they find Roy's hand, they'll get BACKSTAGE PASSES TO MOTLEY CRUE!!!"

Applause filled the room. Orderlies ran down the hall to phone their friends.

Jason had arranged for the station's mascot, the K-Jam Beaver, to visit the hospital. The furry mascot stood on one side of the bed while Jason stood on the other. People ate their cornflakes and scrambled eggs the next morning to the picture of smiling Roy waving his bloody stump.

"Let's find that hand!" Jason yelled as flash bulbs burst.

Back at the field, search dogs pulled eagerly at their leashes, strangling themselves on their choke holds. White had managed to sneak a few of the mongrels into the hospital to get a sniff of Roy's remaining hand. They wanted Roy's hand as bad as a prairie chicken.

It had been 15 hours since the start of the contest, and there were no results yet.

Suddenly a figure emerged the darkness. A college student was dangling Roy's frozen bloody hand in one hand and holding a can of Miller Genuine Draft in the other.

"How about those backstage passes?" he asked.

Jason ran across the frozen field in a second. He felt the television reporters on his heels and broke mid-song into a live spot.

"We've found the hand!" he screamed into the mike. He saw Mark Teemer, KQLO's station manager, smiling next to him.

"The mike's dead," Teemer said and held up a pair of wire snips in his hand. The television crews were almost there. Teemer snagged the ring finger and held on for dear life.

"Come on," Jason said. "We found the damn kid."

"Bullshit," Teemer said. "We all know the farmer did."

The two short men were under the television lights as they struggled for the hand.

Roy's hand split in two. No one remembered to make a wish.

Jason would later remember that his half had felt like a chicken-fried steak.

Jason stumbled in his fright, fell on the frozen ground and violently threw up his Chinese dinner. Shrimp, rice and a Bud Light steamed in the cold air.

A search dog unknowingly ate at the pile.

Berbain home for Olympics

'Once-in-a-lifetime opportunity' attracts student to Albertville

ROB DE CORTIE
Collegian

At least one K-State student will watch the Olympic Games up-close.

Eric Berbain, non-degree student in business administration, left Feb. 12 to visit Albertville, France, which is in the Department of Savoie — the region of his home.

"The Olympics are a unique sport celebration, and this year it takes place in my region." Berbain said.

"I come from Chambery, which is about 50 miles from Albertville. I guess this is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity, so I want to be there."

The Olympics is the biggest sports event in the world, Berbain said.

"A winner of the gold medal in the Olympic Games is more considered than a world champion, even if he is a double or triple world champion."

The Olympics are also a kind of a big party, Berbain said.

"All the different sports and people all over the world are together for two weeks. Yes, it's a nice event.

"My favorite sport is skiing, not only downhill skiing, but also slalom and jumping. But I am going to watch several events," he said.

"I want to see some ice hockey games, and I want to see the women's downhill in Meribel.

"Other events I want to go to, if I am able to get tickets for them, are cross-country skiing and the closing ceremony."

Berbain said he doesn't like the coverage of the Games on television and in newspapers.

"I don't like the commercials. One after the other, every event, again and again. That's the worst of all.

"Another thing I don't like is that almost nothing that is broadcasted on television is live.

"And when they do have a long report on something, they simply cut it in pieces. I can't understand that," he said.

"The network cares for the Games. But if you talk about the newspapers, the coverage is not that much."

He said he thought coverage of the Games was unimportant to Americans. The Americans seem to just care about football, baseball and basketball, he said.

"Even in magazines like Sports Illustrated, the coverage is really poor," he said.

Berbain also said he doesn't think the Americans are really concerned with the Winter Olympics.

"When I talk to other students here, I don't get the idea that they are really concerned about the Olympics," Berbain said.

"I think they are more concerned with the Summer Olympic Games."

He said he thought the reason for this was that America does better in the summer games.

The summer sports — like volleyball, basketball, boxing, and track and field — attract more people in America, he said.

Berbain said the people in Chambery were not really involved in the Olympics until about six months ago.

"Two or three years ago, we knew we had the Games, we knew the date, but that was it," Berbain said.

"It seemed to be a long way away. But the last months, the public got more and more concerned. And now people are really happy that the Olympic Games are in Savoie."

The Olympic Games won't harm Savoie, Berbain said.

"Economically, the Games already had some good effects," he said. "For Child Development Center reports pinworms

LAURA MCADAMS
Collegian

A case of pinworms has been reported at the KSU Child Development Center.

The first child who reportedly had the infection actually didn't, but the second case was pinworms, said Jana Adams, director of the center.

Pinworms are small parasitic roundworms.

Pinworms live in the human digestive tract, said Kathy Dickey, nursing supervisor at the Riley County Health Department.

The worms migrate through the digestive system and eventually lay eggs in the skin folds around the anus, Dickey said.

The eggs can then be spread to laundry, bathtubs or furniture. If the eggs are shaken into the air and swallowed, the infection could start again, she said.

"This can be highly contagious," Dickey said, "but with proper hand washing and proper cleaning of facilities, like toilet seats, it doesn't have to be."

The exact number of cases depends on whether you listen to the center director or the teachers, said Tammy Steinert, junior in elementary education and assistant teacher at the center.

"The teachers feel that there have been six cases, but not all of these have been diagnosed," Steinert said.

"Their parents haven't taken them to the doctor. So they haven't been officially reported as having it, per se."

Several precautions have been taken to ensure the worms don't spread to other children in the center.

Susan Larson, assistant director of the center, said a flier prepared by the Riley County Health Department was sent out to parents explaining how to watch for the signs of pinworms and the causes of them.

"The staff was told to check the children for symptoms and to make sure they wash their hands after every activity," said Stefanie Harris, senior in elementary education and assistant teacher at the center.

Children could be misdiagnosed as having pinworms because children with the symptoms are immediately given oral medication.

Proper diagnosis takes more than one test over a period of time, Dickey said.

New video dating service brings people together

KRISTEN TURNER
Collegian

Manhattan-area singles now have a new way to meet other singles.

The Friendship Exchange, a video dating service, opened last week in Manhattan.

The idea for a video dating service in Manhattan came from the number of calls and interest generated from Manhattan-area residents to the Topeka Friendship Exchange, said Gail Lortscher, Manhattan Friendship Exchange manager.

People interested in the service call and make an appointment to be interviewed, photographed and videotaped.

The prospective client also fills out a "fax and fun sheet," which tells a little about the person.

Fact sheets are then put with photographs into a library, and the videotapes made are kept on file.

At any time, a client can stop by and request to see a video or look through the library.

If customers see other people they are interested in, they fill out a card. The service then calls and tries to arrange a date.

"The date has to be a mutual thing. If someone is interested in a person who turns out to not be interested in them, that is it. There is no date," Lortscher said.

Clients must be at least 18 years old, and the ages of Friendship Exchange members range from 18 to 60.

"Our biggest concentration right now is in the 35-45 age category, but it really varies," Lortscher said.

Safety and privacy are both considered by Friendship Exchange.

Prospective clients must show positive identification, and only first names are used on the fact sheets, photos and videos that are available to other members.

Lortscher said full names and driver's license numbers are kept on file if a police check is ever necessary.

She said matches made by Friendship Exchange are not always romantic. Companionship and platonic relationships are the goal of some clients.

"Marriage is not our goal, just getting people together," Lortscher said.

People who do not understand what Friendship Exchange is may think it's a lonely hearts club, she said, but it is an actual service.

Senate

"The idea is only being explored, and the administration is keeping everything out in the open.

"The joint venture would allow for a more efficient use of money," he said. "The administration said we are not approaching KU begging them for use of its computer — it would be a joint venture.

"That even if we do end up saving money by going in with KU, we will actually end up spending more because we will end up using the money saved by going in with KU to help improve the programs."

Spencer and Glantz told Senate that KSUVM is 10-15 years behind the current technology.

The mainframe is scheduled to be used up to 1995 or 1996, and the current maintenance on the computer is $100,000 per year.

"The administration was approached by some outside consultants who said K-State needs to consider outsourcing, which is using another mainframe at another university or business," Spencer said.

"They said K-State is in need of more technology."

All the facts concerning the switch are not known at this moment, they said. This is only a consideration of the administration.

On another issue, Derek Nelson, junior in journalism and mass communications and member of the Intercollegiate Athletic Council, presented a proposal to reinstate the basketball ticket campout.

Nelson said the campout is necessary to create enthusiasm for the basketball season.

CATS BASKETBALL

Cats hope to continue Noble dominance of Oklahoma

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

Improvement across the board.

That's what Coach Dana Altman is after as his Wildcats open the second half of their Big Eight Conference season Sunday with a 12:30 p.m. contest against the Oklahoma Sooners in Norman, Okla.

The first half of the league year saw K-State go just 2-5, though the Wildcats didn't exactly limp to the halfway mark, Altman said.

After looking at the film of his team's loss at Missouri, Altman was encouraged, though he saw some things that bothered him as well.

"We hung in yesterday and had the opportunity to win," Altman said Thursday night. "Looking at the film, we handled the ball all right.

"We missed some opportunities in the second half to get Wylie Howard the ball when he was on a bit of a roll — we took a few contested shots on the perimeter — but I was fairly pleased."

Howard has been on a roll in the second half of the last two Big Eight contests: the loss at Mizzou and the home win over Nebraska.

Altman said his senior center's emergence is something that the coach has hoped for all season.

"It's something we've asked him to do all year," Altman said of Howard's on-court efforts to be a leader. "He's been consistent at times and inconsistent at others.

"But really, his last two games have been very solid."

Solid would likely be the last word Altman would use to describe the effort his team turned in against Oklahoma in the year's first meeting between the two schools on Jan. 18, a meeting that ended in a 41-point, 117-76 romp.

"We just didn't handle their press at all in the first game," Altman said.

Altman said that his team's move to a smaller lineup might be helpful against the swarming Sooners, but that some matchup problems might result as well.

"It might help us against the press, but we'll have some real problems matching up inside with (Jeff) Webster and (Bryan) Sallier," he said.

As a result of the matchup difficulties, and with Oklahoma's reputation as a solid home club, Altman said the Cat defensive plan will be varied.

"We'll switch back and forth," he said. "I don't think you can play man against them for 40 minutes, and with the way they shoot the ball on their home court, you can't go just zone, either."

And though OU has lost three Big Eight games on its own floor, Altman is wary of invading Lloyd Noble.

"You look at their three losses, though, and they've lost to Oklahoma State, Missouri and Kansas — three pretty good teams," he said. "We'll have our work cut out."

And that work, Altman said, begins offensively with ballhandling and ends with shooting.

"Our ballhandling has improved and enabled us to stay in games, and we need that to continue," he said. "And, at some point in time, we've just got to shoot the basketball better.

"We just want to improve game-by-game, and it begins there."

U.S. hockey romps on Finland; Weinbrecht hot dogs to gold

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ALBERTVILLE, France (AP) — A waltz by figure skater Paul Wylie, a golden oldie by the U.S. hockey team and a hot new tune on the slopes by Donna Weinbrecht brought the Americans out of a deep funk at the Winter Games.

Wylie leaped out of the shadow of teammates Christopher Bowman and Todd Eldredge to place third Thursday behind Ukrainian Viktor Petrenko and Czechoslovakian Petr Barna going into Saturday's final program.

"Ouch!" Bowman exclaimed, staring at his first set of scores for required elements.

"Whoops!" he said, shaking his head at the second row of numbers for presentation.

With those two words, the U.S. men's figure skating champion, who came here hoping to win a gold, summed up his disappointment at placing seventh after the short program. His only chance of winning an Olympic medal now appears to be in Lillehammer in 1994.

The undefeated U.S. hockey team is in much better position, reaching the medal round for the first time since the golden days of 1980 with a 4-1 romp over 1988 silver medalist Finland.

Up on the slopes, the acrobatic, whimsical and wild took over as Weinbrecht won the first Olympic gold medal in moguls freestyle, a sport once denigrated as "hot dog skiing."

Austria pulled ahead of Germany in the medals race, 12 to 10, with Petra Kronberger's gold and Anita Wachter's silver in women's combined skiing. Germany came up empty on a grand day for host France and 1994 Winter Games host Norway, which moved into a tie for fourth with six medals. The Russian-led Unified Team was third with nine.

Finland is fifth with four medals, followed by the United States and Italy with three each among the 60 awarded so far.

Wylie, 10th in 1988 and the self-described "old man" of the U.S. team at 27, leaped in the air when he finished his sparkling program featuring the most intricate step sequences of the night to the music of Ravel's "La Valse" — The Waltz.

He sprinted off the ice into the arms of coaches Mary and Evy Scotvold to await marks as high as 5.8.

"I'm psyched," Wylie said. "I felt I had to prove myself. Everyone has said from here is just the frosting on the cake. I decided I really like frosting."

Bowman said "I can't believe it" to coach John Nicks as he left the rink after touching his hand to the ice in the midst of his triple axel-double toe loop combination. His routine was slow and uninspiring, in contrast to the verve he showed in winning his second national title last month at Orlando, Fla.

Nothing fancy was needed at hockey, just basic rock 'n' roll defense.

Scott Young, who scored two goals, played on the seventh-place U.S. team in 1988 that got off to a 1-2 start and said this year "it's a completely different feeling" after winning the first three games.

"We had a good team in '88," he said. "We should have been so much better. It was a major disappointment. This is tremendous."

Goalie Ray LeBlanc made 29 saves in a nifty sequel to his 46-save shutout of Germany.

"Not taking anything away from Italy and Germany," Young said of the first two U.S. victims, "but we feel Finland is one of the better teams in the tournament. They've always been in the running. We've been reading the papers. We knew everybody was going to gauge us on this game."

Some people didn't know what to expect at moguls skiing. Invented in Europe in the 1920s and popularized in the United States in the late 1960s, the sport turned out to be a big hit with the crowd here as France's Edgar Grospiron and Olivier Allamand won the men's gold and silver, followed by American Nelson Carmichael with the bronze.

Play ball.

The two words synonymous with the start of yet another baseball season will be heard Saturday afternoon in Fayetteville, Ark., as the Wildcat baseball team opens its season against nationally-ranked Arkansas.

The three-game, weekend series will officially kick off Mike Clark's sixth season as the Cat head coach. Clark has had five straight seasons in which his Wildcat teams have finished above the .500 mark.

K-State enters the 1992 season with a mixture of veterans and promising young players, Clark said.

"This team can be good," Clark said. "How good, I don't know.

"I don't know what the top end is for these guys. But as long as they stay focused and fight, we'll be in good shape."

The questions confronting Clark at the outset of this season stem from an everyday lineup that contains only four players who saw extensive playing time a year ago.

But those four players — seniors Craig Wilson, Jeff Ryan and Blair Hanneman, and junior Brian Culp — are the reason for a great deal of Clark's optimism.

Wilson, an All-American candidate at shortstop, is the team's focal point.

He led Team USA with a .383 batting average last summer in play before and during the Pan Am Games.

Wilson turned down an offer from the San Francisco Giants to return to Manhattan to anchor the Wildcat infield and occupy the No. 3 spot in the batting order.

"Craig is a very consistent, not real flashy player who makes all the routine plays," Clark said. "He also makes the great plays, but he makes them so smoothly you don't notice it."

Another guy who often fades into the Wildcat woodwork, Clark admitted, is Ryan, the last in a long line of battling K-State catchers.

Ryan hit .339 and had 11 doubles while starting 52 games a year ago.

The outfield starters include Hanneman and Culp.

Hanneman will work in rightfield, but has also seen some time on the mound in what Clark has termed his most satisfying experiment of the late fall and early spring.

"He'd never thrown before, so he didn't have any faults going in," Clark said of Hanneman's work on the mound. "He's topped out at 87 or 88 on the gun, and that's the best we've got."

For now, however, Clark said Hanneman will concentrate on his outfield duties and will worry about continued mound development as the spring goes on.

For leftfielder Culp, the promise of a solid junior year is there, Clark said.

Culp hit .353 a year ago with 11 doubles, two triples and seven homers, and tore up the Alaskan league last summer.

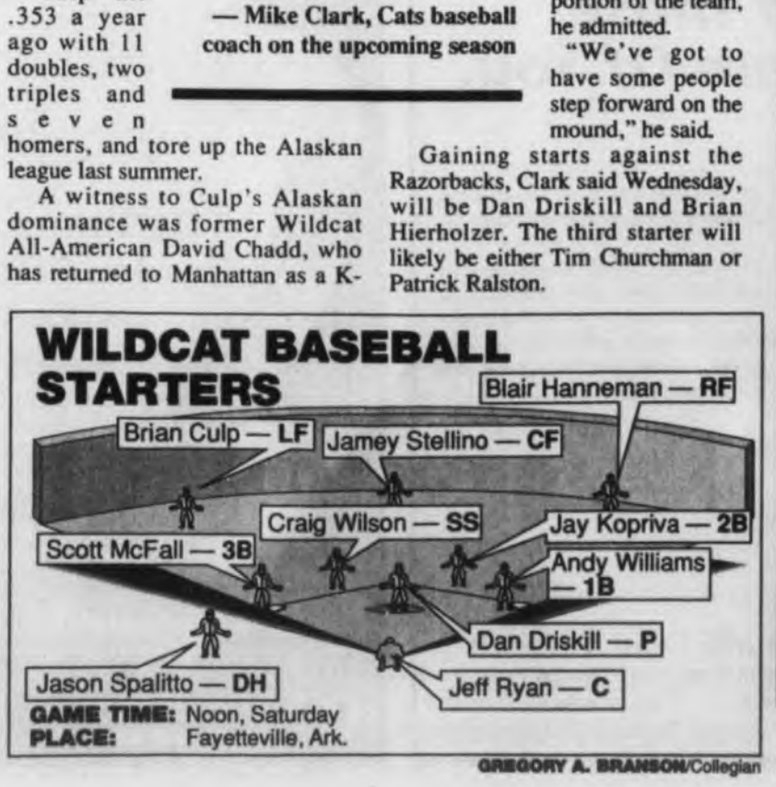
A witness to Culp's Alaskan dominance was former Wildcat All-American David Chadd, who has returned to Manhattan as a K-State assistant coach.

"He did nothing but showcase his talents to the best of his ability," Chadd said of Culp's efforts in Alaska. "Brian's name was buzzing all summer."

Newcomers to the everyday starting lineup include Andy Williams at first, Jay Kopriva at second, Scott McFall at third, Jamey Stellino in center and Jason Spalitto as the designated hitter.

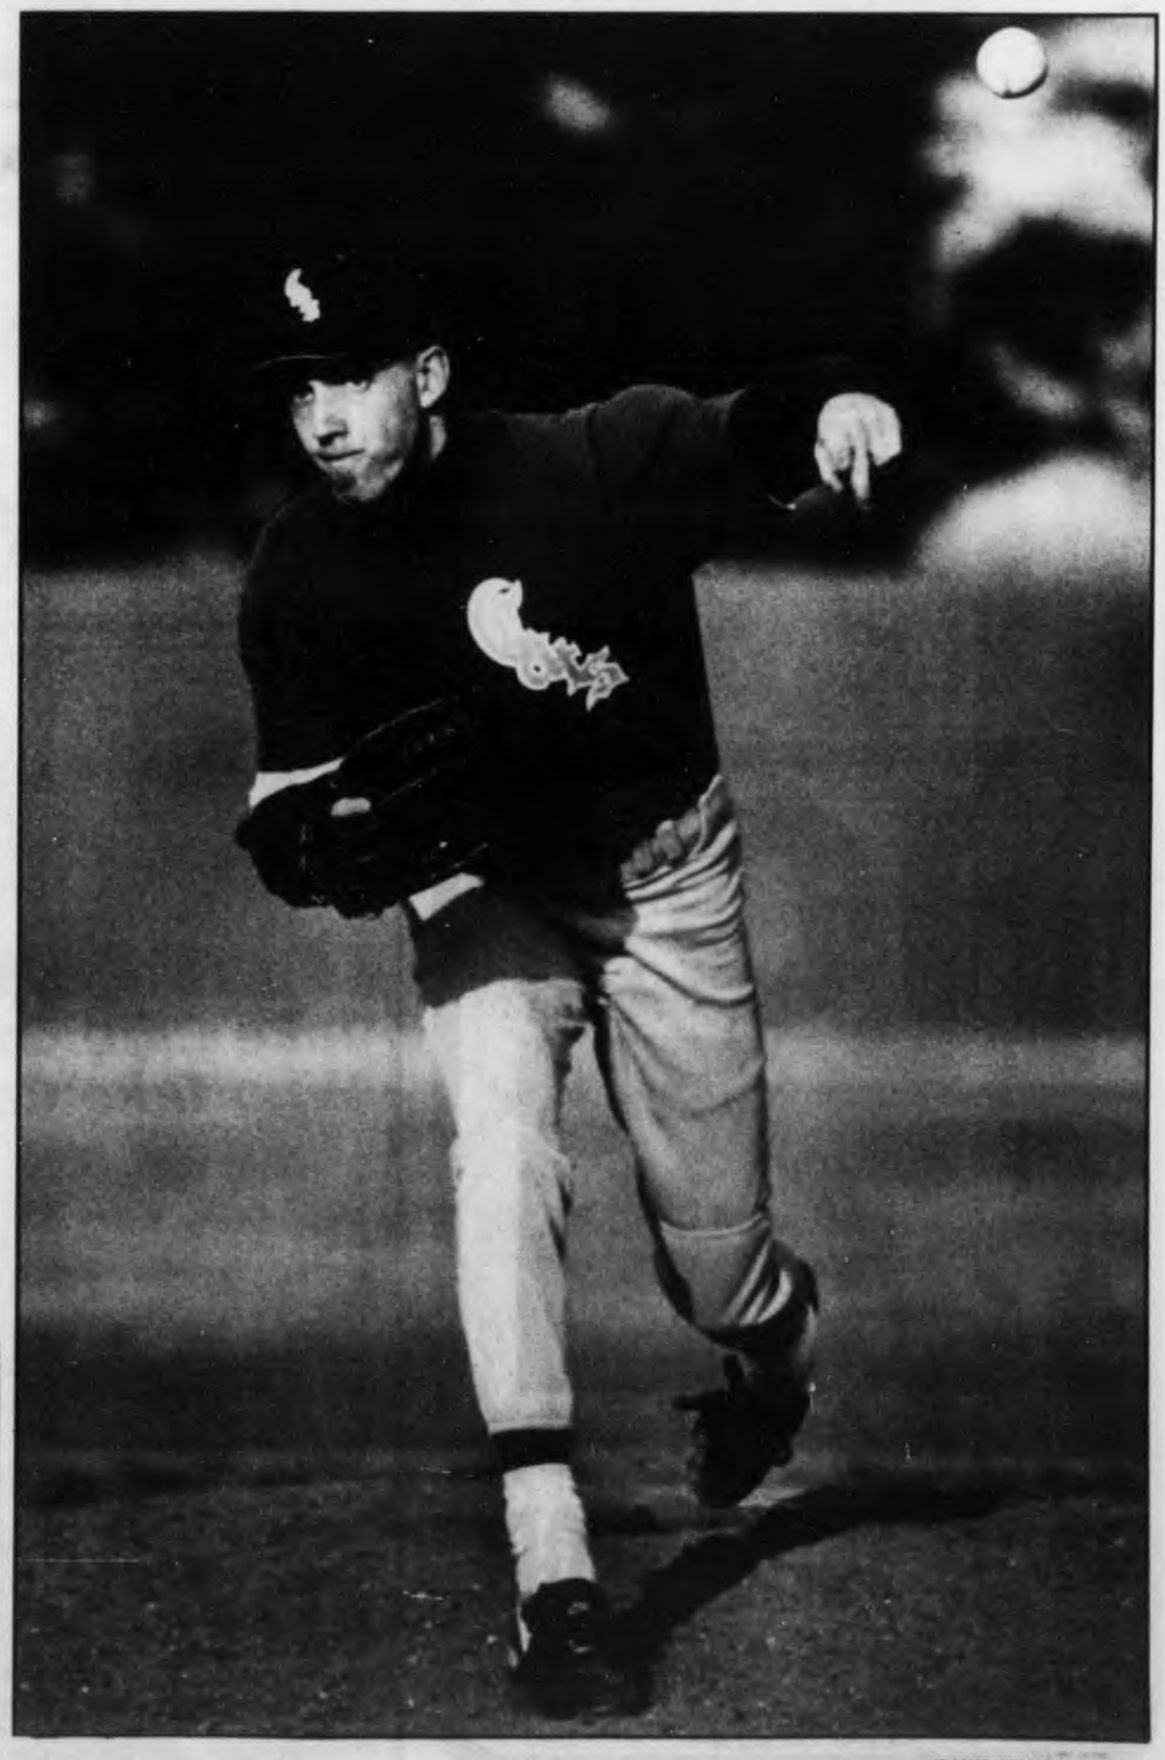
"This team can be good, how good, I don't know. I don't know what the top end is for these guys, but as long as they stay focused and fight, we'll be in good shape."

— Mike Clark, Cats baseball coach on the upcoming season



Clark groped most of the time prior to the opener trying to find someone to bat behind leadoff hitter Stellino, and thinks he's finally got the man he needs there in Kopriva.

"He hit and ran the other day in practice a couple of times, and he stung the ball twice," Clark said of his second baseman. "Those two give us a nice combination."



The combination Clark puts together to send to the mound may be the most suspect portion of the team, he admitted.

"We've got to have some people step forward on the mound," he said.

Gaining starts against the Razorbacks, Clark said Wednesday, will be Dan Driskill and Brian Hierholzer. The third starter will likely be either Tim Churchman or Patrick Ralston.

Lady Tigers could make history with win over K-State

A Missouri win will end historical Lady Cat Big-Eight prowess

BRIAN ANDERSON

History could be made this weekend at Bramlage Coliseum when the Lady Cats take on the Lady Tigers of Missouri. The Lady Cats have a winning series record against every team in the Big Eight, but a Lady Tiger win will tie that particular series at 20 wins each.

Worst of all, the Lady Cats are in the midst of a five-game losing streak and have lost six of their last seven games, including an 80-64 loss to Missouri in Columbia on Jan. 29.

Combine those numbers with the probable loss of forward Leah Honeycutt and the team could be down and out. To Coach Susan Yow, however, there is light at the end of the tunnel.

"Our team is more mentally prepared for this game than the last," Yow said. "We were a tad flat and not competitive at Missouri."

At the Hearnes Center in Columbia, the Lady Tigers won the battle on the boards led by Lynnette Linneman's 18 rebounds. Teammate Vantrece Williams scored a game-high 22 points.

"They had a great game," said Yow of the Missouri squad. "They are better now than the first time we met. But I feel we are much better than our record shows."

Despite losing 69-65 in overtime Nebraska Wednesday, the Lady Tigers have won four of their last five games and are 4-5 in the Big Eight. K-State stands at 2-7 in the Big Eight and 5-17 overall after the 88-73 home loss to Oklahoma Wednesday.

Guard Mary Jo Miller led the team at Missouri with 21 points, while forwards Lynn Holzman and Kelly Moylan each had 11 points. Miller had six assists, five steals, and five rebounds.

Honeycutt was injured at the 11:06 mark in the second half of the Oklahoma game. Coaches will know this morning the severity of her injury by tests, which will determine if she will play Saturday or if she will be out for the season, conducted on her knee. Yow said the test will show if there is any cartilage damage in her knee. Honeycutt was averaging 10.2 points and 8.3 rebounds a game this season.

Yow will not decide on who will replace Honeycutt in the lineup until after the diagnosis. Speculatively, Yow said she is looking for a strong rotation of players in Honeycutt's absence.

After Missouri, the Lady Cats will travel to Iowa State Tuesday.

Netters still hunting for first win of year

Learn from tough losses and utilize the experience to improve their games.

That is the motto the players of the K-State tennis team follow, going into yet another highly competitive match against Iowa at 11 a.m. Sunday on the Wood Valley courts in Topeka.

"I look at every match to see what we have to do to play well next time out," K-State coach Steve Bietau said. "Then, we try to work on that level with the players. I feel if we just go out and play to the best of our capability, we will do pretty well."

The intense concentration on his team, Bietau said, is also a result of the fact he is unsure about Iowa's ability.

"I don't know much about Iowa," he said. "It's the first time in three years that we've played them. I know that they had a good season in the Big Ten last year, but I couldn't name the players they have."

Although he can't predict Iowa's talent or what Iowa does specifically, Bietau looks forward to a close match.

"I expect them to have a solid team. Iowa has a well-funded program and a good coach," he said. "You know, going in to that match, I think they are playing at a comparable level of Drake or Miami of Ohio."

The Wildcats played Drake and Miami of Ohio last weekend at South Bend, Ind., falling short to both teams.

For Iowa, the duel with 0-4 K-State will be its third match. Iowa will play Kansas Saturday and had opened its season last weekend with a 9-0 sweep against Iowa State.

The team of Coach Micki Schillig is led by Finland's Minna Hatakka, who had a 10-5 record in her freshman year last year.

The question of what player will be in the No.1 position is still open.

"I don't know yet," he said. "I'm considering to let Michèle (Riniker)

The K-State track team will host the KSU Invitational Saturday at Ahearn Field House. Pittsburg State, Wayland Baptist, and Coffeyville are among the competing schools.

Despite a weekend track meet that promises to give the K-State track team stiff competition, the squad is looking at the meet as an opportunity to prepare for bigger and better things.

"We want some good competition," John Capriotti, head coach, said. "Right now, though, we're training for a peak at the Big Eight."

The Big Eight Indoor Championships will be held the weekend of Feb. 28, and the team hopes to keep its athletes healthy until then .

"It doesn't make any sense to take any chances," said Cliff Rovelto, jumpers coach. Rovelto opted to keep R.D. Cogswell out of this weekend's competition and Gwen Wentland, a national qualifier in the high jump, will perform in the long jump only.

"We're not putting any special emphasis on the meeting this weekend," Rovelto said. "We don't have a lot of depth. That's why we can't afford to get anybody hurt."

The jumping squad, however, is not getting the weekend off.

Both Dante McGrew and Dee Dee Tribue will be in the triple-jump competition, and Rovelto has high hopes the two will qualify for nationals with their Squirrel eyeing students from the side of Anderson Hall.

Road-kill squirrel on Mid-Campus Drive.

WE ARE UP TO OUR KNEES IN SQUIRRELS

The Sciurus niger can be seen darting around campus. It is afraid of no one. It darts in front of pedestrians, cars, and mountain bikes and rarely has a tire tread across its back to show for it.

It is the fox squirrel and is the only breed of squirrel in this area.

In the fall, squirrels frolic about in the leaves. In the winter, they chase each other through the snow and mud. And in the spring and summer, they scurry through the bushes and shrubs, occasionally munching on a berry or two.

"With all the hustle and bustle of the students, it's refreshing to see the squirrels add a little bit of life to the campus," said Sarah Forister, freshman in apparel design.

Gus van der Hoeven, extension specialist in landscape and environmental horticulture, said the squirrels are smart little critters, and the campus environment is ideal for their feeding habits.

Many campus employees put treats such as corn cobs outside their offices. This lets the squirrels eat cafeteria-style.

Their diet varies with each season, van der Hoeven said. In the fall, they often collect and store acorns from the many oak trees on campus. In the spring, they eat a variety of buds.

"They use the trees as a salad bar," he said.

Christopher Smith, a biology professor who has done research on the foraging activities of squirrels, said the squirrels on campus are mainly herbivores who feed on acorns, fungi and seeds.

Occasionally, though, their diets lack sodium and calcium. To compensate, they chew on animal bones, or even climb into the trees, kill nestling birds, and eat the hatchlings' nutrient-rich brains.

Although they may pose a threat to baby birds, humans are relatively safe from squirrel danger. Some people think they carry rabies, but most rabies cases in this area come from skunks, not squirrels.

Smith also said the reason squirrels seem so abundant on campus is because the animals are so used to people they don't bother to hide from them.

This part of Kansas is teeming with squirrels, he said, many of whom have been threatened by hunters. In most other areas, they are afraid of people and hide at first sight of them.

Squirrels usually breed once or twice a year — first in early spring, and again in late May or June. Pregnancy lasts one and a half to two months, and litters consist of two to five or even six young.

The fox squirrel's lifespan is six to nine years. But in the wild, Smith said, they usually don't last more than a year or two.

In this area, predators that threaten the squirrels most are hunters, coyotes, hawks and cats.

They do, however, face another real danger.

The automobile.

The Small Animal Clinic at the Veterinary Medicine Complex said large numbers of squirrels injured by automobiles have been brought in.

If the injuries are minor, the clinic treats and releases the squirrels. If the injuries are relatively severe, the squirrels are humanely put to sleep.

With so many squirrels highly visible on campus, van der Hoeven encourages people to take a moment, relax and watch the animals.

"Look, observe and laugh," he said.

K-State volunteers make a difference

Students get involved in community to gain understanding, hands-on experience

CHRISTA CONGROVE
Collegian

Volunteering in a community not only helps others, but it can help you as well.

Betty Moats, assistant director of the Career Planning and Placement Center, said volunteering shows employers something a possible employee has accomplished.

She also said employers don't necessarily take into consideration the area you volunteered in, but that you were actively involved.

"It shows a well-rounded person," Moats said.

Bryan Johnson, senior in marketing, said he first heard about the Big Brothers/Big Sisters organization in a speech given in class.

He said he thought about getting involved in the program for a long time. When he received a flier in the mail months later, he took it as a sign to join.

"I was thinking that we do so much as college students we forget about what's going on outside the realm of the University," Johnson said.

He said he felt that by including a little brother in college events, he could make a difference in someone's life.

There are many organizations in Manhattan that provide volunteer opportunities for students.

Ilene Adams, public relations supervisor at Big Lakes Developmental Center, said she thinks students have many special gifts to share with others.

"I think students are more open-minded, fresh and are looking for ways to help people," she said.

"They're not set in their ways. They possess some very special commodities; they want to change the world."

Big Lakes is an organization that serves the developmentally disabled.

Big Lakes volunteers have many options. They can volunteer in the wood shop, at the children's center or in residential services.

Volunteers build homes for the disabled and spend time with an adopted friend. That time can be spent doing simple things like watching television, going out for a soda or taking a walk.

Big Lakes has received help from University organizations in the last year. Groups have helped with the Festival of Trees, a Halloween party, and a few groups have adopted families or individuals.

Wharton Manor Inc., an intermediate care facility, now has three student volunteers.

Virginia Roberts, activity director, said these volunteers help in several areas.

One helps with crafts and planting flowers, another dances with residents, and the other helps residents in the recreational area.

She said residents like having students volunteer because of their youth.

"They like to see them walk with a little spring," she said.

She said students volunteer for many reasons.

"One volunteer I have said she wanted to pay society back. Others do it for class credit."

Roberts said she looks for volunteers that are open and have friendly dispositions.

Janell McElroy, sophomore in education, volunteered to help take presents and food to adopted families for the Christmas Bureau.

The Christmas Bureau matches needy families with businesses or individuals that want to adopt a family for Christmas. Adoptive businesses or families provide Christmas dinner and a small gift for each child.

"I thought it was important to give to other people, especially around Christmastime," McElroy said.

"Most of us are blessed with so much that we shouldn't forget those who aren't so fortunate.

NASA

Ousted space agency chief predicts tough times

Truly addresses 22,000 employees via closed-circuit television about problems

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Ousted NASA Administrator Richard Truly warned employees of rough seas and turbulent times ahead in the leaderless agency Thursday as the White House began its search for his successor.

Speculation focused on some well-known non-NASA names in the space community.

These names included Norman Augustine, chairman and chief executive officer of the Martin Marietta Corp.; Edward (Pete) Aldridge Jr., president of McDonnell Douglas Electronic Systems Company; Joseph Allen, president of Space Industries Inc. and two former congressmen.

"We are actively searching for a successor," said White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater.

"We hope to have a candidate very soon."

An administrative source who asked not to be named said the nominee is not likely to come from within the NASA hierarchy, which has been at odds with the National Space Council headed by Vice President Dan Quayle.

Disputes about policy direction and NASA's management are thought to be behind Truly's forced resignation, which was announced Wednesday.

Specifically, the source said, it is unlikely the nominee will be the highly respected J.R. Thompson, who returned to Huntsville, Ala., last fall after resigning as the agency's No. 2 man for personal reasons.

Truly, whose resignation is effective April 1, addressed NASA's 22,000 workers over closed-circuit television.

"What happens on April 2?" he said.

"Well, the truthful answer is, I'm not sure ... Any time leadership changes in an organization, it can be a time of rough seas and turbulent times.

"In the Navy, when you're entering very tough situations and rough seas, there's a saying called 'steady as she goes.' That's what I'd like to impart to you today."

The admonition was not likely to quell the turmoil in NASA, just settling down after a rough few years in which the Hubble Space Telescope was revealed to have flawed sight, the space station was downsized and nearly killed in Congress, and shuttle schedules were disrupted by leaky connections.

Truly's resignation comes just as the agency is gearing up for another of the epic battles it's had in Congress, including an almost certain renewal of the effort to squash the $30-billion station once and for all.

In his daily briefing, Fitzwater would not concede that Truly, a friend of the president, was asked to resign.

"Whether there are policy differences or not, from our point of view, he deserves our gratitude and our support and we want only to herald the outstanding job he's done there," the president's spokesman said.

Augustine is a former undersecretary of the Army who was heavily involved in research and development.

He was chairman of a highly regarded White House-commissioned study about the U.S. future in space that has served as a blueprint for the agency.

Aldridge was Secretary of the Air Force in the Reagan administration and argued forcefully, before the Challenger accident, that the United States should not rely on the shuttle for its total launch capacity.

Allen was an astronaut who flew on the first shuttle flight to deploy cargo in space and on the first mission to salvage equipment in orbit.

The two former congressmen figuring in speculation are Edward Boland, whose chairmanship of an appropriations subcommittee gave him oversight of NASA spending, and Don Fuqua, president of the Aerospace Industries Association and former chairman of the House Science and Technology Committee.

One former NASA official mentioned in the speculation is James Abrahamson, a retired lieutenant general.

Reporter won't reveal sources

Senate counsel subpoenas Phelps, questions news leak

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — A Newsday reporter declined to reveal his sources Thursday to a special Senate counsel questioning him about his articles on Anita Hill's sexual harassment allegations against Clarence Thomas.

Reporter Timothy Phelps, subpoenaed by special counsel Peter Fleming Jr., said he was asked to explain his stories almost word for word.

Phelps, who was questioned in closed session, told reporters during a break, "We are not responding, except to say we wrote what was written."

A lawyer for Phelps, Robert Warren, said the reporter objected to revealing sources on constitutional grounds — the First Amendment guarantees of press freedom.

In a legal memorandum, Newsday also argued that both houses of Congress have refrained, for more than a century, from seeking to force journalists to identify confidential sources.

Phelps, after nearly five hours of questioning, described such interrogation as intimidating to reporters trying to gather the news.

"I do not feel reporters should be asked to appear before governmental investigators," Phelps said.

Fleming, a New York attorney, was hired after the Senate voted to investigate leaks to the news media in two areas: the Hill-Thomas controversy and the Senate ethics investigation of five senators who assisted former thrift owner Charles Keating Jr.

Hill, a law professor, accused Thomas of sexually harassing her.

The allegations surfaced publicly in a Phelps-written story Oct. 6, and caused the Senate Judiciary Committee to reopen hearings on Thomas's Supreme Court nomination.

Thomas was confirmed after the televised hearings, during which Hill described the alleged harassment in graphic sexual terms, and Thomas vehemently denied the allegations.

Meat cuts, baked goods raise dough

Enterprising students produce, market top-quality food products

JENNIFER BEALS
Collegian

The meat lab in Weber Hall has been a tradition at K-State since the 1920s.

Lyell Nelson, manager of the meat lab, said although the original meat lab was in Waters, the modern facility provides its customers with quality and less expensive meat.

One reason for the sales is to help the students learn more about the industry, since it's one of the state's biggest commodities, Nelson said.

It also helps bring money back into the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry for teaching and research purposes, he said.

Not only do students participate through sales, but they also help process the meat.

Brent Emmerson, junior in animal sciences and industry, said many students learn to butcher most meat on the job, but some have experience.

He also said it takes students about a year to really get in touch with their surroundings.

The livestock used is raised, housed and processed by K-State.

Nelson said most of the cuts are taken for teaching and research, while the rest of the meat is sold through the meat lab sales.

Nelson and John Wolf, meat lab assistant, agreed students should check out the lab since it provides top-quality, USDA-inspected beef at competitive prices.

Selections available during the sale include beef steaks, ribs and roasts, lamb chops, shanks and roasts, bacon, hams and processed meats, including bologna, beef jerky and sausage.

The sale is from 2 p.m. to 6 p.m. each Friday in Weber 103.

The dairy sales counter in Call Hall, has sold dairy products since 1904.

"At that time, the dairy hall was located in the present-day Art Building until 1923, when it moved to Call Hall," said Petros Levis, dairy sales supervisor.

Linda Kleiner, sales counter supervisor, said the counter features a wide selection of ice cream, including 28-30 different flavors of sundaes, malts, "Cool Cats," floats, milk, butter and cheese.

She said all the products are produced by students.

"The counter also carries meat products, including pepperoni sticks and sausages from Weber and eggs from the poultry farm," Kleiner said.

The dairy sales counter changes its selections according to the season.

"During the fall and winter months, soups and sandwiches are also available for students who need a quick pick-up between classes," Kleiner said.

"In the spring, the dairy counter also features special ice cream flavors, including bubble gum."

The money received from the counter goes directly into the animal sciences and industry department, Levis said.

She said the money is used for teaching and research.

The butter isn't the only thing churning at Call — so is the business.

"Business is really good, especially in the spring," Kleiner said.

"Our business ranges from regulars to new people who find out about us and stop by."

The dairy sales counter is open from 8:30 a.m. to 5:15 p.m., Monday through Friday in Call 144.

The Grain Science Club and the Bakery Science and Management Club in Shellenberger Hall have been selling their products for about 10 years.

The bakery science club takes extra time to produce a wide range of bakery items for sales.

Joseph Ponte Jr., professor of grain science and industry, said the club members use the lab on Tuesday evenings and Wednesday mornings to produce such items as French, wheat and grain mix breads, cookies, muffins, croissants and Danish pastries.

He also said most of the ingredients used are donated by manufacturers.

Grain Science Club members have flour sales to provide specialty items.

"The members sell such items as wheat germ, whole ground rye flour, pancake mix and bran," said Dale Eustace, professor of grain science and industry.

The sales not only provide money for the bakery club, but also offer much more.

"The sales are a good idea, because it gives the students the experience to produce, merchandise and sell their products," Ponte said.

"It also provides great public relations for the department, generates earnings for trips and provides for the purchase of small pieces of equipment used in baking labs."

Eustace agreed that the sales offer a chance to produce needed funds, but he said they also offer opportunities for meeting other people.

"The club receives money for field trips, picnics, and grain science hats and shirts," Eustace said.

"But it also gives the students the opportunity to meet others in the class, especially since this is the only place in the world that teaches milling science on a four-year curriculum."

Eustace and Ponte said prices are competitive, but both clubs offer different ways to get rid of what isn't sold.

"The leftover flour that isn't sold is purchased by the local school systems or the public, while some by-products go to the feedmill," Eustace said.

Ponte said the bakery science club's leftovers go to the Manhattan Breadbasket.

The bakery science club sells bakery items from 3 to 5 p.m. Wednesday, or until the products are gone. The sales are on the first floor of Shellenberger Hall.

The grain science sale is from noon to 4 p.m. Wednesday. The sale is near the back loading dock of Shellenberger.

21 Valentine's Day Personals

AD STAFF: You are so fine, won't you be my Valentine? gbf.

AGR'S- GOOD luck this weekend in Hoopfest '92. You'll be great! Love your axo coaches, Jelena, Kindra, Amie.

AMY JO, Can't wait to be your hubby! M&M eyes.

ANGIE, JENNIFER, Joni, Adonis, & Chaj, Drinking, smoking, bitching, & farting. Cheers! We know you don't have Valentines, so Happy V-Day. Love BS.

APRIL, KIM, Mary, Laverio, Tralaine & William. We really appreciate your extra hard work this week. You are a special staff and a pleasure to work with. Happy Valentine's Day. Pat & Jackie.

ARE JULIE, Here's to country dances and late night romances! Happy Valentine's Day! Love, Jacob.

ARIEL- TWO years and four days down. The rest of our lives to go. Have a great Valentines Day and remember that I love you. - You know who.

AZD ANGIE- You're the best friend anyone could ask for! I hope you have a great Valentine's Day! Love, Tisha.

BEANS- SURPRISE! I finally sent you a personal- on V-day, even! Have a great day! And remember- you mean the world to me! I love you! Eitsirhc.

BIG DOG- Here's the personal you've always desired, it comes from the heart of your greatest admirer. I'm sorry this Valentine's weekend won't work out, please don't be mad at me and please don't pout. I hope we can celebrate the holiday next weekend, just like we did at the Fairfield and Harvest Inn. Sorry again- I'll make it up in the end. I love you, MRK.

BIRD & Thumper- So you say it's your birthday, well happy birthday to ya! If you make it through Saturday you'll be boomin' for sure. Bring your gear because your trip is near. Some folks say it's size that you lack but we all know of the soup you can pack. So watch out ladies because when push comes to shove, it may well be your time to find a spot on their headboard of love. The Guys.

BJM, HAPPY Valentine's Day Sweatheart! I am the luckiest person ever, because you are wonderful! I'll love you always, KDM.

BLH- HAPPY Valentine's Day sweetness. You do and will always have a special place in my heart. Love you always! TLV.

BOB- LOOKIN pu nub? You found it, Pookie! Happy Valentine's Day from your very own fluff!- Amy.

BOBO: I love you so... only six months to go... then you're mine 'til the end of time! Love Meller!

BON- YOU'RE the best sister anyone could ever have. I love you- Beck.

BOO BOO– Being with you is a year round Valentine. Have a great European Vacation. I'll miss you. Lot of love, Pooh– Key

BRIAN S.- Happy V-Day! What's small, black with pink bows, and comes off quick? You'll find out 2-nite. Love Petrina.

BRY- THE 4th of July and New Year's Eve- I wonder what today will bring? I can't wait! I love you sweetie! xoxo! Cootie.

BUNNY FACE: We're no good without each other. Take the best and make it better. I love you. Sweetie.

CAK: SOME difficult times lately, we have been through. Thankfully, understanding is a quality of you. Relationships require patience, care and freedom, an appreciation of one another is also needed. Only time will tell which path we shall pursue, until then sweetie, Happy Valentine's Day to you. Isn't that new Bob Seger? Your Chanel Girl.

CAPTAIN- IT is the sun I see. Aye, to see the moon wouldst take a better man than thee. Always, Second.

CHERI: WHEN I'm near you I get nervous, my words stammer. When I'm near you , my pulse races, my heart beats hammer. When I'm near you, I love it. Craig.

CHRISSY, YOU finally got your personal. I love you. Happy Valentine's Day. Love, Mike.

CHUCK- THE past three years and ten months have meant more to me than you could ever imagine. Thanks for all of the wonderful memories, may there be many, many more. I love loving you. Happy Valentine's Day. Forever- Sweets.

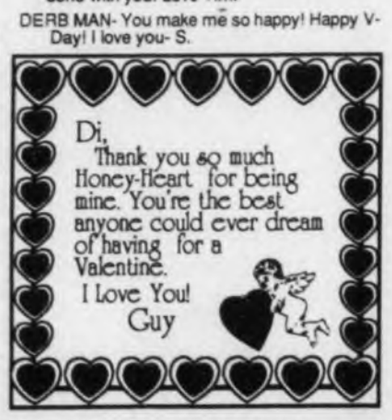
CLARK, MY night in shining armor, you shelter me from the storms and surround me with love. Forever is as far as I will go. Fancy Face.

COREY S.: There's not much to say because you know it all already- I love you so much- and I'll prove it to you! Mary.

CUDDLEPIE, LOVE you more than ever, can't wait to start our life together. So honored that you asked, these last 4 years have been a blast. Three months, one week, and counting down, til we say "I do" and get out of town. Happy Valentine's Day! I love you! Snugglepot.

CUTE-E, HAPPY Valentine's Day/Birthday! Thanks for all the great times so far, hope there are lots more to come. I love you! Sweet-E.

CUTEST EYE Rubber, Keep that pretty smile! You flash it with great style. We'll take a flight tonight! Happy V-day. Mr. Obesity.



DAVY, MY love for you is so true, that is why I placed a ring on you. Just a token of my love, as pure and sweet as a dove. Valentine be mine, because the divine love of mine will always be an important sign. Because together we chime. Love, Kitten.

DEAREST LORI: Our time together has been precious, like the diamond I gave you. Here's to the rest of our life together. Love, Andy.

DEB- EVERYDAY is Valentine's day with you! With love- Rusty.

DEBBIE- FROM snow sledding to bathtub crayolas. From the superbowl to all night talks. From "Just stand on our backs." to "I do." They don't mean a thing unless done with you. Love Tim.

DERB MAN- You make me so happy! Happy V-Day! I love you- S.

DO- WHEN I first met you I thought you were hot, but you had a boyfriend so I thought I better not. Over time we became very good friends, but this was just a mean to my ends. We took a trip and you were sore, next time you won't need an oar. I don't know how you feel most of the time, but I'll always want you to be my valentine. The Doctor.

DR. ZEPP... Happy birthday and congrats on med school! Remember.. even though you'll be a jayhawk, don't forget that you started as a wildcat! The "socz."

DVM DAUGHTER- two weeks ago today we met, lets make tonight a celebration we won't forget! DVM Son.

ENRIQUE. POR ser tan: loco, guaso, cafresito, jacu u sobre todo por ser el mejor novio del mundo te ano cada dia mas. Estoy segura este dia va a ser bleeen especical. Te Ama Sandraly.

GDI- KATHY C. and Kristi H. Thank you for all your understanding and patience. I love you. Hershey.

HAPPY BIRTHDAY Darla. Enjoy yourself, you deserve it. Collegian Staff.

HAR- (WITH a "z")- Devel Cats, Band J's, grossly descriptive stories, and erogeneous zones, Your all around cow.

HEATHER: I love you! Will you be my filly? Your Teddy Bear. Love and Kisses. xxx ooo xxx ooo xxx.

HEY KITTYCAT- three years ago you got my heart, and in a year, you'll get my ring. Happy Valentine's Day! Love always, Tinky. (p.s.- look in red's glovebox after work).

I NEVER knew the "Leap of Faith" we took eight months and fourteen days ago would let us "...Build a Bridge" of true love and friendship which we have today. "From a Distance" I feel God is watching us and is "Asking Us to Dance" a very special dance in life- "The Dance of Everlasting Love". Happy Valentine's Day! I Love You!

I SEE within my true love's eyes, the wide blue spaces of the skies; I see within my true love's face, the rose and lily vie in grace; I hear within my true love's voice, the songsters of the spring rejoice. Oh, why need I seek nature's charms? I hold my true love in my arms. I Love You, Susan.

ITCHY, YES you hypochondriac. I just wanted to say I love you and Boo-Boo. Remind me and I'll wake you up this time. Happy Valentine's Day. Love Pookie.

TO HELENKA S. The memories of the last year and a half of my life are irreplaceable, but my fondest memories are of times we have not yet shared. Be mine now and forever. Love Keith.

TO MIMI D. You should be arrested for thievery, for you have stolen my heart, now let me steal yours, be my Valentine. Ray.

TO MY little brown eyed girl, I love you but you're a weird catch. Love, Bud.

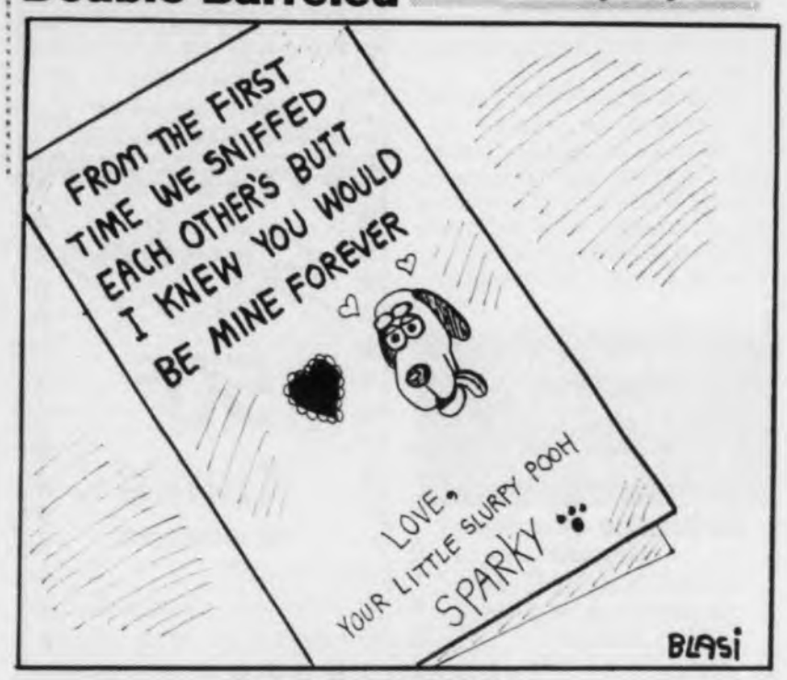
TO THE guys of Beta Sigma Psi- good luck this weekend at Hoopfest and Happy Valentine's Day. Love, your AX coaches, Sara & Nicole.

TO THE J in JAKE (a.k.a. Bubbles)- After five weeks of something not easily explained in a word, unless you use: Jocundly, Rousing, Neoteric, Cloyed, Sapid, Fruitful or just plain fun, here's to the future, especially in Advertising. Complicatedly, WHIZZO.

TONY- AKA Rosebud. Forget about bad times, we've had so many good. The elevator, pinch fights, long talks, and 8 times! You've been so patient. The "L" word is a big thing to say but I mean it... I love you! Stacey.

TOUCHDOWN- WHAT a great year! Gotta love those candles, but we need more chocolate! Happy Valentine's Day- Cookie Baby.

TRAVIS: I never thought I'd meet such a unique person on the interstate. Thanks for all the "bonding" moments. Happy Valentine's Day! Mario.



TRISSA, 4 years and 8 months seems like a long time, but believe me, sweetheart, it's nothing like a lifetime. Glad you're part of mine! Love always, Matt.

W.L. YOU'RE the only good in the long nights, the only warmth in the cold time. Jack.

WENDY- I can't wait 'till August! You'll always make my heart smile! Twitterpate! Love, Rich.

Vietnam still rends political fabric

War service divides Democrats Kerrey, Clinton

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Like post-traumatic stress, Vietnam won't go away.

The conflicts that tore at the nation 25 years ago are being played out in the presidential campaign among the first generation of candidates young enough to have been caught in the net of a war we'd rather forget.

Vietnam was a no-win proposition two decades ago when these fortysomething politicians first faced it as draft-age youths.

It's shaping up the same way this year as the Democrats pursue their presidential dreams.

Nebraska Sen. Bob Kerrey went to Vietnam, lost part of his leg in a grenade explosion and won the Medal of Honor.

But Kerrey's wartime heroism, a central part of his campaign, isn't translating into political support.

Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton didn't serve. But he's paying a high price now for the tortured twists and turns he took before drawing a never-called lottery number.

Clinton's front-runner status in New Hampshire's leadoff primary is gone, and his White House ambitions are on the line.

"If you offer a plate filled with Vietnam memories, people are going to push that plate away and look for something else," said Mark Mellman, a Democratic strategist.

"It's the last thing they want to think about."

And yet they may be forced to, as baby-boom politicians ascend to the national stage and confront their past.

"Probably the next two or three presidential campaigns are going to be haunted. It started with the Quayle flurry. That was a prefiguration," said Berkeley sociologist Todd Gitlin.

Dan Quayle was the first Vietnam-aged candidate on a national ticket.

He paid with harsh questions about his National Guard service — did he pull strings to get in? Was it hypocritical to serve that way if he supported the war?

There were few definitive answers, and there probably never will be.

"A whole generation of middle-class guys faced a moral anguish and resolved it in a variety of ways," said Gitlin, author of a book about the 1960s.

"I'm not sure there were any clean outcomes — not with this sort of morality play."

Clinton, who attended Georgetown, Oxford and Yale during the Vietnam era, was typical of his generation, especially of young men at elite universities.

"Every student I had tried to get out of going to Vietnam. That was universal behavior," says Erwin Hargrove, a Vanderbilt professor who was teaching at Brown during the 1960s.

"They were desperately trying to stay out of Vietnam, and everybody knows that."

Clinton on Wednesday released a letter he wrote 23 years ago to the head of an Arkansas ROTC program he had agreed to join. He discusses his decision to bypass ROTC and the four-year deferment it would have offered, despite his opposition to the war.

"I began to wonder whether the compromise I had made with myself was not more objectionable than the draft would have been," Clinton wrote, "because I had no interest in the ROTC program in itself, and all I seemed to have done was to protect myself from physical harm."

He said he put himself back in the draft pool for one reason: to maintain his political viability, despite his belief that no government "should have the power to make its citizens fight and kill and die in a war they may oppose."

Two Democratic presidential candidates besides Clinton did not serve in the military — former California Gov. Jerry Brown and former Massachusetts Sen. Paul Tsongas.

Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin was in a college ROTC program and was a Navy pilot during the Vietnam War.

Kerrey graduated from the University of Nebraska and was about to be drafted into the Army; he decided to join the Navy instead.

He was chosen for the elite SEAL unit and went to Vietnam gung-ho about his mission. But he returned bitter and disabled, and eventually became an anti-war protester.

Thousands of others did, too, and some returned suffering from post-traumatic stress syndrome, severe lingering psychological effects of combat.

Kerrey's own journey reflects the ambivalence and confusion Americans feel about Vietnam to this day, and perhaps explains why his war-hero status has not boosted his campaign.

"People don't know what to make of it all," said pollster Stan Greenberg, a Clinton adviser.

"It's very volatile. Kerrey has found it difficult to turn it into a political advantage, to make it relevant."

Presidents since George Washington have ridden their war records to the White House, suggesting that Kerrey theoretically is on the right track when he emphasizes his.

But Vietnam was a different kind of war, and some strategists think times could be changing.

"This whole aura of military service as a prerequisite for political leadership is largely gone. It's been erased," Mellman said.

efforts this weekend.

Both of them are ready to qualify," he said. "They both are dealing well with nagging-type of injuries."

And nagging injuries are something that the coaches want to avoid.

"It's more of an 'I want to see where our kids are going' meet," Capriotti said.

Nonetheless, Capriotti hopes to see his squad perform competitively.

But don't plan to see the men's 3,200-meter relay team at Ahearn. Nor long distance runner Todd Trask.

Both the relay team and Trask will be going to Ames, Iowa for a weekend meet. The relay team, as well as Trask, qualified provisionally for the NCAA nationals last weekend.

Capriotti, though, wants more.

"Although some of the provisional qualifiers will go to nationals," Capriotti said, "you never know."

For that reason, Capriotti is sending the quartet of Randy Helling, Jason Goertzen, Anthony Williams, and Jared Storm, along with Todd Trask, to Iowa with the ultimate goal of grabbing an automatic qualification.

"This bill is a train on a fast track, and its destination is the pocket of the Kansas taxpayer," Oleen said in explaining her vote against the bill to reduce the primary's cost.

She wanted the measure sent to a House-Senate conference committee to give the Legislature more time to consider whether to scuttle the primary.

Her motion to reject the House bill and put it in conference failed, 17-18, on a standing vote.

Sen. Don Sallee, R-Troy, chairman of the Senate Elections Committee, then moved to accept the House bill, and his motion passed, 25-15, on recorded vote.

"I feel the House sent a message in this bill," Sallee said.

"That message is we will have a primary."

Oleen got support from several senators during the brief debate over the cost-cutting bill.

play on No. 1, but I haven't decided yet."

Riniker has had the best results among the netters' top three players. She has a spring record of 4-0, including two wins as No.2 against Laura Schwab of Notre Dame and Tica Vail of Drake.

Karin Lusnic and Mareke Plocher are the two other players who could fill the No.1 spot.

Neili Wilcox and Suzanne Sim will play at the next positions, and Martine Shrubsole, who is recovering from a back injury, is seeded No.6.

The team's emphasis during the last week's practices were more on the doubles, Bietau said.

Overall, Bietau is looking for an improved team.

example, we build new roads to improve the accessibility to the mountains. Before, it sometimes was a real mess."

Berbain said the Games are always very exciting and sometimes fearful to watch.

"There are all kind of dangers," Berbain said. "The weather can be bad. Or, worse, there can be no snow.

"About one month ago, there was too much snow in Savoie. Around Christmas, we had avalanches everywhere. That was crazy.

"Now it's OK. We have good weather and good snow. I think we are kind of lucky," he said.

The Winter Olympics in Albertville differ in some ways from the other Olympics, Berbain said.

"First of all, these are the first Olympic Games after the Cold War. That means that there is one Germany instead of two.

"And second, this is the first time that we have so many teams.

"There are 64 countries competing, including such countries as Croatia, Slovania, the Baltic States and the countries from the former Soviet Union. I guess at the next games there will be even more countries."

AMERICAN HISTORY

WWII display replicates era

Society presents house that features life on homefront

DENNIS OKEEFE
Collegian

The Riley County Historical Society is presenting the second open house in a series to commemorate the World War II era.

The Wolf-Butterfield House at 630 Fremont has been furnished to replicate a typical home during the World War II period. It is owned by the historical society, which normally shows it as a late 19th century Victorian home.

Each room in the house has been furnished to represent life on the homefront during World War II. There are also displays that highlight the type of lifestyle led by people of that era.

Cards and letters to soldiers, government regulations, ration books, military uniforms, and men's and women's clothing are all on display. Costumed guides discuss rationing, war bonds, Red Cross work, victory mail and other mementos and memories.

Edna Williams, curator of the Wolf-Butterfield House, said the exhibit is the only one of its kind in Kansas.

"There are other museums that display World War II memorabilia, but we offer the only furnished home that can be toured," she said.

"We felt that a home displaying the era would bring back more memories and give visitors a better historical perspective."

The historical society has been researching the era for the past two years.

"We used a lot of catalogs like Sears and Ladies Home Journal, which have documented the World War II era to construct the exhibit," said Jeanne Mithen, Riley County Museum librarian.

Marcia Goff and her son Brandon drove in from their home in Keats to tour the home.

"We just find this type of exhibit very realistic and interesting," Goff said. "It has a lot of historical educational value."

The exhibit began at Christmas and will run for one year. There will be other programs and exhibits that explore different aspects of the World War II years presented at the house throughout 1992.

In June, the historical society will present a war bride exhibit at the house featuring wedding gowns and bridal memorabilia from the 1940s.

During the summer, an exhibit on food rationing will include canning and war food preparation demonstrations.

The exhibit is open every weekend. However, arrangements can be made to view the house at an alternate time.

HOUSING

New system forces residents without roommates to move

Students given three options according to policy

MEGAN MULLIKIN
Collegian

The Department of Housing and Dining Services has implemented a new system forcing some residents to move to another room to consolidate residence halls.

Bob Burgess, assistant director of the housing department, said the recommendation was made by the Housing Council and went into effect this academic year.

Students who occupy a double room and have no roommate, and are not paying for the double room as a single are given three options, said Erin Murphy, assistant director for Goodnow Hall.

The resident's options are to pay the extra amount and stay in their room, which adds up to about one extra monthly payment, Murphy said. Or they can either move in with someone on the list or have that person move in with them.

A letter was sent to the residents explaining the new policy, and listed other residents who are in the same situation and could be possibilities for new roommates.

Shannon Dean, freshman in pre-journalism and mass communications, said she received her letter at the end of last semester and then moved at the beginning of this semester.

"It was a real pain to look for a new roommate, pack up my whole room and move all my stuff to someone else's room," Dean said.

This process of consolidation affects most people right after the semester break because many students leave or graduate between semesters.

Consolidation is in effect all year long, Burgess said. At the end of the year, however, students are allowed to remain in their rooms if their roommate leaves, because there is no point in moving someone when there is only a short time left in the school year.

"We won't press the issue when we know that students are pressured with the end of the semester school work. We'll make a point in time when we stop consolidation," Burgess said.

A letter was sent to Julia Eussen, junior in English, on Feb. 5. The letter was sent by Diana Robertson, area coordinator for Strong Complex. It said Eussen had one week to find a roommate and move, or have them move in with her.

"There were a lot of rooms that opened up, but most of those people chose to pay the extra, and I can't afford to," Eussen said. "I called the people on the list. I did my end of the bargain, and I think it is her job to find me a roommate.

"I never requested a double as a single, so if someone moves in with me, fine. I requested this room and this hall, and I assumed I got it for the whole year," she said. "I may end up having to move to another hall, but I don't think I should have to pay extra."

The letter also stated one of the reasons for consolidation is "the costs to the housing department will be reduced if there are completely empty rooms."

Burgess said the empty rooms provide hall directors with more flexibility.

"If there are discipline problems or roommate conflicts, the empty rooms give us more flexibility to make the changes," he said.

Murphy said she thought there was controversy this year because there are less people living in the halls, and the residents are aware of the empty rooms.

"I just don't understand why they forced us to move, and now there are a lot of empty rooms around. That just doesn't make sense," Dean said.

The consolidation policy was written into the contract residents signed this year. It states the residents will be given two weeks to find a roommate to live with or pay the extra money.

If after the two weeks the resident has not found a roommate, one will be assigned by the hall director.

"Because this is the first time we have had this policy, we will know next time a better procedure and how to better inform the students. We want the policy to be fair to the students and fair to the system," Burgess said.

FORT RILEY

Weight gain may be part of military's phase-out program

Release of 595 soldiers in 6-month period not unusual

STEPHANIE FUQUA
Collegian

If a Fort Riley soldier gained a few to many pounds during the holiday season, it might be wise to go on a liquid diet. Otherwise, it could mean being chaptered out of the Army.

From July to December 1991, 595 soldiers were chaptered, or kicked out.

That is 40 more than a similar time period in 1990. And while Fort Riley denies the increase is because the Army is decreasing its troop sizes, an ex-soldier disagreed.

"One reason there have been so many chapters is because the Army is scaling down," said Lance Daniels, former Fort Riley soldier. "They need less soldiers, so they are finding any little thing. What would have been a punishment before is now a chapter."

Daniels said soldiers are being chaptered for minor offenses, such as being overweight or having a spinal problem.

There was an increase in the number of chapters at Fort Riley after the troops returned from Operation Desert Storm, Daniels said.

"Before we went to Saudi you couldn't tell when people were chaptered. But after, they were either getting out or getting chaptered," Daniels said. "In my company alone, there were five chapters after we got back from Saudi. At least two of those were because of drugs."

Mark Meseke, Fort Riley media relations officer, said five categories of offenses were most common in 1991. These include misconduct, being overweight, drug or alcohol abuse, unsatisfactory performance or a personality disorder, where the person cannot get along with others.

Meseke said the figures from 1991 were not unusual.

"There was an increase, but that is not out of kilter. It's more of a coincidence than anything else," Meseke said.

He said the reason 1990 figures may have been low is because Fort Riley was gearing up for Operation Desert Storm.

Soldiers who have been chaptered from Fort Riley were not able to be reached for comment because of the Privacy Act, a military act pertaining to personal military records.

CENTRAL AMERICA

Haitian-Americans call for intervention

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Many Haitian-Americans, frustrated by the failure of diplomatic efforts to reinstate ousted President Jean-Bertrand Aristide, now are calling for an armed invasion to knock out Haiti's repressive military.

But in the same breath, members of the 300,000-strong Haitian immigrant community in New York adamantly oppose sending U.S. troops because of memories of a humiliating American occupation early this century.

Philippe Wilson Desir, Haiti's consul general in New York, said a force of Haitian exiles sponsored by friendly nations might be a solution.

"Thousands and thousands of Haitians are ready to do it," said Desir, a former Haitian navy lieutenant who fled after taking part in a failed 1970 coup attempt against the Duvalier family dictatorship.

Many Haitians don't believe the Bush administration backs Aristide, a radical priest who a year ago became Haiti's first freely elected leader. And they're outraged by the forced return of refugees who have fled the Caribbean island nation since the bloody coup Sept. 30.

"There is a tacit collaboration between the Haitian military and the State Department," Desir said. "The Americans will have the last word. And the Americans don't want Aristide's return."

The Bush administration, which recognizes Aristide as Haiti's legitimate leader, denies that charge.

Desir said "all the Haitians here" want a multinational force, such as one from the Organization of American States, to topple Haiti's army regime. "The Haitian soldiers won't leave unless they're chased out by force."

Many of Desir's constituents agree.

"There must be an OAS intervention, a military intervention, to restore Aristide and disarm the military. We Haitians will do the rest," said Fenelon Bouzi, an electrical engineer with the Metropolitan Transit Authority.

"The Americans don't want to help. If they did, they already would have done something," said Micheline Louis, a secretary. "We favor a multinational intervention in Haiti."

"If there's an invasion, it must be multinational — the OAS," said taxi driver Pierre Toussaint, who wants the 34-member group to build a new Haitian army.

Dozens of other Haitians interviewed here echoed those feelings. Haitian-Americans have strongly backed Aristide, and send hundreds of millions of dollars in remittances to impoverished relatives at home each year.

Thousands demonstrated in New York and Miami on Feb. 7 — the anniversary of Aristide's inauguration — to blast Washington for the forced return of refugees and demand stronger action against those who ousted him.

An OAS spokesman said the organization hasn't considered intervention to restore Aristide, since that's prohibited by the OAS charter, but said it could happen if Aristide requested it.

Assistant Secretary of State Bernard Aronson said last week the OAS should consider forming a peacekeeping force to deal with future coups in the hemisphere. He raised doubts about the effectiveness of OAS economic sanctions against Haiti.

But Washington and the OAS won't invade unless something "explosive" happens, like a huge exodus of refugees, said Larry Birns, director of the Council for Hemispheric Affairs, a Washington-based think tank.

A State Department official who closely monitors Haiti said on condition of anonymity that a U.S. invasion isn't "under active consideration right now." But, he said, "I'm not going to say we'll rule this in and rule that out.

TREND

Americans starved for leisure time

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The average American worker puts in about 140 more hours on the job every year than he did two decades ago.

A study conducted by two economists for the Washington-based Economic Policy Institute, a liberal research group that draws its funding from labor unions, foundations and corporations, also found the number of paid days off has dwindled.

It all adds up to a major crimp in leisure time, the study said.

"Americans are starved for time," it said. "Increasing numbers of people are finding themselves overworked, stressed out and heavily taxed by the joint demands of work and family life."

The study was written by Juliet Schor of Harvard University and Laura Leete-Guy of Case Western Reserve University. Schor wrote "The Overworked American: The Unexpected Decline of Leisure."

The study found that full-time workers put in, on average, 138 hours more a year in 1989 than they did in 1969.

The economists then looked at commuting time, and found that people were spending more time getting back and forth to work. Figuring in the rise in work hours, commuting time and the decline in days off, the economists said Americans are spending 158 hours more each year on work — or an extra month.

"The Japanese statements about Americans being lazy and not wanting to work are not based in fact," Leete-Guy said. "I almost got hysterical when I heard that."

Paid time off — vacations, holidays, sick leave and personal days — fell roughly 15 percent in the 1980s, the study said. Americans had an average of 16.1 days off a year in 1989, down from 19.8 days in 1981, according to the study. In most European countries, workers get paid vacations of at least five weeks, the study said.

The ongoing decline of real wages since 1973, coupled with the increased costs of health care and housing, are the major factors behind Americans' need to put in more hours, the institute said. Part of the rise was caused by women taking on a larger work burden by working a greater fraction of the year.

Meanwhile, time spent on such chores as laundry and cleaning house didn't decrease enough to stem the loss in leisure time, the study said.

The recent trends in work and leisure are the direct reversal of the predictions that most experts made 30 years ago — that automation, productivity growth and consumer satiation would cause a crisis of excess leisure time and its "attendant boredom and ennui," the study said.

"Instead, we have too little time, with its attendant social problems," the study said.

The study said the squeeze on leisure time has caused a dramatic shift in public attitudes. For the first time since surveys on time-income tradeoffs have been taken, Americans are signaling a willingness to give up money if it means time away from their job.

A 1989 poll found nearly two-thirds would give up 13 percent of their paycheck for more free time, the study said, while 80 percent said they would prefer a slower career path if they could spend more time with their families.

LEGISLATURE

Students to lobby in Topeka Tuesday

PAM FRAHM
Collegian

K-State students will converge on the Statehouse in Topeka Tuesday to lobby legislators for support of K-State.

The day has been designated KSU Lobby Day.

The student government legislative affairs committee organized a campus-wide recruitment effort to inform students of issues in the legislature dealing with higher education and to spark interest in Lobby Day. The committee spent Wednesday evening visiting more than 100 campus organizations and living groups.

While visiting the organizations, the committee also circulated a petition saying they are in favor of the Lobby Day priorities. Steve Patton, legislative affairs committee chairman, estimated they received at least 1,000 signatures.

"We don't want to be thrown in the shadows. We want the Legislature to know that K-State is doing something," Patton said.

Priorities for Lobby Day are full funding of the base budget, continued support for the renovation and expansion of Farrell Library, a 2.5 percent increase in faculty, classified, unclassified and student salaries, 100-percent GTA fee waiver and an enrollment adjustment to match the Kansas Board of Regent's request for the full funding of fiscal year 1993 as well as fiscal year 1992.

Tim Oswalt, student government state and community affairs director, said the lobby team will spend Tuesday meeting with legislators in small groups.

"To overwhelm them is more damaging than anything else," he said.

Besides the face-to-face lobbying, a reception with products from the Kansas Value Added Center, located on K-State's campus, has been scheduled for 10:50 a.m.

Oswalt said this will give the students another opportunity to talk to legislators and give them a chance to sample the center's products.

"We are trying to approach Lobby Day from a personal standpoint to show that we are students who care," Oswalt said.

A Lobby Day training session will be held on Monday at 6:30 p.m. in Union 208. The session is open not only to students lobbying Tuesday, but all students interested in learning more about higher education issues.

Stitt, Baker named city's Big Brother/ Big Sister of the year

TRISHA PERRIGO
Collegian

Jan Brady had Marsha, and Peter had Greg. Mary Ellen Walton had John-boy. But in reality, not everyone has an older brother or sister to look up to.

Big Brothers/Big Sisters gives dozens of children the chance to experience this everlasting friendship each year.

"It makes me feel good about myself. I'm making a difference in his life," said Tonya Baker, sophomore in social work, about her 9-year-old little brother, Marshawn Harge.

Baker and Harge have recently been named Big Sister/Little Brother of the year for Manhattan.

Rob Stitt, Manhattan resident and his little brother, Frankie Morrow were named Big Brother/Little Brother of the year.

Now, both Baker and Stitt and their little brothers submit essays that will make them eligible to be regional or possibly national Big Brother/Big Sister of the year.

A unanimous choice by the staff is required to be nominated as Big Brother/Big Sister of the year, said Jennifer Mejasich, Big Brother/Big Sister caseworker.

"It goes to someone who meets their goals throughout the year, who is an ideal role model, and someone we feel exemplifies what a big brother or big sister really is," Mejasich said.

Baker said she tries to do fun activities as well as educational ones with her little brother.

"We toured the hospital and went to the Manhattan airport to watch planes take off and land. We also toured the radio station. Marshawn thought that was really interesting," she said.

"I think she's nice and she's neat," Harge said. "It's fun. I get to do a lot of things. We read books together. We went to the library and to the airport.

"Oh yeah, and she taught me how to do a card trick," Harge said.

Baker said they also go to the movies, work on homework and do special holiday activities.

"We colored Easter eggs together. We put up a Christmas tree — Marshawn really got a kick out of that," she said. "Marshawn has the biggest smile. It makes me feel good when I see it. It's like he really cares about being with me."

Baker said she spends four or five hours one evening a week with Marshawn.

She said the time they spend together is important, and over the past year, Marshawn has learned to show his feelings more.

"He's a lot more responsive. He gives me hugs more often and he's developed in an emotional way," Baker said.

Baker said the experience has helped her as well.

"Big Brothers/Big Sisters is very rewarding. You grow as the little brother grows," she said.

Bill will eliminate forms of censorship

SUSAN DONOVAN
Collegian

If something controversial happens at a high school, don't expect to hear about it in the school's newspaper.

Many Kansas high school newspapers and yearbooks are censored by their administrators and publication advisers.

Censorship occurs at the high school level because of a Supreme Court ruling in 1988. In Hazelwood v. Kuhlmeier, the ruling stated high school administrators and advisers have the right to censor student journalists and their publications in public high schools. This includes newspapers and yearbooks.

There is current legislation, however, to counteract and reverse the 1988 ruling.

The Student Publication Act, Senate Bill No. 62, would restore the press rights of student publications by eliminating major forms of censorship on controversial news topics.

The bill has passed through both chambers of the Kansas Legislature and is awaiting approval from Gov. Joan Finney.

A key supporter and facilitator of Senate Bill No. 62 is Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan.

"In my opinion, it is quality legislation that is needed," Oleen said. "I am most hopeful that the governor will recognize the quality of the work and sign it into law."

Oleen said the governor's decision on Senate bill No. 62 would most likely be decided by Tuesday.

Manhattan High School's student newspaper, The Mentor, and the yearbook, the Blue M, are not censored by administrators. This means the student publication staff can report, print and produce advertisements about newsworthy information, whether it be political or controversial, without censorship.

Penny Wika, adviser of Manhattan High School student publications, said she has had no problems with administrators or the community because of printing and reporting on political or controversial new subjects.

She said the administration at MHS is completely supportive of the responsible efforts by students and their publications.

"A responsible press is needed on the high school level just as it is needed on the professional level," Wika said.

Ron Johnson, K-State director of Student Publications Inc. and assistant professor of journalism, said this freedom is not an option for many public high schools across the state.

Johnson, who has worked to restore free press rights in public high schools for nearly four years, said student journalism has its roots in high school publications.

Letter writing could secure a healthy K-State

The fate of K-State is once again in the hands of the Legislature — a Legislature that may need some friendly prodding.

Gov. Joan Finney's budget recommendations have been passed on to the Legislature for approval.

Although they're not perfect, the recommendations for K-State are what the administration calls "acceptable."

If her recommendations come to fruition, K-State will not have to experience an across-the-board cut like last year. And we will finally receive some money for enrollment adjustment.

The session is underway; legislators are talking about our school as we speak.

Administrators and student leaders have and will continue to do what they say is all they can do.

But if we've learned anything from history, we know this isn't always enough.

Here's where you come in.

Write your legislators. Tell your friends and your parents to write theirs. Not just the Manhattan-area legislators, but your home-town legislators.

K-State needs this money. We can't afford to not get it. Only so much reallocation, readjustment, sacrificing and fudging can go on before people just can't take it anymore.

Maybe your letter will be the straw that breaks the camel's back.

Voting more important than ever in November

An aging and frustrated Congress is leaving Capitol Hill, and many citizens' sentiments are, 'Don't let the door hit them in their collective ass.'

More than 100 freshmen are expected in next year's U.S. House of Representatives because of the greater than usual number of incumbents not seeking re-election.

One reason why lawmakers are leaving is low public esteem. Congress' reputation has been battered recently due to a pay raise for its members and a check-bouncing scandal.

There is also widespread discontent about the fact the government has been paralyzed because of polarization between the Republican White House and Democratic Congress.

Newly redistricted turf may have caused some members of Congress to bow out.

And some members just realize they are getting too damn old.

Whatever the reason, voters should take advantage of the turnover.

Historically, incumbents have a way of staying in Congress, so voters should be careful when selecting the next batch. This year's fortuitous emigration provides a young nation an opportunity to make some real changes through the potential 100 new faces.

It is time for voters to look at the issues to select the best candidates.

Voting according to politically popular issues or superficial promises is a disservice to all Americans.

We deserve a representative Congress with the best and brightest members. Not a bunch of incumbents or incompetents seeking to further their own political careers.

It is easy to sit back and just complain about Congress. Instead, let's vote intelligently in November, and maybe there won't be so many things to complain about next year.

FEBRUARY: The Moral Equivalent of Boredom

ED SKOOG

"Heavy boots of lead / fills his victims full of dread."
— Black Sabbath

This is about the dread of February, I guess, since there's nothing else to write about.

Some things are happening, true. Tyson's in the pokey, The Ren & Stimpy show is on three nights a week, the Democrats are on the news a lot, and "the Addams Family" is at the Campus Theater, but everyone's bored anyway. That's the nature of February, even though tradition installed a day of loud sex smack in the middle.

A month can't escape its season. February is the boot of winter, despite the lack of snow. Nothing grows in February, so the dead landscape is even more depressing without a blanket of whiteness. One would rather see a leper wearing a parka than naked. I would, anyway.

The only endearing feature of February I can imagine is fog. It reduces everything to a few feet, and only luminous objects matter. I learned this last Monday night, and almost took over this column, but after close analysis did not bear out.

If it'd worked out, this would be about driving to a big cool rock show in St. Louis and driving back through dense fog. Dinosaur Jr. played in a bar 150 feet from the Mississippi River, and all the way back on I-70 Tuesday morning, we were nearer to death than we recognized, wired on asthma medicine and whiskey. Smoke 'em if you got 'em, I wanted to say, as the fog thickened around us and reduced the world to a few vague outlines and blurs.

But instead the column was vague and blurry. And boring. This bored me, and I've been bored since I finished it. So please, don't ask me about it. It would be so horribly, belchingly boring that everyone who read it would die.

Fog — the meteorological equivalent of boredom.

Such a mass Jonestown-type tragedy might be what this town needs, though. It would stir things up around here a bit, jolt people out of their daily routines. Every Manhattanite seems to know how to live, what to do. I was talking with a city clerk and she confirmed that nothing spontaneous has happened in this town since we burned Nichols Hall down in 1969. I'll confess I'm bored with this town and everything in it.

I hereby endorse sporadic muggings of business students. I vote we grant all power to the administration over the minutia of campus life.

In addition to excitement, one's sense of justice and outrage fades in February. Last week I advocated random beatings upon the weak and spineless, but no one wrote in. At the beginning of the month I suggested the University reorganize the College of Business off the planet; that or force them to learn Latin, but again no one was insulted. Must be everyone agrees with me, which would be sensible.

What'll it take? I hereby endorse sporadic muggings of business students. I vote we grant all power to the administration over the minutia of campus life. I say Jackie McClaskey isn't doing enough to feed the poor. I say Bill Snyder has a big nose. I hereby fire Dana Altman, cancel the rest of the basketball season and replace it with intramural boce.

▶ A FEW BAD SOLDIERS RUIN THE BUNCH

Editor,

This is in response to the article on Feb. 11, "Violence Up After Desert Storm."

As a military spouse, I take a special concern in this problem. I am upset to know that there are people, like the ones who shot a student, that are currently serving in the Army.

What the City of Manhattan and the students of K-State must realize is that there are many, many, many men and women in the U.S. Military and only a few that are "bad eggs." If these people worked at some other corporation in Manhattan or Junction City, we would never hear about their job.

Having a university and military installation close together creates a very diverse population, one that we can learn and grow from. As a mayor at Fort Riley, I have expressed the concerns of K-State with top-level officials and have asked for their cooperation in talking to their troops and helping them to understand what is on the minds of K-State students. I would also ask that K-State students understand that not everyone in an Army uniform is a killer, thief, etc. Fort Riley is trying to change its image with K-State. Please give them time.

▶ CHRISTIAN VIEWPOINT BEING BELITTLED

Editor,

In the past week it seems that there have been strong rebuttals to the actions of certain campus organizations that are Christian in nature. The first being the Campus Crusade for Christ's protest of the movie Henry & June. The second was the column by Brad Seabourn about the link of the Bible and pornography. In both, the Christian viewpoint was either belittled or taken out of context. If one is to speak to the masses, then one should present an informed discussion of the topic they are dealing with.

It is quite easy for anyone to sit back and judge those who you think are judging your values. But aren't the people who hold traditional conservative values asked to endure these opinions that differ from theirs. At least the protesters seem to have the idea that not all people were in agreement with them. One might say that they were there to inform people. This is not to say that they were passing judgment on any of those there that night. I do feel that the protest is right for a couple of reasons: first, I agree with the idea that the content of the movie was not of a nature that should be shown on campus; second, I feel that their right to protest is nationally sacred, as long as it does not conflict with the law.

Referring to the Feb. 13 column in the Collegian by Brad Seabourn, I feel that he used the Bible in a manner that takes the stories out of their context and out of the understanding of the culture. There are stories about murder, rape, incest and other bad things. Taken in context and understanding the culture of time, one would see that these are times when the followers of God were either in rebellion or disobedience to God.

The Bible deals with all aspects of life, so it should not come as a surprise that it also shows us some of the bad things in life. This is done to show how to deal with those situations and why and how to avoid certain situations that could be harmful. The bible is the book that Christians use to guide them on the path that they have chosen.

No one is perfect. Just because some people chose to follow Christ and to follow his teachings that does not make those people perfect or right either. All it means is they have made a choice to follow to God, and because of this they may have some views to express in support of that belief. Just like other people have views to share.

What needs to be addressed is, not if Christians and those who support Christian ideas can protest what they feel is wrong, but if those who do not agree with those views can accept that in this country we have the right and the freedom to believe what we want and the opportunity to express that view. We may also keep in mind the great price that has been paid for us to get that freedom. That is the freedom of dissenting opinions.

So instead of "Christian bashing," how about voicing opinions that show your knowledge and understanding of a topic. Let's be informed commentators instead of name-callers.

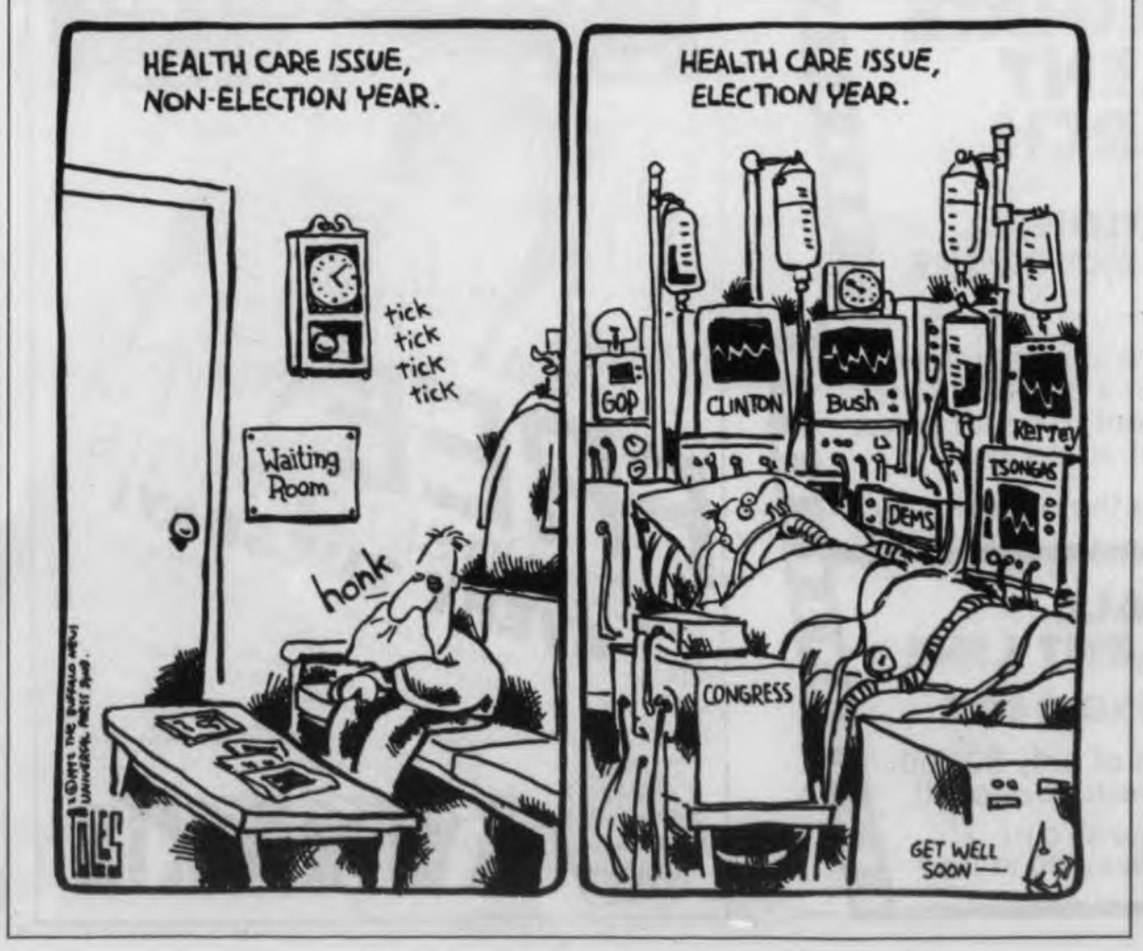
Manhattan resident

▶ SEABOURN SAVING SOULS WITHOUT UNDERSTANDING

Editor,



I am so glad, Brad Seabourn, that you are on the Collegian staff. Your column on the link between the Bible and pornography fits very nicely with your other brainless editorial attempts. Through your infinite wisdom and astounding logic, I have realized the foolishness of my Christian ways. Thank goodness we have someone like you who can make such great theological interpretations.

Brother Seabourn, now that I have accepted your way, do you think that I too could have a column in the paper? I want so very badly to spout about something that I don't understand. I want to quote the Bible out of context. I think that by writing columns that make Christians look foolish, I will finally be able to convince myself that what Jesus taught was wrong.

P.S. Be sure to save a pew for me when you are ready to move from the soapbox to the pulpit.

MIDDLE EAST

Israelis attack Iranian leader

Peace process threatened by camp raid, retaliation

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SIDON, Lebanon — Israeli helicopter gunships on Sunday blasted a motorcade carrying the leader of the pro-Iranian group Hezbollah in south Lebanon, killing him, his wife and son and four others, police said.

The dramatic strike, which could damage the Middle East peace process, was in apparent retaliation for a raid on an army camp inside Israel less than 48 hours earlier in which three Israeli soldiers were hacked to death.

The raid on the motorcade of Sheik Abbas Musawi followed Israeli air strikes earlier Sunday on two Palestinian refugee camps that police said killed four people and wounded 11.

In Jerusalem, the Israeli military acknowledged the strikes on the camps, saying they targeted the Fatah faction of the Palestine Liberation Organization. The military had no immediate comment on the attack on Musawi's motorcade.

The pro-Iranian Hezbollah, or Party of God, was considered the umbrella group for the Shiite Muslim holders of Western hostages in Lebanon. It also opposes the Middle East peace talks, the next round of which are to begin Feb. 24 in Washington.

Police said Musawi, 39, and his family were riding in a black Mercedes limousine leading a convoy of several cars on a road near Sharqiya, 13 miles southeast of the port city of Tyre when the air strike occurred.

They said two Israeli helicopter gunships fired five wire-guided missiles into the convoy, setting Musawi's car ablaze and destroying two Range Rovers full of bodyguards tailing him. Four bodyguards were killed, and 18 other people were wounded, they said.

Police in Sidon and Tyre said eight of the wounded were in very critical condition.

Sheik Maher Hammoud, the highest-ranking Shiite clergyman in south Lebanon, confirmed at his headquarters in Sidon that Musawi, his wife and son were killed in the attack.

Hezbollah's headquarters in Beirut also confirmed the attack, but did not immediately acknowledge Musawi's death. In a statement, it said the enemy carried out a vengeful, cowardly assault against the convoy of their leader, and some people had been wounded.

The group's radio station — Noor, or Light — interrupted a talk show about two hours after the attack to play solemn music interspersed with verses from the Koran, Islam's holy book.

Earlier Sunday, Israeli fighter-bombers and helicopters blasted Palestinian refugee camps at Ein el-Hilweh and Rashidiyeh. At Rashidiyeh, they struck an empty two-story military base that had been used by Fatah, the mainstream PLO faction.

Israeli Defense Minister Moshe Arens accused Fatah of mounting the attack on an Israeli army camp near the West Bank early Saturday, in which three soldiers were killed by Arab assailants armed with knives, axes and pitchforks. Two were recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union who had only been in the army a few weeks.

That attack sent shock waves through Israel, where military preparedness is a matter of national pride. Rafael Eytan, a former military chief of staff, called it a tremendous disaster.

Right-wing lawmakers and Jewish settlers have repeatedly urged Israel to pull out of Middle East peace talks because of attacks in the occupied territories, and some cited the raid as new proof that the Palestinians do not want peace.

In Lebanon, Col. Sultan Abul Inein, Fatah's commander for the Tyre region, denounced Sunday's air raids and vowed to continue military operations against the Zionist enemy until our land is liberated.

Area residents voice concern over flag misuse, desecration

Hochhauser discusses issues in UFM meeting

KRISTEN TURNER
Collegian

Area residents voiced their concerns over the issue of misuse and desecration of the American flag during a roundtable discussion featuring Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan.

"The American flag is Mom and apple pie," said Manuel Houghton, Manhattan resident.

Houghton and approximately 15 others attended the Sunday afternoon discussion in the University for Man Fireside Room.

Houghton said he had never been given the right to vote on the issue of the legality of flag burning, and he had been denied that right by politicians.

Hochhauser responded by explaining she supported the American flag and its proper treatment, but to amend the Bill of Rights, which has never been done, is ill-advised.

"Since the Supreme Court has said that flag burning is protected under the right of free speech, limited incidents have occurred. To amend the Bill of Rights would be the beginning of a chipping away at the right of free speech," Hochhauser said.

"It's tasteless, but you cannot legislate taste," she said.

Protection of local rivers and school finance were other issues discussed.

Bob Bellinger, Manhattan resident, voiced his concern over the opening of local waterways to commercialization, and the damage it would cause. Bellinger said he planned to take his concerns to the capital.

Daryl Myer, Rock Creek school board member, questioned Hochhauser on the budget plan for area schools in Fiscal Year 1993. He requested a close estimation as soon as possible — no later than July 1, 1992.

Hochhauser explained that Gov. Joan Finney's present plan is not feasible, but it is realistic to begin budgeting on the basis of last year's budget.

K-STATE BASKETBALL

Cat teams outgunned in weekend losses

Lady Cats drubbed 89-56 in home debacle

BRIAN ANDERSON
Collegian

"I apologize to anyone who cares about Lady Cats basketball."

Those words, uttered by K-State coach Susan Yow, summed up Saturday's 89-56 loss to Missouri at Bramlage Coliseum.

Forwards Erika Fields and Vantrece Williams outscored and outrebounded the K-State squad with 57 points and 26 boards, compared to K-State's 56-point and 20-rebound effort.

Fields, the Big Eight's second-leading scorer with 19.4 a game, tallied a career-high 31 points to give the Lady Tigers their 15th victory in 23 games and a 6-4 record in the Big Eight. Fields collected 18 rebounds, 10 coming on the offense board.

Williams scored 26 points as she continued her mastery over the Lady Cats. In the two games against K-State, Williams made 19 field goals in 25 attempts.

K-State's offensive leader was forward Leah Honeycutt, who scored 15 points. Honeycutt, who injured her right knee last Wednesday against Oklahoma, also led the team in rebounds with six. Honeycutt was one of the bright spots for Yow.

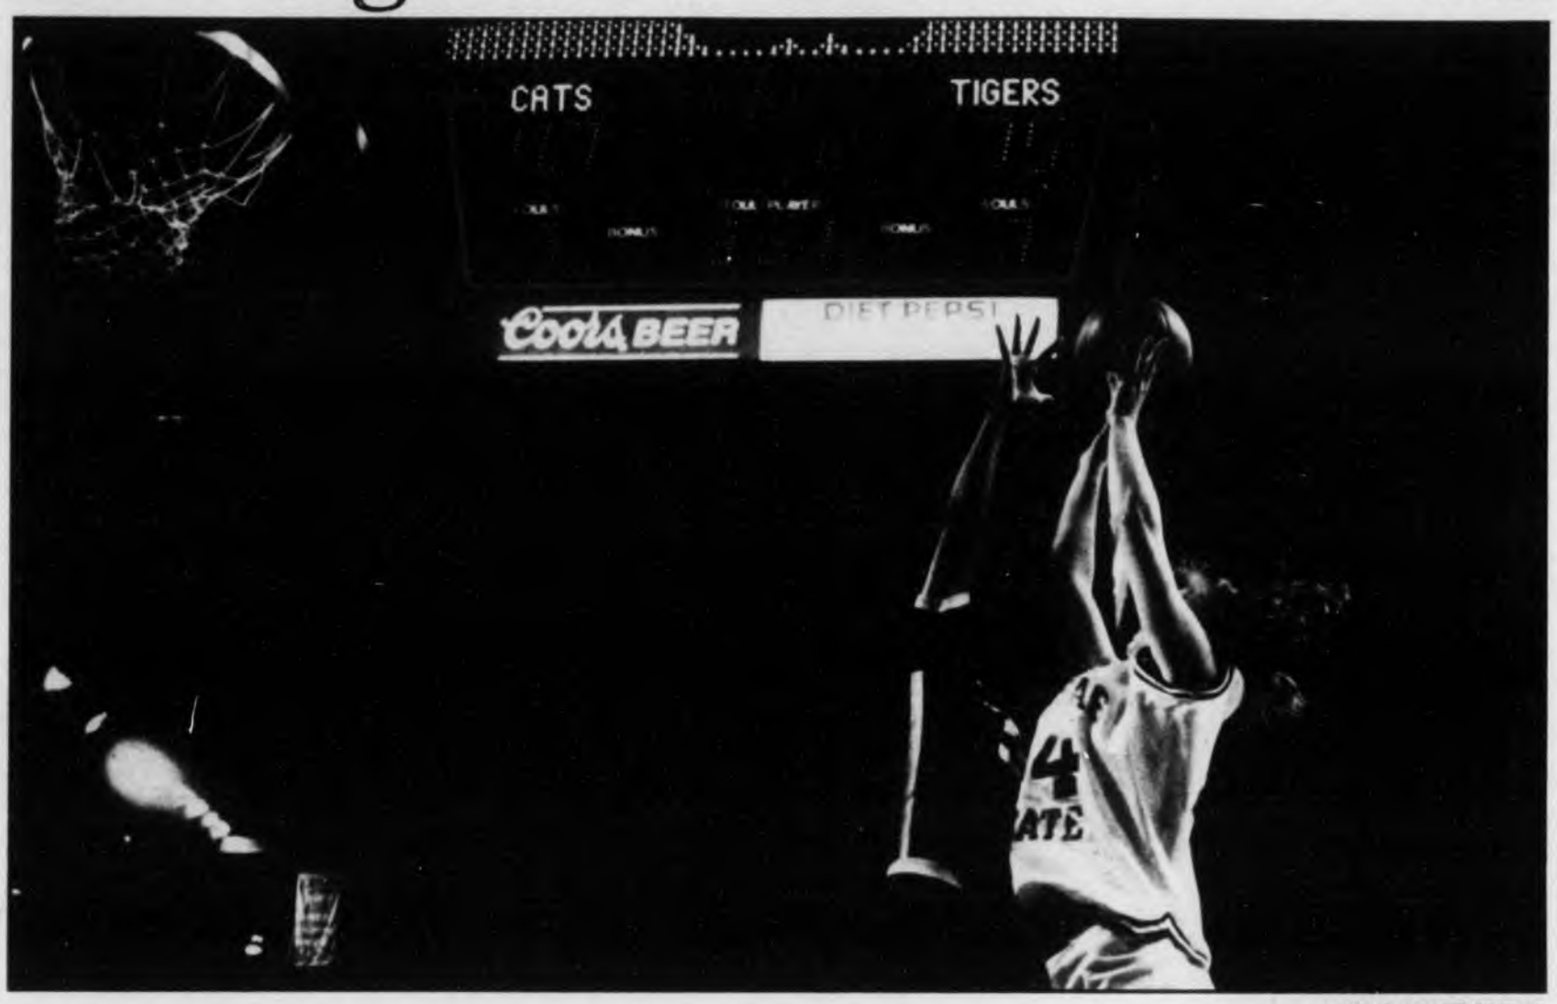
"She played hard. She gave us 100 percent today," Yow said after the game.

Another bright spot was the play of freshman Jo-Moree Grattan, who came off the bench to score nine points and grab five rebounds — both career highs — in 14 minutes of play.

The Lady Tiger defense held Mary Jo Miller to 12 points and no assists, down from her average of nearly 15 points and five assists.

One disappointing statistic that troubled Yow was the Lady Tigers' domination of the boards. For the game, Missouri grabbed 48 rebounds to the Lady Cats' 20, a problem that the Lady Cats have had all season.

"We got massacred on the boards," Yow said on her team's performance. "Rebounding is an indicator of how much effort a team displays. Even though Missouri is physically better, we weren't executing."



Yow said winning isn't the most important thing for her team right now. Playing up to the "K-State" image, however, is.

"K-State is known for its blue-collar work ethic," Yow said. Yow complained that the Lady Cats don't have that type of work ethic.

"We are not aggressive. We're missing it. I don't know what we're thinking," Yow said.

The Lady Cats, with a record of 2-7 in the Big Eight and 5-18 overall, travel to Ames, Iowa, Tuesday to play Iowa State. Iowa State is in the Big-Eight cellar, but that does not allay Yow's fears of the Lady Cyclones.

"They are a scary team to be playing since their head coach is not returning," Yow said of the 3-19 Lady Cyclones. "There is no pressure on their team. The pressure is on us to stay out of the cellar."

INSIDE STUFF

Yow questions team's effort following loss

Lack of aggressive play a culprit, according to coach

PATRICK OBLEY
Collegian

The fun is gone, the competitive edge is gone and the winning days are gone.

Just about all that is left for Lady Cats coach Susan Yow is the unenviable task of restoring a once-proud program to at least a shadow of its former self.

The fact is, the Lady Cats will have to win three of its final five games to match the all-time worst record in K-State history.

"I don't know what to do or what is wrong," Yow said after the Lady Cats most recent loss, an 89-56 home drubbing by Missouri. "There's not a lot to say."

Normally, Yow said, winning three of the final four games wouldn't be all that difficult — if the team gave effort. After a game in which two Lady Tigers, Vantrece Williams and Erika Fields, outscored and outrebounded K-State, Yow is convinced her team lacks the aggressiveness to win, or even compete.

"We weren't hustling," Yow said flatly. "If you don't work hard, you don't have a chance. If you do work at it, eventually good things will happen. I don't care if we're 5-18 or not.

"To get out of this mess, we have to give the effort."

A big indicator of effort is the rebounding margin, Yow said. Rarely have the Lady Cats outrebounded an opponent.

"I've never been in a position where my teams have been outrebounded game after game, and it's hard for me to deal with," Yow said. "Defensive rebounding tells me how aggressive a team is. We are not aggressive as a team."

Instilling aggressiveness is not her job, Yow said.

"I think aggressiveness has to come from within the individual," Yow said. "I know when my back is up against the wall, I get aggressive.

"I think it is up to me to bring the aggressiveness out, but it is not something I can instill in a player."

If the Lady Cats were giving all they had and were still being blown out, Yow said she wouldn't mind the losses.

"All I want right now is for us to just look like we're playing hard," Yow said. "K-State is a blue-collar school and historically, that is what our team has exemplified.

"We're not the Cadillac school of the state, that title belongs to the school up the river. We're the blue-collar school, and we haven't been representing that."

Unfortunately, Yow said, any harsh words or actions at this time probably wouldn't be enough to shake the Lady Cats from their losing ways.

"If I were looking at this program as an outsider, I wouldn't have any problem in asking, 'Do you retain this staff?' after this year is over," Yow said. "But looking at it from the inside, I'd have to ask more than that. I'd ask, 'Do I retain this staff, the coaches or the players?'

"We need to take a hard look at ourselves and keep in mind what K-State is all about. Unfortunately, I think this team will have to hit rock bottom before they will look at themselves.

"There is nothing anyone else can do. The athletic director can't change it. The President can't change it, boyfriends or parents can't change it. We're the only ones that can change it."

Whether or not the Lady Cats hit rock bottom this year and realize the problem is theirs to correct, Yow said there are other important factors at work.

"Other than Jen (Jennifer Grebing) and Mary Jo (Miller), this same team will be on the floor next year," Yow said, alluding to what may become an inherent lack of effort passed on to future teams.

"We've sown the seeds for next year with the things we've done this year. Right now, we have to ask, 'What kind of seeds are we planting? What are we doing?'"

104-75 loss to Sooners drop Cats to cellar

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

There's no place like home.

The line uttered by Dorothy in "The Wizard of Oz" applied perfectly to the Oklahoma men's basketball team and its most-recent decade full of successes on its home floor in Norman, Okla.

Or it applied until a five-game Big Eight losing streak spanning over a year in Lloyd Noble Center made the Sooners suddenly seem vulnerable.

That vulnerability ended Sunday afternoon, as the Sooners grabbed a 104-75 win over K-State. The win also snapped a three-game 1991-92 losing skid for the Sooners, who fell out of the AP poll.

"The game's a matter of confidence and making the right plays," said OU Coach Billy Tubbs following the win. "Also, the game is nicer when you don't have to leave it to chance in the last minute or minute and a half."

Tubbs' team, now 15-6 overall and 3-5 in the conference, needed the confidence provided by their first Big Eight home win since a 95-87 triumph over Missouri garnered Feb. 2, 1991.

"We needed to get some momentum, needed to get some confidence," the Sooner coach said. "We broke all of the streaks. Now we have a one-game winning streak."

And K-State, now 12-9 overall and 2-6 in the Big Eight, has a two-game losing skid and an 0-5 record in conference road tilts thus far this season, with only games at Colorado and Nebraska left on the road.

"We just got beat by a much better team today," K-State Coach Dana Altman said. "I'm not pleased with our effort by any means."

Altman had several reasons to be unhappy.

Jeff Webster scored 24 points and Damon Patterson added 23 for OU. The Cats turned the ball over 26 times and shot just 39 percent. Askia Jones scored just three points.

And so on.

K-State's only bright spot was Brian Henson. The reserve guard had a career-best 21 points.

With the OU lead at 10, 22-12, the Sooners went on a 12-0 run to up the advantage to 22, 34-12, when Webster hit a short jumper with just less than eight minutes left in the opening half.

"Defensively, we had no activity (early in the game)," Altman said. "We just did not do a good job of guarding them.

"It looked like they were fresh and we were tired. They were much more active than us early."

K-State ended the half with 15 turnovers, while the Sooners didn't turn the ball over until 6:43 remained in the first half.

"I thought for probably about 17 minutes of the first half, we played real well defensively," Tubbs said. "That keys our whole team."

But then came the final three-plus minutes of the half.

After OU grabbed its biggest advantage of the opening stanza on a dunk by Patterson that made it 47-22, Henson cranked it up.

The freshman came down on the ensuing possession and canned a three.

A layin and two late free throws ended a 10-point spurt for the McPherson native.

But while Henson and Vincent Jackson were scoring 10 points each in the opening half for K-State, Webster had 17, Patterson 11 and Price 10 for OU.

OU came out sluggishly to start the second half, and K-State was able to pull to within 13, 61-48. But the Sooners canned three treys in the next three minutes to move back up by 20.

They put it on cruise control at that point.

In addition to Webster and Patterson, OU got solid play from guards Brent Price — who had 17 points and seven assists — and Terry Evans, who had 17 points of his own.

Wylie Howard had 15 points and 12 boards for K-State.

Kansas rolls over Buffs; Oklahoma State falters at ISU

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — When Eddie Sutton said early last week that teams like Colorado and Iowa State "will determine who wins the Big Eight championship," he displayed a gift of prophecy.

On Wednesday night Colorado, struggling to escape the conference cellar, shocked Sutton's second-ranked Cowboys 57-53 while No. 4 Kansas was bouncing Iowa State 91-60.

Then, on Saturday, the Big Eight's two front-runners swapped opponents but not luck. Oklahoma State blew an 18-point bulge in the first half and a 7-point lead in overtime as Iowa State scratched out an 84-83 victory in what Johnny Orr described as the greatest comeback in his 42 years of coaching.

Colorado — the team that beat Oklahoma State and had lost to Kansas by just one point — spent Saturday suffering its most lopsided loss ever to the Jayhawks. The 82-45 thrashing included 59 turnovers and was Colorado's worst setback in almost three seasons.

As a result, Kansas (19-2, 7-1) holds a two-game lead over the Cowboys (21-3, 5-3), who were 20-0 but have now lost three of their last four.

One more result of the Big Eight's topsy-turvy week was to reaffirm the home court advantage that took a beating early in the season. After 13 conference games, Big Eight home teams were 6-7. Since then, they're 14-1.

"I've been coaching 42 years and I've never had a greater comeback, I don't think," Orr beamed after the improbable rally ended when Oklahoma State's Darwyn Alexander, an 80 percent foul shooter, missed twice with two seconds left.

After shooting less than 29 percent and falling 18 points behind in the first half, the Cyclones climbed back by hitting 80 percent.

"The way we came out and played the second half was about as good as we've ever played and probably can ever play," Orr said.

Justus Thigpen had words with Orr after Wednesday night's loss at Kansas and did not start Saturday. But did he ever finish. The junior guard scored 11 of his 22 points in the overtime. Then, when everyone was expecting him to shoot and he was triple-teamed, he fed freshman Fred Hoiberg on the game-winning play as the Cyclones took their first lead with less than 10 seconds to go.

Ron Bayless also scored 22 points for Iowa State. Hoiberg finished with 18 points — 14 in the second half.

Thinclads perform well in KSU Invite

KRIS YOUNG

With the Big Eight championships just two weeks away, the K-State Invitational was a good way to get warm. But some thinclads performed as if they were already on fire.

In the women's events, K-State took first in 10 of the 14 events and second in five. Coach John Capriotti said he was pleased with the performances.

"The women had a good meet. All the way down the line, there were good performances for the competition," Capriotti said.

Nikki Green placed first in the 200-meter dash and was a member of the first place mile-relay team.

"Nikki Green ran real well. She's been working hard and had a sore leg," he said.

Season bests highlighted the meet for Christy Ward and Dee Dee Tribue. Ward's shot put throw of 47 feet, 9 3/4 inches was her longest of the year, and Tribue's 40-1 1/4 triple jump was her first jump more than 40 feet.

Capriotti also said Connie Teaberry's six-foot high jump would definitely be a provisional qualifier for nationals. Teaberry competed in last year's NCAA meet, placing eighth with a jump of 5-10. Her personal best is 6 -3/4.

In the middle distance, the 600-yard, 800-meter and 1,000-meter runs, K-State finished strong. In the 1,000-meter run, K-State took the first four places.

The men's middle distance, however, was not a strong point. It wasn't speed or stamina they lacked — it was runners. The top middle-distance runners went to Iowa State to compete for the weekend.

"A big group of the men's team went to Iowa State," Capriotti said. "So you're taking five pretty good guys away. But we still had a good performance."

The Cats also did well in the sprints. The 55-meter dash has been a strong race all season for K-State, which has placed in every meet.

Divided into heats by times, three Cats lined up to race in the third heat — Thomas Randolph, Gerald Benton and J.J. Smith. A fourth sprinter, Clifton Etheridge, ran "unattached" to any team but has competed for K-State in the past.

Randolph won, while Benton, Etheridge and Smith followed.

Randolph said racing against teammates didn't affect the way he ran.

"We practice together and we're always competitive," Randolph said. "I push as hard as if I was racing against anyone else."

Middle runners shine in meet

FRANK KLEEMANN

Just two more weeks until the Big Eight indoor track and field championships in Lawrence.

For some athletes, time runs out. But not for K-State's middle-distance runners.

At the K-State Invitational track meet Saturday at Ahearn Field House, K-State's female runners showed that they are already in form for the Big Eight meet. With Paulette Staats in the 800 meters, Janet Treiber in the mile and Lesley Wells in the 1,000 meters, K-State dominated the middle-distance runs.

Finding a pleased track coach John Capriotti after the meet was a logical consequence.

"I think the middle distance runners did pretty well today," he said, referring to the women's team.

The only time Wells was challenged in the 1,000 meter run was at the starting line. Wells needed just 2 minutes and 57 seconds to go the distance.

"I'm happy with the race," she said. "It was the first time that I've run the 1,000 meters and I feel good about it."

Wells said coach Capriotti told her to go out and run hard — so she did.

"I thought it would be harder to the end," she said. "Now, I want to stay with the 1,000 because I like it a lot better."

Capriotti said the run was something of an experiment and that he was satisfied with the result.

"Lesley is doing really well," he said. "I wanted to see what she could do, what her ceiling was. In the last lap, she got tired because she ran so fast. But that's OK, because I knew if she would run hard and get tired she would still win. Lesley did really well."

In the future, Wells said she hopes to run around 2.50, a time Capriotti also sees as a realistic goal.

"I think she runs better if she follows (other runners)," he said about Wells who also ran in the winning 1,600-meter relay team. "Today, she led the whole race. But I was happy with how she won the race all by herself."

Treiber, who finished second to Wells, said she tried to stick with Wells but just couldn't do it.

"I thought Janet would be closer in the early rounds," Wells said. "But I couldn't hear her name called when the coaches told us the time each lap."

However, Treiber didn't take it too hard.

"Lesley is fast, she was fresh, and she could take it all out," she said. "But the 1,000-meter was just a workout for me."

Capriotti said in the case of Treiber, the 1,000-meter races are good for speed development.

Treiber's main race happened about an hour before the 1,000 meters. She won the mile run with a time of 4:57.49.

COLUMN

Of beat-up Chevys, Fords, drag racing and the pill

DAVID FRESE

Baseball aside, there is no sport as truly American as drag racing.

Sure the Romans raced little Ben Hur chariots and horse racing has been around as long as organized crime, college administrating and prostitution, but racing the quarter on a Saturday night is America at its finest.

My friends used to drag race a little in high school. We would meet at Tom's for burgers and sodas, and, inevitably, someone would say their car was faster than someone else and, whooie, we were off.

The trick here was Tom's was the very same place the Po-lice hung out during their breaks, which, in the crime-infested neighborhoods of Council Grove, was most of the time. We had to be sneaky about it.

This was when I was about 16, I think. That same year my father had handed over to me the keys to a silvery-blue 1966 Ford Mustang with a stock 289, three on the floor and rust on the fenders.

It wasn't much of a performance car, I guess. Everybody else I knew drove Chevys, and just about everybody who was anybody in the junior class ahead of me had a souped-up, jacked-up Camaro with 50s on the back and skinny little racing tires on the front. Most of those guys still have them. You can drive by all the gas stations in Council Grove and see the old Camaros sitting there, rusting out with "For Sale" signs in the windows.

But I was a Ford man, the last of a breed. I didn't know a hell of a lot about cars, or drag racing for that matter, but all my friends did. That was the crowd I fell in with. My dad, though, raced that same Mustang when he was a kid. He became a mechanic right out of high school, which is something I never understood, given my mechanical illiteracy. But then again, he once said he thought learning English in school was senseless.

Earlier this year, I asked my father what made him want to be a mechanic.

"Cars were all we thought about when we were kids. We didn't think about girls," he said. "'Course, we didn't have the pill then."

I raced the Mustang one time, right after I got it. It was against a big, bad, brown Camaro a friend of mine named Jim had souped up. He was a stocky guy that I thought was kind of a pain in the ass, and he told me he wanted to race while I was playing Asteroids in Tom's arcade room.

I snickered a little, simply because the Mustang was something of a shitheap. I loved it and all, but it had about 150,000 miles on it at the time and looked like a mosquito fogger when it started up because of the oil it burned. I think he mistook it for a challenge.

"C'mon, Frese," he said, spitting tobacco behind the Asteroids machine. "You chicken?"

You just knew that had to happen.

"Hell, no," I said.

So me and Stacy, who was my best friend at the time, along with a brown-eyed girl I was trying to show off for went out near the Ritz Drive-In Theater that a tornado had blown over the summer before. Someone had painted a fresh white stripe at the starting line of the road that ran by the Drive In — probably Jim, in anticipation of whooping me. My friends and I stood outside my car hoping he wouldn't show up when the roar of his pipes came up the hill.

He brought the Camaro to a screeching halt right on the starting line.

"Stops on a dime with nine cents change," he hollered out the window. "Yeew!"

I was nervous as hell. I just knew I was going to wreck. And then there was the girl. If I lost, I'd be a loser.

Stacy stood between the two cars. He said when he dropped his bottle, we'd go.

I popped in my Billy Squier "Emotions in Motion" tape. Stacy dragged off his smoke and held the bottle high. Jim was revving his motor. I revved mine. Stacy's fingers went wide and the bottle fell to the pavement. I dumped the clutch and my motor stalled. Jim blazed on ahead. As he towed us back to town he told the girl he topped out at 120 before the finish line.

I always thought that was a load of shit, but he got her pregnant later that fall, so I guess she believed it.

OLYMPICS DIGEST

MEDALS

Germany leads with seven golds and 18 overall. Including team events, the Germans have won 25 individual medals, 16 of them from former East Germans. Austria was second with 16, two ahead of the Unified Team. The United States had six.

MEDALISTS

Finland's 16-year-old Toni Nieminen became the Games' third triple medalist and fifth double gold winner with a victory in the 120-meter ski jump. On Friday, he became the youngest male champion ever in the Winter Games with a gold in team jumping.

Switzerland won the gold in two-man, Germany took silver and bronze. The U.S. team of Herschel Walker and Brian Shimer finished seventh, the best American finish since 1980.

Another surprise winner as Norway's Kjetil Andre Aamodt won gold in men's super giant slalom. Unknowns have won four of the first five men's and women's races.

The Unified Team edged Canada, 5-4. It was the first loss for the Canadians, who nonetheless will go into the medal round as one of the two No. 1 seeds. The United States is the last unbeaten, untied team in the tournament. Seeds will be announced later this week.

U.S. team faring surprisingly well so far

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ALBERTVILLE, France (AP) — Neither Herschel Walker's bombout on the bobsled nor Eric Flaim's burnout in speedskating Sunday could dull the glow of the U.S. team's surprise showing midway through the Winter Games.

On a day when bird-like teen Toni Nieminen of Finland soared above everyone, the Americans kept chugging along toward perhaps their best overall performance in the Winter Olympics.

The biggest complaint, "atrocious" meals for the athletes that made Flaim sick, may shock the sensibilities of the food-conscious French, but it still couldn't spoil the U.S. team's happiness.

More than a medal bonanza — the United States already has matched its total of six in 1988 and still hopes to surpass its record of 12 — the Americans are showing strength in a wide range of supposedly un-American sports and doing the grunt work for 1994.

There's no chance they'll catch the Winter Games powerhouses — Germany leads with 18 medals, Austria has 16 and the Russian-led Unified Team has 14 — but the Americans see medal opportunies this week in hockey, speedskating, skiing and, most definitely, women's figure skating.

The Americans have the only unbeaten, untied hockey team following Canada's first loss, 5-4, against the Unified Team.

"Across the board in the contemporary Games since 1956, these are probably our best finishes," U.S. Olympic Committee spokesman Mike Moran said. "We're very happy with this and thrilled for the athletes and sports governing bodies. Everybody, since Calgary, stepped it up a couple of notches."

Walker, the Minnesota Vikings tailback who thought he could barge into the Games and run away with a medal, finished seventh in the two-man bobsled with driver Brian Shimer. But their time was respectable — .69 seconds behind Switzerland's gold medal duo of Gustav Weder and Donat Acklin and their placement was the best for a U.S. team since a fifth place in 1980.

"It's disappointing, but we're not going to give up," said Walker, who gets another crack at a medal next weekend in the four-man bobsled. "Brian and I, for the time that we've done things, we've gotten better and better. There's no doubt I was expecting more. I think Brian was expecting more."

Team leader James Hickey, a member of the U.S. four-man teams in 1968 and '72, acknowledged that the coaching staff might have expected too much from Walker in his Olympic debut.

"We kind of thought he would be the hero we were looking for," Hickey said. "The U.S. hasn't won a medal since 1956, and I think we still have one coming in the four-man."

Walker concurred, saying "There's no doubt I think I can win. If I didn't, I'd be going home."

Flaim came here looking for a gold to complement the silver he won in the men's 1,500 speedskating. But a sudden sickness caused by food poisoning left him 24th, far behind Norway's gold medalist, Johann Olav Koss.

Flaim became violently ill after eating a fish lunch Saturday and almost didn't skate. He made it to the oval, but his time of 1:59.60 was nearly five seconds behind Koss' 1:54.81.

"I didn't have any snap in my legs, I didn't have anything left," said Flaim, who skated well for two laps before falling off badly. "I don't know if I'd call it frustrating, but it's certainly hard to deal with."

Flaim said he has no plans to skip Tuesday's 1,000, which he considered his best chance for a medal even before the Olympics began.

Artistry in the air is the specialty of 16-year-old Toni Nieminen, and, oh, can he fly. In his native Lahti, kids grow up ski jumping the way Americans grow up playing baseball. Nieminen is a sort of little slugger of the slopes.

With his skis pointed toes-out in V style, his body leaning nearly parallel to the ground, and his long blond locks blowing behind from under his helmet, Nieminen is an aerodynamic wonder.

He soared to the two longest jumps Sunday — 400 feet, 3 inches and 403-6 — to become the youngest Olympic champion on the big 120-meter hill. Not bad for a smooth-cheeked teenager in his first year of international competition.

"I am the luckiest guy in the world, it's great," Nieminen said.

HOUSING

Students share work in houses

Cooperative living lowers college expenses, increases responsibilities

STEPHANIE LOEPPKE
Collegian

Students interested in cooperative living have three choices at K-State.

Alpha of Clovia, Smurthwaite Women's Leadership House and Smith Scholarship House offer students the chance to share the expenses, work and fun of college living.

Clovia began in 1931 when five women wanted to have cheap living arrangements, share responsibilities and bring goods from home for affordable living.

In 1961, Smurthwaite House became a neighbor to Clovia.

Smurthwaite was built as an expansion of the residence halls. The house was built and named in honor of Georgianna Smurthwaite, state home economics extension leader from 1931 to 1954.

It was designed as a cooperative venture for 64 women students.

Unlike the Smurthwaite House, Smith is an independent housing facility.

L. Irene Putnam, a K-State benefactor, donated funds for the specific purpose of beginning a men's scholarship house in memory of her brother, Maitland Smith.

Smith men work seven to eight hours a week cooking, cleaning and performing various other duties while maintaining a 2.7 grade point average, said Kevin Flinn, house resident and sophomore in geography and economics.

All three organizations have membership requirements.

Clovia women go through an application process. They must have a high standing in high school and maintain a certain GPA to maintain residency. Each woman is required to be on a house committee to help the house operate. The pledge class must be involved in an outside group organization, and hopefully, be active throughout college, housemother Evelyn Knopp said.

She said the women work four hours a week in the house toward cooking, cleaning and house management.

Smurthwaite is a scholarship hall, but it does not get recognition as one, said Angie Rieder, graduate assistant director in college student personnel.

"For many years the emphasis was cooperative living," she said. "But there was a change in the 1980s, and now leadership and scholarship are heavily weighed upon."

Smurthwaite House is now Smurthwaite Women's Leadership House.

Like Clovia, room and board are cheaper because the women each do their share of cooking, cleaning and house management.

Smurthwaite women also go through an application process. Once the women are residents, they are responsible for developmental programming.

It is based on the wellness concept, Rieder said.

By contract, the women have to obtain a certain GPA, be involved in out-of-house group organizations and attend two of their own house programs.

Anneliese Snyder, executive director of Smith House, said Smith's housing arrangement is a self-teaching operation.

She said when the men have problem situations in managing the house, they must work together to resolve them.

It prepares them for the real world, Snyder said, and teaches self-reliance.

"I'm not a housemother," Snyder said.

Snyder, a native of Hannover, West Germany and former resident of Winfield, Kan., was hired three years ago by the Smith Alumni Association. Her responsibilities include communication between Smith men, alumni and the campus.

She said she recruits new members for the house and sends out the alumni newsletter. Snyder said she has nothing to do with house operations.

"The (men of the) house make their own decisions and spend their own money," Snyder said.

Residents of Smith are employed by Smith Alumni for the positions of house and kitchen manager and treasurer. They are in charge of house operations and funding.

Other leadership positions include executive offices and committee chairmen.

In the early years of Clovia's existence, the house had a greek affiliation. The state 4-H leaders adopted the name from a Greek derivative of the word clover.

In 1961, the greek ties were dropped, and the house became a scholarship house.

Cooperative living gives the responsibilities to the students. And to many residents, that makes the house more like a home.

"I'm a mother figure," Knopp said, "so the girls can come talk to me or, if they get sick, I'll drive them to the doctor."

Taking care of the house goes a step further at Clovia than just regular duties. Former Clovia resident Cindy Dahnke, interior architecture graduate of Argusville, N.D., has worked to redecorate the house.

The task started during her residency between 1984 and 1990.

"She redecorated most of the house," said Mary Jane Stowell, senior in horticulture.

"With her mom having a decorating business, they had contacts," said Laura Vesecky, senior in early childhood education.

Knopp said Dahnke was the student in charge. The recreation room was carpeted, painted and new furniture was bought.

Dahnke chose the room theme, and a business in Kansas City was chosen to custom-make the furniture.

Over the year, the study room furniture was reupholstered along with the lower lounge being redecorated and most floor phone stations wallpapered and carpeted.

Dahnke returned over semester break and redecorated three of the residents rooms where she formerly lived, each with their own theme.

Smurthwaite and Smith are also making house improvements.

Smurthwaite house improvements have been numerous in the last three years. The living room has new couches and an entertainment center, which includes a television, stereo and video cassette recorder.

Last fall, new carpet was installed in the study room. Over semester break, new ceiling lights were installed in the living room, dining room and hallways.

Both homes have house officers and run weekly meetings for house operations.

"I am pleased the University has seen the importance of Smurthwaite. The upkeep of the house keeps us on the same level as other resident halls as far as physical appearance," said Melanie Hundley, junior in agricultural journalism and three-year resident and vice-president of Smurthwaite.

"But the atmosphere at Smurthwaite keeps us separated. In addition, it provides a better, more attractive living environment for recruiting new house members," said Hundley.

Flinn said the Smith house installed a new stove this year.

"We're going to redo the floors in the living room and TV area, hopefully this summer," Flinn said.

Snyder said over the years she has heard comments that youth are spoiled and are no good. But she said the Smith men earn their scholarship through their work.

Treiber's main race happened about an hour before the 1,000 meters. She won the mile run with a time of 4:57.49.

"I felt good about the mile race," she said. "But I was unhappy that I didn't take it a little bit faster."

Treiber switched the lead a couple times with teammate Jennifer Hillier in the earlier part of the run before Treiber pulled away.

"It really helped when Jennifer came up and pushed me," Treiber said. "After that, I felt pretty strong in the last quarter of the race."

Capriotti said he felt Treiber still has some room for improvement.

"She had a lot left," he said. "However, Janet competed really well and she looked very good."

Track

Randolph said his teammates and competition for the 55-meter dash were the best competition of the meet. Randolph also finished first in the 200-meter dash.

Long distance runners also placed high. Milers Chris McKenzie , Mike Becker and Yared Berhone finished first, third and fourth respectively, and Ron Smith placed second in the 3,000-meter run.

Despite the individual performances, injuries seem to be what Capriotti is concerned about right now.

"My biggest goal is to get everyone healthy in the next couple of weeks for the Big Eight meet."

CAMPUS ORGANIZATIONS

Hand Band sings by signing to community

Performances benefit those who can, cannot hear

MITCH HIXSON
Collegian

Improving communication between the deaf and the hearing is the main goal of Hand Band, a relatively unknown group on campus.

Rebecca Owens, graduate teaching assistant in public speaking and Hand Band founder, said the group presents a new, unique step to bridge the communication gap between the hearing-impaired and the hearing.

Owens said the main focus of Hand Band is to get the deaf culture out into the community and past the gap of communication that exists between the hearing impaired and the hearing culture.

"This gap cannot be bridged just by the hearing-impaired because whatever they do, the hearing-impaired cannot become undeaf," Owens said.

The group sings and signs out songs during performances throughout the community.

Jeannie Skolaut, manager of the group, said during performances, "We have a tape of music so you can hear music, and we sing the song and sign to it."

She said this way people watching the group, hearing-impaired or not, can enjoy the songs.

Hand Band is needed because deaf people are so isolated, Owens said.

"It's so easy for them to turn into themselves and things that keep them isolated from people," she said.

Owens believes the hearing are afraid of sign language, and to a lesser extent, of deaf people because few hearing people know how to communicate with the deaf.

Hand Band eases this fear, because it teaches the hearing how to communicate using sign language, and it makes learning sign language easier through the use of songs, Owens said.

"Songs just make it (the signs) flow and stick easier," she said.

With just a minimal amount of effort, the hearing culture can bridge the communication gap, or at least take a first step, Owens said. She said if the hearing know just a few signs, the deaf people will attempt to communicate back.

Hand Band is composed of volunteers and hearing students from the two sign language classes Owens teaches. No one in the group is deaf, she said.

One of the requirements of Owens' classes is to participate in Hand Band. She said students are required to participate in two performances and the corresponding practices. Once the students have done the requirement, any other performances are extra credit.

"People do the extra credit work, but they don't look at it as work. They do it because it's fun, and they enjoy it," said Skolaut, who performed in the group last semester.

Skolaut also said none of the students start out knowing any sign language, except those that took it the last semester. So the beginners must be taught how to sign.

She said almost everyone who was in the group last semester came back this semester on a volunteer basis because everyone enjoyed being in the group.

Owens started the program after she began graduate school at K-State. She said she was startled to realize there was not a sign language course offered anywhere on campus.

Owens said she knew sign language and felt it was important to have a class so others could learn. She was told if she wanted a sign language class, she would have to teach it herself. So she did.

Amy Taylor, senior in speech pathology and member of the Hand Band, signs to a country music song during a performance at the Stonybrook Retirement Community on Valentine's Day. The Hand Band will hold its next performance at a home basketball game March 7.

At first it was Owens and three or four other graduate students who struggled to make the program work. Then it all of a sudden it kicked in, Owens said.

"It just fell into place and now it's really taken off, so I'm really excited," she said.

Skolaut also sees the momentum of the group growing, even though the University as a whole doesn't know much about it.

"Everyone I've talked to has been really excited about it," she said. "People have been very receptive to it, just not enough people know about it."

Hand Band will perform five or six times this semester. The first was Feb. 14, at the Stoneybrook Retirement Community. The group will also perform at a K-State women's basketball game Feb. 26 and a men's basketball game March 7.

Owens said she wants Hand Band programs to start before college. She said she would like to see Hand Band started up in high schools, junior highs and especially in elementary schools.

"Little kids' minds are so pliable to learn anything and everything."

COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE

Professors receive lessons; students to get new curriculum

Grant awarded to fund seminars, enhance teaching

CARMEN DAY
Collegian

Students are not the only ones who suffer from a lack of motivation. Teachers can also lose motivation for effective instruction, while others are just not well-trained in teaching techniques.

A grant from the Department of Agriculture Higher Education Program was awarded to the College of Agriculture to sponsor a series of seminars on effective teaching.

"Enhancing Teaching Effectiveness in Agriculture" will be the topic for workshops beginning in March.

"Getting information across and motivating the student to learn is the responsibility of the teacher," said John Havlin, associate professor of agronomy and contributor to the grant proposal.

"Motivation to learn is sometimes hard to keep at a high level," he said. "And a lot of aspects of effective instruction begin to be overlooked."

Havlin said there is one major problem which faculty and graduate students face.

"We're trained to be scientists first, and the teaching isn't even considered as part of our training," he said. "Then we are put into a position where we are required to teach."

Although the USDA grant was not received the first year it was submitted, it did rank very high on the list.

Havlin said the proposal was fine-tuned the second year and rated first out of 160 applicants. He said $70,000 was given to the college to offer the workshops and seminars over a three-year period.

Experts and resource people will be brought in not only from K-State, but from around the country. Havlin said the first topic on instructional goals and objectives will be taught by Colorado State University professionals.

Vicki Clegg, director of the office of educational improvement, will talk about the psychology of learning, learning styles and motivating students to learn during her presentation.

"We need to place emphasis on learning concepts and teaching them to people, not subjects," Clegg said. "People learn in all different ways, and we are trying to propose and implement learning strategies in different styles."

Although the seminar focuses on agricultural teaching methods and effectiveness, the course is not limited to just College of Agriculture faculty and graduate students.

"Most of the teachers I've had have been good, but some have been less effective than others," said Rachael Tibbitts, senior in English and Spanish. "It takes enthusiasm and interest in the subject they're teaching to keep the class interested."

Tibbitts said it's important for a teacher to get down on the students' level.

"I have a teacher who shakes everybody's hand and greets us individually each time before class," she said. "I have never seen anything like that before. It's great."

Havlin said he also would like to see faculty from surrounding community colleges attend the workshops.

"We get a lot of transfer students here," he said. "If we can get their faculty better trained here at the conferences, then our job becomes a lot easier, and we can move the level of instruction up a notch."

The effective teaching workshops will be held three different times this year and will each deal with separate topics. Graduate students will also have the chance to earn one credit hour for their participation in the seminar.

K-State adopts secondary major in enviromental issues

CHRISTINA CARBAJAL
Collegian

A new secondary major in the Department of Natural Resources and Environmental Sciences will allow K-State undergraduates to strengthen their majors.

Steve Thien, professor of agronomy, said the new secondary major will also help students land jobs through learning more about environmental issues and saving Earth's natural resources.

Faculty Senate recently passed the secondary major for the colleges of Agriculture, Engineering and Arts and Sciences. It should be in place by the 1992 fall semester.

The secondary major is for students who are in a science-based major, or who can use the information to enhance their field of study, Thien said.

"Because many K-State graduates have not received majors in the environmental area, it would hurt students' ability to compete in the job market," he said.

Thien was the head of the provost's advisory committee that developed the secondary major.

According to the committee, the demand for environmental services is expanding by as much as 30 percent each year.

The committee decided the secondary major was necessary to meet the increasing demand from government, public and corporate consciousness, and meeting the needs for more trained minds in this area.

The committee said the emphasis on research involving natural resource sciences and the environment has long been a strength at K-State.

FARRELL LIBRARY

Proposal may speed expansion

Regents to hear plan allowing addition to be done sooner than expected

MITCH HIXSON
Collegian

A proposal that might speed up the process of Farrell Library additions will be presented Thursday to the Kansas Board of Regents.

As it stands, the earliest estimate for completed construction is 2000 or 2001.

By this time, a library that already ranks last in comparison to other Big Eight libraries could be a liability for students and faculty.

The program, offered by Regent Charles Hostetler from Manhattan, allows for the additions to be finished and paid for sooner.

Hostetler will present to the regents his plan to increase the Education Building Fund levy from 1 mill to 1.5 mills.

This levy would raise more than $140 million for education building projects. In that $140 million, there would be the $20 million needed for Farrell.

"If we put the program together, get the Legislature to pass it and the governor to sign it, we could hopefully have the bonds issued by the end of the year," Hostetler said.

The plans would still have to be drawn up, he said, but if the bonds were issued by the end of the year, construction could start early.

"It could start in a year and a half, certainly in two years. So, it would be construction in the year 1994 instead of the year 2000," he said.

There are many reasons for implementing the program now, Hostetler said. Serious building needs exist now, he said, and they will only grow worse over time.

He said the current low interest rates also allow a larger bond issue.

"Federal matching funds of $14 million are available for two buildings, and federal funds may be available for other buildings as well," Hostetler said.

Other reasons for going with his plan, he said, include a sizable increase in construction costs on the projects in the next decade because of inflation, mill levies may soon be lowered in about 75 percent of Kansas school districts, and money from gifts and students is available now for at least two buildings.

Hostetler also said the $140 million in new construction would help the Kansas economy, especially Kansas building contractors, who need additional work.

ENROLLMENT

Figures up 192 from spring 1991

STEPHANIE FUQUA
Collegian

Lately, K-State students have been bombarded with bad news from the University.

The Registrar's office on Monday, however, said 20th-day enrollment figures are higher than those of the 1991 spring semester — even with closed classes.

At K-State and K-State-Salina, 19,755 students have enrolled this semester — 192 more students than in spring 1991.

Cheryl May, director of news services, said it is important that students realize these figures also include the enrollment for K-State-Salina.

The enrollment for spring semester at K-State-Salina is 836, a 24-percent increase above spring 1991 enrollment.

Denise Hoeffner, assistant registrar at K-State-Salina, said enrollment figures from this semester were higher than expected.

"They were higher than last fall's enrollment, and we experienced really, really good enrollment figures last fall," she said.

Enrollment on the main campus totaled 18,939 students, up 30 from last spring, but down from the fall enrollment of 20,712.

"Our goal is to stabilize, " said Gunile DeVault, associate registrar.

Registrar Don Foster agreed.

"The numbers are very stable, which is what we expected," he said. "The new freshmen numbers are up more than we thought.

"Even with reports of closed classes and the difficulty students are experiencing getting into classes, that is not causing students to leave the University. Those are positive signs and indicative of the positive nature of the K-State student body."

The College of Arts and Sciences had the biggest increase, with a growth of 228 students.

On the other end of the spectrum, the College of Business Administration had the biggest decrease, down 219 students.

David Donnelly, acting dean of business administration, said the decrease in business administration enrollment may have to do with the economy.

"The economy has changed. It's a soft market now, and that will be more of a concern to students now," Donnelly said. "Also, nationally, the number of students enrolling in business administration is down.

"We are in the process of increasing our admission standards, and that may have a lot to do with it. To declare a major within our college, students have to maintain a GPA of 2.5 or better. That'll have a little bit of an impact," he said.

Dodge City college to close June 30

Financial problems ruin only 4-year institution in southwestern Kansas

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DODGE CITY — St. Mary of the Plains College, citing financial problems due largely to its involvement with a defunct truck driving school, announced Monday it will close after this semester.

The liberal arts college operated by the Sisters of St. Joseph in Wichita will close after June 30, President Bernard Parker said.

The school, which is the only four-year institution in southwestern Kansas, lost $210,000 last year and projected losing almost $1 million this year, Parker said.

The school has 837 full-time and part-time students. They, the faculty and other employees were told Monday of the decision.

"Sadly, the reasons for the closure are incontrovertible and non-negotiable," Parker said.

"The congregation of the Sisters of St. Joseph accepted the recommendation with regret."

Parker said the decision was connected to the "disastrous consequences" of the college's involvement with the American Truck Driving School, a vocational program for non-traditional students that began in 1985.

The U.S. Department of Education found that the program didn't meet requirements for student aid funds and that St. Mary of the Plains is responsible for $94 million the driving school used until it closed in January 1990.

Parker said negotiations with the department are ongoing.

"We vigorously challenge these assertions and deny any wrongdoing," he said. "We acknowledge making mistakes monitoring the program, but our intentions were always honorable.

"The Department of Education's failure to make a timely decision while we were still able to rectify the situation was critical."

He said the school's student loan default rate was 43.7 percent. If the rate surpasses 35 percent for three years, the institution loses access to federal Title IV student aid funds.

"Without the American Truck Driving School students, our default rate is a very respectable 8.1 percent," Parker said.

He also cited continuing declines in enrollment and said the school couldn't keep operating on a deficit.

Sister Antoinette Yelek, president of the Congregation of the Sisters of St. Joseph, said the decision to close the college was painful.

"Our values of compassion and justice will direct us as we proceed with the closing of the college," she said.

"Another chapter in our history is coming to a close. Let us make it an act of resignation and be prayerfully grateful for all the good that has been a part of the St. Mary of the Plains experience."

Parker said the 40-year-old school had a yearly $20-million effect on the Dodge City area.

He said he met with the faculty a week ago to discuss budget problems and troubles negotiating the student loan default rate with the Education Department, which at one point recommended the school file for bankruptcy.

State budget cuts causing problems for colleges, universities

Increased tuition, course elimination ways schools deal with reduction in funds

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — State colleges and universities, faced with huge budget cuts from recession-wracked states, are raising tuition, giving pink slips to professors and eliminating courses.

Nineteen states have cut allocations for colleges and universities this year, a report by the American Association of State Colleges and Universities shows.

Of the states that didn't report cuts, nine say they expect cuts in the near future.

"Many institutions are choosing to increase tuition, cap enrollment and cut programs, rather than trying to stretch diminishing funds," said association President James Appleberry.

The 370,000 students in the 20-school California State University System — the nation's largest — pay 20 percent more in required state fees that go for special services such as registration and record-keeping.

This compares with a 40-percent increase by the University of California System.

Last fiscal year, the annual fee for full-time California State students was $952, but the amount increased to $1,108 this year, which ends June 30.

Officials propose increasing the fees to $1,480 in fiscal 1992-93.

Students from other countries or states pay tuition in addition to the fees.

The City University of New York System, the nation's third largest with 200,000 students, is faced with a recommended $500 tuition increase per student July 1.

In fall 1990, the tuition was $1,250 a year but was raised to $1,450 a year in spring 1991. This fiscal year, the tuition increased to $1,850 a year, said spokeswoman Rita Rodin.

"If the tuition increase goes through as recommended, our senior college students will be paying 88 percent more for their education in 1992-93 than they did in the fall of 1990," said Rodin, pointing to all the expenses of running the institution.

Rodin said 72,000 CUNY students attend part time, about 40 percent of the total graduate enrollment. The new budget proposes to cut $2.4 million in funds normally allocated to this group.

If the budget proposal becomes a reality, CUNY Chancellor W. Ann Reynolds told a state budget committee, one question left to ask will be "how many will we have to watch get forced out of college and onto streets already ravaged by unemployment, drugs and crime."

Tuition increases in states that sustained mid-year cuts averaged 14.4 percent, said the association report, while the average tuition increase in those states that did not suffer a mid-year budget cut last fiscal year was 6.9 percent.

The association represents more than 375 state colleges and universities and more than 30 systems of higher education nationwide.

The institutions rely on state governments for 60 percent of their operating budget and are susceptible to the conditions of their state economies and finances.

> "We know we are inflicting a lot of what we call stealth damage. The country as a whole is going to pay for its short-term expediency in terms of its ability to compete on global society."
> George Johnson

Suffering mid-year cuts so far have been Connecticut, Maine, New Hampshire, Maryland, New York, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, Alabama, Kentucky, Mississippi, Wisconsin, Kansas, Missouri, Colorado, Idaho, Montana and Nevada.

"Tuition continues to increase because of budget shortfalls, while state and federal student financial assistance fails to keep pace," Appleberry said.

"If we're not careful, through policy default, the face of public higher education will be altered radically, and any of the positive movements toward renewal and reform will be lost."

George Mason University President George Johnson agreed.

"We have all suffered, and we are all very much worried about what we are doing to our common future," he said.

"We know we are inflicting a lot of what we call stealth damage. The country as a whole is going to pay for its short-term expediency in terms of its ability to compete on global society."

Johnson said George Mason experienced enormous cuts amounting to 20 percent of Virginia's general fund appropriation.

"We have saved our faculty and our classrooms and have protected the integrity of instruction," Johnson said.

However, he said 150 positions were cut in support services so "registration is a mess, bills don't come out accurately and checks aren't punched correctly."

Jerry Keating, a spokesman for California State in Fullerton, said a $16-million budget reduction this year resulted in 200 fewer class sections in the fall and a projected 150 decrease in class sections in the spring.

Keating said hundreds of part-time faculty have been cut.

In addition, class sizes have increased. Although courses are now offered on Saturdays and early weekday mornings, there is a limit on the number of courses a student may take.

"Students are having more difficulty getting through their degree program at the rate they want to," Keating said.

McGowan provides help to students

RENEE NOSS
Collegian

Reggie McGowan, director of Upward Bound, is working to give students a chance to broaden their horizons and improve their skills.

Many underprivileged and first-generation college-bound students who are still in high school are receiving academic assistance and personal encouragement from Upward Bound.

Upward Bound is a federally funded program that serves 72 students at Junction City, Riley County, Rockcreek and Manhattan high schools.

McGowan said the program provides academic assistance as well as social and cultural activities to the students.

"One intent of the program is to teach the social aspect of life that the kids aren't normally exposed to, but it is by far an intense academic program," McGowan said.

On Wednesday afternoons, faculty and volunteers go to the high schools and lead academic resource sessions.

These sessions allow students to bring in homework or personal concerns and get individual help with any problems.

Upward Bound also gives students a chance to see McCain and Ebony Theatre productions and athletic events.

"These activities provide alternatives to some of the other, less productive activities we know they could be participating in," McGowan said.

Upward Bound has also provided career days for the students.

Area businessmen and campus departments give students career options and help them target their specific interests.

McGowan said another purpose of the program is to motivate interest in post-secondary education.

He said the students are committed to the program, but not all will choose to attend college.

"I've never been flat out disappointed with the choice a student was making," he said. "Everyone is motivated to do something.

"Some opt for the military instead of college, and that is fine, as long as they're not on the streets and not on drugs. That's what's important to me."

In addition, a special summer program allows high-school seniors to earn six hours of college credit and get a college experience while maintaining emotional and educational support from Upward Bound.

McGowan said the program is a positive link between high school and the student's first semester at college.

Help doesn't stop once students leave Upward Bound, he said, but now it's available from Educational Supportive Services.

In addition to encouraging students academically, McGowan said, he also has some of his own personal goals.

"In the United States, we are at a critical point technologically. I would like to help colored students realize their potential in the fields of science and technology."

100-year-old comedy pioneer receives Golden Camera award

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BERLIN — Hollywood's 100-year-old comedy pioneer, Hal Roach, toured vintage German film studios Monday and then was too tired to attend a ceremony honoring his career, a spokesman said.

The producer-director was honored with a Golden Camera award from the Berlin International Film Festival, which calls him "the comedy tycoon" for his beloved Laurel and Hardy films, the Our Gang series and other classics.

A film festival spokesman said Roach decided to bow out of the Monday night ceremony after a trip to Potsdam outside Berlin to visit the Babelsberg studios, where movie-making started two years before Roach began his film career in 1914.

"He was just too tired. He's 100, you know," said the spokesman, who did not permit use of his name.

It was not immediately known whether the ceremony would be rescheduled.

LEGISLATURE

DUI may start at .08 percent

GREGORY A. BRANSON/Collegian

Senate proposes bill to lower blood-alcohol level

LISA TINNIN
Collegian

Combining drinking and driving has always been a risk, but if the proposed bill to lower the legal blood-alcohol level is passed, that glass of wine with dinner may be enough to tip the test.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has proposed a bill that would lower the current blood-alcohol level required for a person to be found guilty of drunken driving from .10 percent to .08 percent.

Sergeant Adam Angst of the Riley County Police Department said it is impossible to ascertain how many drinks will be the difference between a .08 and .10 percent blood alcohol.

"Each person's body chemistry is different. The number of drinks varies," he said. "It has to do with body weight, how much food is in your system or how much alcohol is in the drink."

Angst said he is certain, however, the number of DUIs would increase.

"If the bill passes, it will give police departments a greater leverage against drunken drivers," he said. "There would be more people out there who would be considered driving under the influence than there are now."

The committee has not voted on House bill 2353 yet, but a decision is expected this week. If the bill passes, it will go to the full Senate.

Sen. Wint Winter, R-Lawrence, said he strongly supports the bill and thinks the Senate will most likely pass it.

"There is some opposition to the bill, but I am very comfortable it will pass," he said. "There may be a confrontation with the House, and if they continue to refuse to pass it, we will have to convince them of the wisdom of our ways.

"Generally the goal is to reduce drinking and driving," Winter said. "The message we are trying to get across is that drinking and driving is simply not tolerated."

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said she would like to have seen the bill killed in committee because it is not the most pressing issue this year.

"One of the lobbying groups indicated there were a number of people that fit in the category .08-.10 who were stopped and not found to be driving under the influence," she said. "Many people want the drinking and driving laws to be stricter."

But Oleen said she and other opponents of the bill agree the current level of .10 percent is a reasonable level. And if Congress is still sending the message to lower the percentage a year from now, there would be plenty of time to address it.

"When it comes out of a committee, many people will be hard pressed to not lower the alcohol content because it sends signals that you are condoning drinking and driving if you vote against it," she said.

HOUSING

Unsafe conditions force KSU students to vacate apartment

Only minor things wrong, landlord says

VICKY SAENZ
Collegian

Choosing a living arrangement in Manhattan can be risky business.

Two K-State students who recently had to move out of their apartment at 930 Laramie St. because it violated city codes will attest to that.

"I came here in August, and that was too late to find a good apartment. Lisa and I needed an apartment close to campus. I called for a week straight and I couldn't find anything," said Christy Honas, freshman in political science.

"Finally I saw an ad in the newspaper. I called the person, and I kind-of looked at it. I was just so desperate to find a place I didn't notice how awful the place looked."

M.S. Master, landlord of the property, allegedly had a verbal agreement before signing the lease that certain things would be fixed, said Lisa Meis, senior in chemical engineering and Honas' roommate.

"I first saw the apartment on Labor Day weekend, and I was totally upset. It was extremely unsafe, especially for girls to be living there," said Lisa Meis' mother, Jane Meis.

Some of the students' complaints about the house included improperly installed outlets with no coverplates, a hole in the porch, which was fixed by merely covering it with a piece of board, moldy, cracked bathroom walls and windows that would not shut.

Lisa Meis said kitchen windows were repaired, but not the one in Honas' bedroom.

"The thing is, when they would repair something, they'd make an incredible mess in doing it. And it was done so cheaply," Lisa Meis said.

Master said the apartment was checked from time to time and that it was in good shape with the exception of minor things that were not dangerous. He also said the tenants would not let the maintenance men into the apartment to get the repairs done.

Lisa Meis and Honas said they did not think anything would ever get fixed properly, so they decided to take stronger actions. They contacted the Manhattan Code Inspection Department.

Brad Claussen, code inspection officer, said he first went to check the apartment Sept. 4.

"There was a fairly lengthy list of wrong things. I certainly did not approve the conditions of the apartment," he said.

Master said the inspector said certain things had to be done, but since one of the maintenance men disappeared, he could not finish the repairs on time.

Lisa Meis said she and her roommate were told things would start happening within 30 days.

"It doesn't necessarily happen that way because landlords can get extensions to get the work done," she said.

The basement of the house presented another problem, Honas said. Officially, the basement is declared inhabitable for several reasons.

"The basement is not supposed to be occupied due to an inspection several years ago, and we've never gotten information that it has been repaired," Claussen said.

But Honas and Lisa Meis said they are sure there were people living there.

"Mr. Master tried to make it as if the basement apartment never existed. We know that there are people living in the basement," Honas said.

Lisa Meis said she agreed.

"Once we had to call the police because the men were making so much noise downstairs. We could hear everything perfectly well," she said.

Master, however, said the maintenance men use the basement as a workshop.

MANHATTAN HIGH SCHOOL

Center to help students control drinking

KSU students, Aggieville contribute to underage drinking, Reese says

TRISHA PERRIGO
Collegian

You could buy 325 pizzas, go to 246 concerts, pay for one year of college, purchase 400 albums or tapes, or play 12,800 arcade video games for $3,200.

Or you could pay $3,200 in attorney fees and increased auto insurance.

According to the Northeast Kansas Regional Prevention Center, a DUI, after all is said and done, can cost a student $3,200.

This illustration is one of the ways Manhattan High School's Alcohol Prevention Center tries to help students control their drinking.

Mary Beth Reese, drug and alcohol prevention coordinator, said Manhattan High created the Alcohol Prevention Center because the pressure of dealing with drugs and alcohol both in the home and in school is often too much to cope with.

"In 1980, the program was developed. This was before it was even politically popular and before all the 'no drugs' campaigns were started," she said.

Reese said K-State students and Aggieville activity could contribute to the underaged drinking problem at Manhattan High.

"I think K-State influences them. So many underaged kids want to hang out there," she said.

One Manhattan High student said a lot of his peers hang out in Aggieville.

"Some college students in Aggieville — they're really drunk — and you ask them to buy alcohol for you, and they will," he said.

If caught, the Manhattan High student and the one who purveyed the alcohol must visit the Alcohol Prevention Center.

"They have to come visit me," Reese said. "We find out if there is a problem or not. Usually at this age, you don't know if they're addicted."

Reese also said many habits are formed in the home. But she said kids are doing pretty well, despite some of their role models.

"More often, I deal with a friend or a parent who will come to me with someone they feel has a problem," she said.

COLLEGIAN OPINION

THE FREE PRESS

"The liberty of the press consists in the right to publish with impunity truth with good motives, for justifiable ends. To disallow it is fatal."

—Alexander Hamilton

EDITORIALS

Journalists should not betray sources

Various big brother-type law agencies have spent the last couple weeks looking for the person or persons who leaked the information that Clarence Thomas had harassed Anita Hill to National Public Radio's Nina Totenberg and New York Newsday's Timothy Phelps.

Various senators, including former Warren Commission lawyer Arlen Specter, R-Penn., have said what an outrage it is that someone leaked the information to the press.

How completely absurd.

The job of a free press is to make sure the American government (remember " ... of the people, by the people and for the people"?) doesn't screw up.

The information that Thomas had harassed Hill is information that should have been made public.

Thomas was appointed to the U.S. Supreme Court for life. The press needed that information — no matter how raw, no matter how titillating — to show to the American people so they could tell their government how things are.

It can be argued the press took the whole Hill-Thomas thing and squeezed every little ratings point out of it. And the media paid too much attention to the sex aspect and not enough to whether or not Thomas was actually qualified to be a Supreme Court justice.

The travesty is that the American government is persecuting its press for doing its job, i.e. looking very critically at the government.

Reporters should not be asked to reveal their sources. A reporter who gets a story from a source he guarantees anonymity should not have to tell the government who it was that told that story.

As with a doctor, a lawyer or a priest, it is the moral obligation of the reporter to honor that promise of confidentiality.

Twenty-six states have what is called a shield law to keep reporters safe from governmental persecution.

The problem therein is that no federal shield law is in place. Reporters are not guaranteed safety from the federal government.

Totenberg and Phelps should not be forced to betray their source(s), and the government should not even be worrying about this "leak."

It's something you would expect from empires of such notoriety as, say, Nazi Germany or the old Soviet Union, but not from the Land of the Free.

MASCULINE UNTIL PROVEN INNOCENT

"I'm glad that Tyson is going to get thrown in jail," my female friend asserted as she sifted through her mixed vegetables looking for carrots.

"He deserves to get at least life, without parole. There's no excuse for rape — especially since he tried to get off by admitting that he was openly a lewd bastard.

"Just because he made it clear that all he wanted was sex, she should've known not to go up to his room, and had it all coming? What kind of defense is that?"

"A lame one," I responded through a bite of 10:30 a.m. loaf. And it was. "She-was-asking-for-it" defenses should be as passe as slavery by now.

Miss Black America probably wasn't scoring high on IQ tests when she went back with Tyson to his hotel room, but that doesn't give him, or any man for that matter, however hulking, the right to interpret "NO!" any differently than it's normally intended.

He probably would have done better if he tried to prove that he was deaf. It would make about as much sense, probably more.

"And to think," she continued, "he also claimed that her vaginal abrasions were due to his extra-large manhood. Right. If you ask me, he's just one big penis with an ego about the size of his neck. I bet he barely has any length at all."

"Well, Tyson is a big man," I thought out loud. "Still, you're right. That's a lousy claim. You can't tell me she was enjoying that sex."

"I wouldn't," she added flatly and took a drink of water.

I took this opportunity to quietly finish my mashed potatoes.

"But what really bites me," she said, pushing her purple tray away from her and settling back in her chair, "is that William Kennedy Smith got off. He should've got nailed like Tyson, if you ask me."

"Why?"

"Because he raped a girl."

"What makes you think that? A jury found him clean. Do you know something they don't?"

Granted, I don't have complete faith in our judicial system, but I was curious to know what her reasons were for doubting the court's decision in this case.

"Well, I know he's a Kennedy. I bet he did it. He probably bought the whole trial."

"He's a Kennedy by middle name. Before all of this, his was Bill Smith."

"Yeah," she rejoined, "Bill Smith itching to prove how much of a manly Kennedy he could be.

"Look at Teddy. As a woman, there's about as much of a chance of me wanting to go near him as me wanting to ride shotgun with him over bridges. Those chances are really fat, like Teddy himself. JFK, too. He wasn't that fat, but he was pretty handsy."

"You left out Bobby."

Oh, I see. Men, in general, can't keep it in their pants.

ROBLIN MEEKS

"Oh, yeah," she said. "I'm sure he did something."

"I think he had an affair with Bill Clinton during the Vietnam War."

"Cut it out, I'm serious." She wasn't amused. I thought it was kind of funny, though.

"Don't get me started on Clinton," she said.

"What's wrong with him?" I asked. "He's not a Kennedy."

"No, but he is an adulterer," she said with renewed vigor. "I don't really care about the war stuff. I sure wouldn't have wanted to go either. But he did screw over his wife for 12 years. That's three presidential terms. There's not a chance in hell that I'd vote for him."

"So because he's a bad husband, he's a bad politician. Is that how it goes?"

"If he can't be faithful to his own wife, how can he be faithful to 260 million people?"

I thought she might say that. I don't think there's a really good comeback to that one, so I just shrugged my shoulders and nodded. I started to fidget.

"And then there's always Clarence Thomas. If more women would've been on the Senate panel, like there should be anyway, he'd be on the witness stand right now and not on the bench."

That was a clever way of putting things.

"So Anita Hill told the truth, and Thomas was a liar."

"Boldfaced."

"You're sure." I wanted to hear this one.

"Positive," she said.

Her nostrils flared.

"Why would she want to lie?" she said. "She had everything to lose. Besides, he's a man."

"Because he's a man?" I asked. I didn't think I heard her right. I was hoping I didn't.

"Yeah, because he's a man. A little testosterone tank."

That comment made me hot.

"Oh, I see. Men, in general, can't keep it in their pants," I said. "In fact, the only reason I'm probably not jumping you right now is that I left my penis at home by mistake — "

"Come on," she interrupted, "you know you're not like that. You're not — "

"A man?"

"Well, yeah. Not a man in the traditional sense. That's what I mean. I know you."

"But you've just crucified Clinton, William Kennedy Smith, JFK, Bobby Kennedy and Thomas on what you know of them, which is diddley."

"What I'm saying," she said with a slow deliberateness, "is that they had to prove their manhood, like most men."

"Look, I'm tired of women jumping on the empowerment bandwagon and all over men," I said. "Unfortunately, a few hormone bags out there can't control themselves, and they've done their best to make the rest of us look bad. But don't you start indicting every guy you don't know."

Our lunch ended after that.

EVE OF DESTRUCTION

When I was little, I wanted to be a hooker. Not an ordinary, low-class street walker, but a high-class, high-priced call girl. It wasn't because I knew anyone in this line of work; I had never seen a prostitute in real life, as far as I knew.

I got a little older, and my goal changed. Robbery would be my thing. I'd be dressed as one of the upper-upper-class patrons of a lavish affair, and when I gave the signal, my professional posse of larcenists and I would take all of their jewels and other precious possessions from them. But I vowed to never take from the less fortunate.

To add a little spice to my life and show how truly bad I was at the same time, I thought I'd have to be a murderess. A hit-woman, preferably. I'd work for "the mob" knocking off whoever was on the Don's list. No one would ever catch me because of my cover; I'd be the most beautiful, sexy and intelligent woman in the room — until I killed everyone. I would be the mob's "Eve of Destruction."

Then, Daddy turned off the television.

I wouldn't be able to watch those "great" shows of the late 1970s and early 1980s, and that was good. My father saw me becoming engrossed in the false reality television was leading me into. He knew it was time for me to leave "Good Times" alone, because I didn't need to think that was what my life would be like.

I wouldn't be able to fly to "Fantasy Island" for a weekend getaway. And I'd better keep my ass away from anywhere "Policewoman" or "Starsky and Hutch" could be found, because "Wonder Woman" would not come to my rescue.

By now, you probably get my point that television (and movies) were influential factors in my younger life.

But don't count me as the exception. Count me as the rule.

Kids today get a lot of impressions from television and movies. You can see that just by observing a child after he or she has watched "Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles." That kid'll hop around the house karate chopping anything and everything. After they see "Milo and Otis," they may not pull the cat's tail as much or whistle in the dog's ears as often.

Those two examples were not both bad. That's because not all the things kids pick up are bad. But many are.

The hardest hitters I see as a childless college student are guns. They're a regular part of children's viewing diets. Many times they are used for laughs, especially in cartoons.

But tell me how funny it is when a child shoots another child while playing with a loaded gun. Is it funny when grade-schoolers have to go through metal detectors at school to make sure they are unarmed? I don't think so, and I don't even have any kids.

Children also learn a variety of things about sex from television and movies.

Judging from the lowering ages of first-time sex for boys and girls, I think they're using them, too. I had thought that perhaps the influences of shows like "Beverly Hills 90210" and "Blossom" on their largest viewing audience (teen-age girls) would be visibly positive. The animal-print bikini underwear my 14-year-old brother received from two girls of the same age and the numerous advances he's told me about blew that theory. The message that sex is "the coolest" and makes you an adult is still being conveyed.

Gangs and violence are all too often romanticized. To me, the movie "Colors" is a good example.

EVE WILSON

"Boyz 'N' the Hood," however, shows what usually happens when you get involved with gangs (or even some "posses") — you die. But that part of it is escaping most youngsters who watch stories about gangs.

For an example of this, go to my old grade school, the same school my younger brother now attends. In the past few months, school administration has had to ban wearing scarves of certain colors on school property, and the school has added security guards to its staff. And don't think the new prospective members are all poor black boys and girls; they're middle-class and white.

It's been suggested that parents watch television with their children. Problem is, some parents sit around and watch movies like "Rambo" or shows like "L.A. Law" with them. That defeats the purpose.

Watch the Discover channel, or, God forbid, PBS. Or read a book and tick off all the producers and programmers trying to insult your intelligence.

But whatever you do, be choosy about what you and your family (if you have one) watch. You all might learn something; you may even be left with a good impression.

LANDON LECTURE SERIES

GREGORY A. BRANSON/Collegian

Coordinating speakers, dates difficult; 2-week lead time needed

LISA TINNIN
Collegian

There will probably be two Landon Lectures this semester, but who will deliver them is a mystery to the public.

Chuck Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lecture Series, said as of now, there are no confirmed dates for speakers.

"We have acceptances, but no confirmed dates for this spring," he said.

The Landon Lecture Series focuses on public issues and began in December 1966 honoring former Kansas Gov. Alfred Landon.

Reagan said he gets many phone calls from patrons asking when the next lecture is.

"We just don't know at this time," he said. "It is the stressful part of the job, but I just have to learn to live with it."

Reagan said one problem is that the caliber of speakers the series attracts are very busy people.

"These people are under enormous pressure to do all kinds of things. Most will not accept unless they can fulfill it. So they do not want to accept very early," Reagan said.

An invitation is sent to a desired speaker, and if they accept, Reagan calls their appointment secretary. The secretary provides possible dates the speaker could come to K-State. Reagan, in turn, sends in dates that the auditorium is free.

"That is a real problem," Reagan said. "There may only be three or four dates that the auditorium is open that month."

Reagan said the goal is to have four lectures a year, or two a semester.

"But the world's not perfect. Sometimes it is more and sometimes less," he said.

When scheduling lectures, Reagan said a two-week lead time is necessary.

"Our main consideration is having McCain and Bramlage open," he said.

Allan Bailey, McCain Auditorium technical director, said there is no problem in getting things set up for a last-minute acceptance.

"The only problem is having the date open," he said. "McCain is a busy place. "There may be a performance in the evening, but we can fit the lecture in during the morning."

Bailey said he and his crew will do anything they can to make the lecture possible.

"If it means putting on a Landon Lecture and other work is not going to get done, and we have to come back and work nights or weekends, that's cool," he said.

Bailey said setting up for a lecture is relatively easy.

"It takes some effort and labor, but nothing beyond our capabilities. I have an experienced crew. They know what to do when you say Landon Lecture," he said.

To prepare for a Landon Lecture, Bailey said he follows a checklist.

"Nothing is too difficult about it. We set up the podium, the Landon Lecture sign, flags, lights and anything else the speaker may need, like a chalkboard," he said.

In extreme cases, with politically sensitive speakers or anyone that requires protection, McCain is set up very well in terms of security, Bailey said.

Often with a presidential candidate, the secret service will come in the day before, he said. The morning of the lecture, dogs and security are brought in.

"They go to the farthest reaches of the auditorium and work their way down, sealing doors and posting guards, to make sure everything is just fine," he said.

Bailey said one lecture that sticks out in his mind that could have been a potential problem was delivered by the former Saudi Arabian Oil Minister, Sheikh Ahmed Zaki Yamani.

"There was almost a riot and they had to clear the building," he said. "It was not so much of a problem. Rather the speech was delayed because of the crowd," Bailey said.

In March 1983, Yamani gave a Landon Lecture to about 1,700 discussing the control and deregulation in the oil market.

According to the March 29 issue of the Collegian, minutes after the lecture began, hecklers disrupted his speech and the auditorium was ordered evacuated.

Along with the hecklers, five bomb threats were called in to the Riley County Police Department at about the same time.

After being delayed 80 minutes, K-State personnel screened and readmitted students, faculty, lecture patrons and journalists with identification.

Yamani then continued his speech.

Apparel design students to show designs

BETSY BERKLEY
Collegian

Award-winning designs will be shown by apparel design students at 7 tonight in Union Station.

The featured designs are originals and patterns made by students.

Christie Endsley, junior in apparel design, said there are 50-60 garments that will be modeled by experienced models, students and some employees of Crum's Beauty College.

"We've got some fun stuff," Endsley said. "It will be exciting to see what everyone has made."

Most of the garments are women's clothing.

Some students, however, have worked with men and children.

Janice Huck, assistant professor in clothing, textiles and interior design, said the garments were produced for class projects, and some of them were produced outside of class for fun.

Huck said Crum's has played a key role in preparation for the event.

Arkansas takes 2 of 3 from Cats in season opener

Offense scores 27 runs; pitching yields 30 walks during weekend road stand

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

If only for a little pitching.

That was Coach Mike Clark's refrain Sunday, after watching his team score 27 runs in three games against nationally ranked Arkansas this weekend, only to win one of the contests.

K-State opened its 1992 season in Fayetteville, Ark., Saturday by splitting a high-scoring doubleheader.

The team then failed to take advantage of a seven-run first inning Sunday in dropping a 19-9 decision.

So while hammering out 35 hits and scoring virtually at will against the Razorbacks, the Cats returned home with a single win.

Ouch.

"I liked our offense," Clark said after Sunday's series finale.

"Nine runs should be enough to win a ballgame. If we get our starting pitching worked out, we'll have a real nice ballclub."

Oh, that pitching.

In the three weekend games, K-State hurlers allowed 45 runs and 30 walks, with no starter going more than four-plus innings.

Even sizzling bats, like that swung all weekend by Wildcat leftfielder Brian Culp, weren't enough to overcome the team's pitching woes.

In Sunday's finale, Culp had three hits and a pair of runs batted in, courtesy of a two-run homer in the seven-run first inning. He finished the series with seven hits and seven RBIs.

After K-State's early uprising, Arkansas countered with five runs of its own in the bottom of the frame.

The Razorbacks were the willing beneficiaries of five walks from Wildcat starter Tim Churchman, who faced but eight batters before giving way to Pat Ralston, 0-1, who allowed nine runs in five and two-thirds innings of work.

Arkansas took the lead in the fourth, scoring four times on three hits and three K-State errors.

The inning was not without controversy, as Razorback Steve Taft was ruled safe at the plate on an interference call on Cats third baseman Scott McFall.

Culp's throw beat Taft, but the reversal opened the flood gates.

The Hogs put it out of reach when they scored four in the fifth — including back-to-back homers by Tim Thomas and Scott Epps off Ralston — and five more in the eighth off Greg Laddish.

K-State scored a pair in the eighth on four singles, but any chance for an extended threat died when Jeff Ryan flied out to left with the bases loaded.

In Saturday's doubleheader split, Culp got some offensive help from an expected ally.

Culp and shortstop Craig Wilson pounded out seven hits and drove in nine as K-State won the first game 18-13 and was blanked in the nightcap 13-0.

In the series opener, the Wildcats fell behind early as Arkansas scored six runs in the first off starter Dan Driskill.

K-State inched back with a five-run second capped by a three-run homer by Culp. The left fielder finished the game with three hits and five RBIs.

K-State broke it open in the sixth, scoring six times, with Wilson's two-run homer as the big blow. He finished the contest with four hits and four RBIs.

"Offensively, we took control of the first game and did a great job of creating offense from every position in the order," Clark said.

"Their pitchers made a couple of mistakes, and we jumped all over them."

Junior transfer Kevin Sander picked up the win in game one, coming on in relief of Driskill. Junior Brett Bock worked the final two and two-thirds to pick up his first save.

In game two Saturday, Arkansas scored early and often in blanking the Cats.

Sophomore Scott Brocail went the seven-inning route to shut out K-State on just two hits.

Brocail was the beneficiary of a 12-hit attack, which got underway with two runs in the first and three in the second off K-State starter and loser Brian Hierholzer, 0-1.

Epps was right in the middle of things again offensively for the Hogs, this time hitting the front end of a back-to-back homer string. His second-inning shot was followed by one by Carl Stall.

Overall, Clark was left scratching his head all weekend because of his team's ineffectiveness on the mound.

"Our pitching was horrible," he said.

"Brett Bock did a nice job of throwing strikes, but other than that, I don't have anything good to say about our other pitchers.

"Our starting pitchers have a long way to go."

K-State will start its throwers along that route with a doubleheader at 1 p.m. Sunday against Fort Hays State at Frank Myers Field.

SPORTS DIGEST

CATS FOOTBALL: Timmons inks with Cats

K-State football coach Bill Snyder announced Monday that Andrew Timmons, a 6-3, 248-pound all-state linebacker from Brooksville, Fla., has signed a national letter of intent to play for the Wildcats.

Timmons was a first-team Florida all-state selection at Hernando High School and earned all-conference, all-North Suncoast and all-Tampa Bay area honors during his senior season. He signed with K-State after visiting with Miami, Florida State, Florida and Maryland.

The signing brings to 21 the number of recruits Snyder has signed.

After announcing the initial 20 two weeks ago, Snyder said K-State was holding two more scholarships for players still involved in the recruiting process and one additional scholarship for a deserving walk-on.

Snyder's daughter injured in auto accident

Merideth Snyder, daughter of K-State football coach Bill Snyder, was involved in a major-damage, major-injury auto accident in the Dallas metro area Monday.

At press time, Merideth Snyder was in intensive care in serious condition at a Dallas hospital.

The extent of her injuries and the details of the accident were not known at press time.

LADY CATS: Team battles Iowa State tonight

The Lady Cats, 5-18 overall and 2-8 in Big Eight play, return to action today in Ames, Iowa, when they take on the Iowa State Cyclones.

When the two teams met in Bramlage Coliseum Jan. 24, K-State emerged with a solid 67-48 win, fueled by Mary Jo Miller's 18 points.

That win proved to be the last win for the Lady Cats, who have gone on to lose their last six ball games, most recently an 89-56 defeat by Missouri.

After Iowa State, the Lady Cats will hope to even the season's Sunflower series Saturday when they battle Kansas at Allen Fieldhouse.

BASEBALL: Royals sign Montgomery to pact

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — Relief pitcher Jeff Montgomery avoided arbitration and signed a one-year deal with the Kansas City Royals for $2.41 million on Monday.

Montgomery, 30, was 4-4 with a 2.90 earned run average and a career-high 33 saves last year. By signing Monday, he became the 10th and final Royal to avoid salary arbitration by agreeing to terms prior to the hearing date.

Montgomery was paid $1,085,000 last season and had asked for $2.8 million and been offered $1.8 million. His arbitration hearing was scheduled for Wednesday.

The Royals are due to open spring training camp next week in Baseball City, Fla.

BIG EIGHT ATHLETICS

Was the end near?

TV revenue plan nearly prompted Oklahoma to leave

PATRICK OBLEY
Collegian

In major college athletics, television, not the best team, dictates a large portion of a school's football or men's basketball schedule.

The reason for this is simple — money.

Richards

Athletic conferences and football bowl alliances have become the vehicle for television's role in big college sports.

Through various agreements, a conference's member schools or a bowl's participant conferences receive TV revenue.

Once the conference has the money, it is up to its members to decide how the money is split. The scenario is no different for the Big Eight.

But when the College Football Association struck a huge agreement with network television in 1990, a chain of events was set in motion — a chain that rattled its links through every college athletic department and every conference commissioner's head.

Television, through the agreement, now had a stranglehold on virtually every NCAA Division I school's revenue.

Since television chooses its games by the number of households that might be watching, the better known schools, not necessarily the best, began to receive a larger share of the revenue pie.

Oklahoma was the most visible Big Eight school involved in that upper echelon. But due to what seemed to be an archaic revenue sharing program, Sooner officials didn't said they feel Oklahoma was getting a fair shake from the Big Eight.

At the time, the revenue sharing program called a nearly equal split of TV revenue from a given school's appearance.

For example, if Oklahoma football received $250,000 for a national TV appearance, that money would be divided into nine equal parts. Two-ninths would go to Oklahoma for making the appearance, and the remaining seven-ninths would go to the other seven members.

Most conferences allow the appearing school to keep a larger percentage.

According to K-State's Jack Key, associate athletic director of finances, who was with Oklahoma's athletic department when the CFA deal was struck, Oklahoma was fielding offers from other conferences out of disgust for the Big Eight's revenue sharing formula.

"Oklahoma felt like it needed a better shake," Keys said.

"From their standpoint, they were loosing money that was rightfully theirs.

"From a conference standpoint, that revenue sharing system benefited schools like K-State and Iowa State, but it was the worst possible solution for Oklahoma from a revenue standpoint."

The most notable conference on Oklahoma's doorstep was the Southwestern conference, which at the time was on the verge of losing Arkansas to the Southeastern conference.

"The Big Eight system was not as good as the others," Keys said.

"And when Texas and Texas A&M began to talk of leaving the SWC along with Arkansas, Southwestern officials began looking for replacements, and Oklahoma was right up there on their list."

Sensing the malcontent in Norman, Okla., athletic directors from the Big Eight schools got together to revise the revenue system.

According to K-State Athletic Director Milt Richards, the first vote on the revised program failed.

"The vote was 'no' and Oklahoma said, 'We're outta here,'" Richards said.

"It became very apparent that Oklahoma was serious about leaving the Big Eight, so another plan was worked out, and it passed."

The new system calls for an appearing school to receive 40 percent of the network money for its appearance, with the remaining money to be divided among the other conference members this year.

Next year, the participating school's percentage will increase to 60 percent with the number increasing to a semi-permanent 80 percent during the 1993-94 year.

"From a conference standpoint, that revenue sharing system benefitted schools like K-State and Iowa State, but it was the worst possible solution for Oklahoma."

— Jack Key, a former financial official at Oklahoma

"It became very apparent that Oklahoma was serious about leaving the Big Eight, so another plan was worked out, and it passed."

— Milt Richards, K-State Athletic Director

No one involved in K-State athletics has said he is afraid to call the deal a concession to Oklahoma.

"The Big Eight definitely made concessions to keep Oklahoma in the conference," Richards said.

"I think that solution satisfied Oklahoma's grumblings for now."

"By making these compromises with Oklahoma, I think the Big Eight has been solidified for at least the next two to four years," Key said.

"In fact, I think we might see the conference becoming stronger because of this."

K-State President Jon Wefald, who played a part in convincing other university CEOs to accept the revenue proposal to preserve the conference, agreed.

"The new proposal was made mainly because everyone thought Oklahoma was serious about leaving the Big Eight," Wefald said.

"They had some adjustments they wanted made, and I think we all felt that in order to keep Oklahoma home, we needed to make some modest compromises."

If Oklahoma had bolted, Wefald said the future of the Big Eight and K-State athletics would have been in serious jeopardy.

"If the Big Eight disbanded, Oklahoma and Nebraska would have no trouble joining another league, but for schools like K-State, Iowa State or even KU, the conference alliance is vital."

"The integrity of the Big Eight was preserved at that meeting," Richards said.

"For the smaller schools like K-State, the impact of the Big Eight losing that integrity would have been devastating to our programs, especially the Olympic sports, since they wouldn't be funded without football and men's basketball revenue."

"We will lose about $40,000 from that deal this year," Keys said.

"But that money would be made up by a national television appearance in the next three years."

Wefald said monetary concession was a small price to pay.

"The money that would be lost would be neutralized with one appearance," he said.

"I would gladly face that loss rather than the loss of the Big Eight conference, which very well might have happened if Oklahoma had left."

Sweden snaps Team USA's hockey win streak with 3-3 tie

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MERIBEL, France — Nothing like the Olympics to foster good sportsmanship.

Just 2:04 into the U.S. hockey team's 3-3 tie with Sweden on Monday night, former NHL gentleman of the year Mats Naslund bloodied the face of U.S. defenseman Greg Brown by checking him from behind into the boards.

The bad will continued 2 1/2 hours later, as U.S. coach Dave Peterson refused to shake hands with Swedish assistant coach Curt Lundmark at the post-game news conference.

The incidents took away from an exciting game that included 45 saves by U.S. goalie Ray LeBlanc and a tying goal by Sweden's Mikael Johansson with 21 seconds to go.

Despite blowing a 3-0 third-period lead, the United States won its group and earned the right to play France in a Tuesday quarterfinal. The 4-0-1 start mirrors the record that the Miracle on Ice club brought into the 1980 medal round.

The only blemish in 1980 was also a tie with Sweden.

Lundmark, who said Peterson also swore at Swedish coaches and players between periods, said he didn't have anything against the U.S. players.

"It's against Peterson. I think he is not a proud member of the coaches," he said. "After a game, you have to shake hands. Such things that happened in this game have happened before. But after the game, you have to shake hands and be friends.

"This isn't war, guys, this isn't war. But almost."

It sure seemed like an enemy attack when Naslund took a running start and a flying leap at Brown behind and to the left of the U.S. goal. Brown suffered a concussion, a broken nose and an inch and a half cut that needed 12 stitches. Naslund was assessed a major charging penalty and was ejected by referee Seppo Makela.

"You better take a look at the replay to see what a dirty shot it was," U.S. general manager Larry Johnson said. "We're going to show the tape to the IIHF (International Ice Hockey Federation) and we'd like to see him get thrown out of the tournament."

Naslund said he has never tried to hurt another player and said that, if Makela hadn't seen blood, "it would have passed as a good hit."

"I felt like it was a very good hit at the moment. He cleared the puck and I just followed through with a hit, like North American-style or whatever you want to call it."

Sweden (3-0-2), which meets Czechoslovakia in a Wednesday quarterfinal, was determined to play North American hockey. Less than two weeks ago, the Swedes lost 3-2 to the U.S. team in a pre-Olympic game that has become known as "the Shame in Chamonix."

"In Chamonix, we thought it would be an exhibition game ... but the U.S. team didn't want to have it that way. It was very rough," Lundmark said. "But tonight we wanted to win. We told our players to stay up and play closer to them.

"We have to play them the way they play us. We can't go away from them."

For all their North American play, the Swedes couldn't solve the American goalie for more than 46 minutes.

LeBlanc stopped breakaways and point-blank barrages and was instrumental in maintaining a U.S. lead built on goals by Clark Donatelli, Ted Donato and Marty McInnis.

LeBlanc has played every minute of the tournament and has allowed only seven goals. He had a scoreless string of 136 minutes, 39 seconds snapped by Tommy Sjodin at 6:21 of the third period. It was the first third-period goal he had allowed in the Olympics.

Hakan Loob made it 3-2 with a power-play goal at 13:25.

Program gives work experience to disabled

Gardening skills enhance life of handicapped

ROB DE CORTIE
Collegian

The Horticultural Therapy Program has provided work experience for disabled adults from Big Lakes Developmental Center Inc. for two years.

Paul Mattson, director of the program, said students from the Department of Horticulture and handicapped clients have established a working relationship since January 1990 that has proved beneficial for both parties.

The program uses simple gardening techniques to enhance the quality of life for individuals with mental or physical handicaps.

It began in 1971 as a cooperative agreement between the C.F. Menninger Clinic in Topeka and the horticulture department.

The agreement involved the development of a multi-disciplinary curriculum that would provide training in the agricultural, horticultural and social behavior sciences.

Mattson said the students come from everywhere in the United States, as well as from Africa, Asia and the Middle East.

"The program is unique, because it primarily involves working with people, using horticulture as a tool to help them," Mattson said.

The mentally retarded or physically disabled clients receive small-group training in basic gardening skills.

The horticulture students gain experience in working with and teaching a special population as part of their training in horticultural therapy.

"There are a variety of clients here," Mattson said. "They work together as a team. They are very productive, do quality work and are dependable.

"They have all the good job skills we like to see in our work force. The only drawback is that they're not fast."

The clients learn skills such as soil mixing, plant pruning and shaping, and seed planting.

Mattson said the clients enjoy working with the students, and the small groups allow for more personal instruction and training.

Mattson said the program is fulfilling all five of Maslov's levels of human need.

"The first level is physiological need. Eating fresh and nutritious vegetables leads to healthy lives," Mattson said.

"The garden is also a place where stress reduction occurs. The garden provides means to which people can relax and feel safe and comfortable.

"And when you grow a plant and take care of it, you accomplish something, you become self-esteemed.

"Finally, it might be OK just to sit in the garden and enjoy it in a passive sense," he said.

"Here's where self-actualization kicks in. You begin seeing your place, your role and your value in this life. And here we are at the fifth level of basic human needs that Maslov describes."

K-State is the only university in the United States that offers a bachelor's and master's degree in horticultural therapy.

Jane Davis, senior in horticultural therapy and psychology, said students in horticultural therapy have the opportunity to apply their classroom learning to the real-life experience of helping individuals with developmental disabilities increase their skill levels by working with plants.

The students also learn hands-on how to make crop and work schedules, and to develop marketing plans for selling the plants the clients and students grow.

Davis has been working with the clients in the K-State Greenhouses for the last three years.

"The program gives students good experience," she said. "You learn, before you get out in the outside world, how to interact with the people and all the different aspects of helping and teaching them.

"I have seen improvements since I have been here. The clients are learning at different levels — you know, like planting, mixing soils and watering. It takes them longer to understand, but they do learn."

Big Lakes sells plants grown at the greenhouses at their monthly plant and craft sales. The horticultural therapy students market the plants and flowers on campus at different times during the school year.

Decorations, bouquets made on campus

Therapists use horticulture, nature to assist in therapy, rehabilitation of people

ROB DE CORTIE

Many of the plant bouquets and decorations on the desks, tables and windowsills in campus offices are made locally.

They are produced in a combined effort by horticultural therapy students and clients from Big Lakes Developmental Center Inc. The Horticultural Therapy Program has been going on for two years in greenhouses A and C.

Starting in January 1990, the program was developed to improve the quality of life for handicapped people through the use of horticultural skills.

According to the program fact sheet, a horticultural therapist is a trained professional who uses horticulture and nature to assist in the therapy and rehabilitation of people.

The students and the disabled clients, accompanied by a horticultural therapist, work together for mutual advantages. Katie Nus, greenhouse work supervisor and horticultural therapist, said the program works for both the students and the clients.

"The students become more experienced in working with people with disabilities and helping them," Nus said.

"On the other hand, the clients assist us in producing a better quality of products."

Each semester, eight people work in the K-State Greenhouses. They work from 9:30 to 11:30 a.m., Monday through Friday.

"Every morning, I pick them up from Big Lakes," Nus said. "First, each of the workers checks his or her assigned plants. They check them for water, for dead leaves, for insects and things like that.

"After that, we start the group activities. There is always a lot of work to do. We try to keep busy and have a good time."

Nus is employed at Big Lakes. She started working in the greenhouse in November.

"Every day, I can see that the clients are learning practical, everyday job skills. They learn problem-solving skills that they can generalize to other types of work," Nus said.

"And you know, these guys are really talented. A lot of times, I learn a lot from them."

"There is not enough space for one person to live there, and it does not have its own vents for heating," Master said.

Honas said after calling the code inspection officer, the problems did not stop.

According to the lease, the tenants had to pay their share of utilities, which included water, garbage and gas. But Honas said Master told her and her roommate not to worry.

"I thought it was because the house was going to possibly be condemned. I figured that probably he was going to pick up that slack for our inconvenience," she said.

But in early January, Honas said Master charged them for their August to December utilities, demanding the payment immediately. Honas said they refused to pay because of the outrageous amount and because it was only divided in two parts instead of three.

Honas and Lisa Meis sought advice from Julia O'Dale, director of Consumer Relations Board at the Student Government Association Office.

"If there are three groups of people, the bills should be adjusted accordingly," O'Dale said. "He should know better. If he saw the Kansas Landlord Act, he should know how things work."

Master refuted the allegations.

"The girls were not paying for the utility bills, and they have a copy of all the bills I charged," he said.

Master said they could not make their own bills, but he would charge them only one-third of the bills in order to please them.

But Honas said Master had sent the tenants a letter warning them that if they did not pay the bills in full, they would be asked to leave the apartment, which would include a proper notice for their eviction. And the letter said they would be taken to court so he could recover the money for the utilities.

Honas and Lisa Meis said they moved out of the apartment after being advised by the City of Manhattan to notify Master in written form of his non-compliance of the rental agreement. They gave him notice that they were vacating and that they had to be reimbursed 30 days after he received this last notice.

Brad Claussen said the main problem with tenants having these kind of problems is that they don't know where to go to look for help.

"We are concerned about the safety and welfare of the people in Manhattan, and that includes the students," he said. "If anyone has any concerns, we want students to contact us."

O'Dale said another problem is the students' lack of knowledge about their services.

"We keep records of complaints about landlords. I want to stress to students to come in with the lease and check it, as well as to check into the reputation of their landlord," she said.

"Basically, I want students to put considerable amount of thought to where they are going to live. It is not something to be taken lightly," he said. "On the contrary, thought and effort should be put into it."

One hundred twenty-nine and counting.

The Kansas State University Historical Society celebrated K-State's 1863 founding Monday night with a banquet and slide show. About 50 people attended the birthday party.

Martha Streeter, president of the historical society, said the birthday is celebrated every year around Feb. 16.

"That was the date the legislature recognized the Kansas State Agricultural College in 1863," Streeter said.

During the banquet, Homer Socolofsky, professor emeritus of history and the society's secretary-treasurer since its 1977 founding, received certificate in recognition of his service.

Don Mrozek, professor of history, announced the founding of the Socolofsky Western History Fund. The fund is to assist faculty researching the history of the American West. The fund was named after Socolofsky in honor of his extensive work in the field, Mrozek said.

The featured presentation was a slide-illustrated discussion by John Vander Velde, curator of the rare book collection in Farrell Library and charter member of the society. Vander Velde discussed the role of the special collections department, which is located on the fifth floor of Farrell. He showed slides of several rare and unique books from the collection.

Vander Velde said the collection has nearly 40,000 volumes, although not all are truly rare.

"Some of the books are there to preserve them from theft or destruction," Vander Velde said. "Playboy, Playgirl and various examples of erotica are kept in Special Collections because the pages would be cut out and the books ruined if kept in the general library."

The slides featured pictures of centuries-old books by John Milton, Thomas Hardy, Samuel Johnson and Dante. The oldest book he showed — a Latin thesaurus of sermons — dates back to 1488.

Speaker motivates students

People need to learn technical, personal skills to prepare for job market

TRISHA PERRIGO
Collegian

The average American actually works five and a half hours in an eight-hour day. However, in Japan a 10-hour workday is actually only five hours of productive work time, said Tony Walker, a 1987 K-State graduate in education.

He spoke to more than 100 students Monday night on self-motivation and interview skills.

Walker started the Norwalk Group, an international training and development service based in Kansas City.

One area of difference between Japan and American workers is technical skills vs. people skills. This is a big problem with American companies, he said. The United States emphasizes people skills while Japan emphasizes technical skills, he said.

"Quality is a technical-skill program," Walker said. "That's where our problem is. We think it's a people skill."

Technical skills will get you a job, but success up the company ladder depends on your people skills, he said.

To develop technical and personal skills, people must learn to alter their pattern of thinking or paradigm.

"Ninety-five percent of the time we are directly or indirectly thinking of ourselves, this is not negative or positive, it's how we relate to others," Walker said.

"When you are in an argument, are you arguing the point or are you to busy looking at your own paradigm, then looking at the other side of the argument, or their paradigm?" Walker said. "You need to learn to shift your paradigm to see the other side.

"We've been trained to think on the negative," he said.

He said that people focus on the 22-percent unemployment rate of the Great Depression, even though that means there were still 78 percent employed.

"Most of the things we do in society is based on a win-lose idea," Walker said. "No win-win, no deal. In win-win, both people benefit from the outcome of the situation."

The outcome of the job search this May can be a win-win situation. Walker refers to it as BET, or behavior example interview.

Grades, leadership, experience and activities need to be related to real behavior examples.

"Leadership doesn't mean you have to be a leader of an organization, but have personal examples and a selling ability," Walker said.

Grades are important, but activities can carry the same amount of weight, he said.

Saturday morning's showtime for kids

English students read children's books in Claflin Bookstore in February, March

VICKY SAENZ
Collegian

As the time got closer, the number of children at the bookstore increased.

The little ones kept running through the stacks, laughing and hiding while their moms tried to calm them down.

The older ones browsed through the pictures of their favorite storybooks in the children's section.

The quiet ones stood by their mothers' sides, asking them all sorts of questions about the stories they were about to hear.

They were impatient.

It was finally 10:30 a.m. The children chose their favorite spot on the rug and sat beside their parents or with the other children.

It was showtime for the little audience.

On Saturday mornings during February and March, K-State students read stories to Manhattan children at Claflin Books and Copies as credit for Children's Reading Story, a class taught by the Department of English.

The is the first semester of the program. The sessions last from 45 minutes to one hour.

"Each story lasts from eight to 10 minutes," said Jan Susina, assistant professor of English.

Susina approves the titles of the books for all students and the dates when they would like to read them.

The manager of the bookstore then makes a list with the name of the book, the name of the reader, and the date and the time the story will be read. The list is posted in the bookstore, and parents can decide when to bring their children.

"One of the managers of the bookstore really likes children. We had talked about it for two years, but it was not until this semester that it was actually done," Susina said.

"This kind of activity gives us a good experience in storytelling, and it is an enjoyable experience for the kids," said Cathy Dedonder, senior in elementary education.

The ages of the children who come to the program range from 3 to 10, she said, so one of the most important aspects is to have a book with good pictures.

Alicia Brende, junior in elementary education, was the first out of four readers designated to read last Saturday.

As she sat on a chair in front of an attentive group, she held the front cover of the book for the children to see.

"Do any of you know the story of Hansel and Gretel? Let's see what happens to them," she said.

And the adventure began.

As Brende read, the children could not keep their eyes off the pictures in the pages; they attentively followed the story. They all looked at Brende as she created voices for different characters.

Once the first story was over, the other readers took their turns, each one opening a new world of adventures and suspense.

"I like Hansel and Gretel the best because it had nice pictures," said 7-year-old Brittany Necky from Manhattan.

"I like coming here, because it helps me learn new things, and it's fun," said 7-year-old Jason Slack.

Jason's mom, Mary Slack, said they have been to other places that have similar programs, but they were excited to find out that another bookstore in town was doing it.

The students said they were pleased with the results.

"I thought the kids were really good, considering some of the are really young. They paid a lot of attention," Dedonder said.

ECONOMY

Professors call for overall trade balance

Equal exports, imports needed to be competitive

BECKY DARBY
Collegian

An economics professor says the United States doesn't need to have a trade balance with Japan to compete with Japanese products.

A trade balance with any one country isn't necessary, said Patrick Gormely, associate professor of economics.

He said the United States may run a trade deficit with Japan or any other country, but the United States is also running trade surpluses with countries such as the United Kingdom and the Netherlands.

Gormely said the United States needs to have an overall trade balance, rather than try to have a trade balance with any one country.

"What is needed is an appropriate balance of our total exports and imports," Gormely said.

Ali Fatemi, professor of finance, said saying the United States needs to have a trade balance with Japan "is like saying that Kansas should have a trade balance with every other state in the union. It's not necessary."

He said there should be an overall trade balance, but there doesn't have to be one with any particular country.

Japanese products offer a challenge to the American workers, Fatemi said.

"The challenge Japan provides has benefited us immensely," he said.

He said American products are built better because the products have to compete with Japanese products.

Japanese products are also a better quality because that quality is what the American consumer wants to buy, Fatemi said.

Consumers who buy Japanese products don't consider Japan to be an economic threat to the United States, Gormely said, and the producers of products such as aircraft and agricultural products don't consider Japan a threat.

"If Japan's imports of U.S. products are artificially limited by Japanese policies, those policies hurt Japanese consumers and U.S. producers, and the policies ought to be changed," he said.

Fatemi said people have to look at Japan's actions rather than its words when they call American workers lazy. He said the name-calling is more political propaganda than truth.

"Japan buys our medical supplies and our aircraft, so it indicates that they have a lot of confidence in our products," Fatemi said.

The Japanese may work more hours a week than Americans, Gormely said, but the evidence is that output per hour of work in the United States is generally higher than in Japan.

"There is more to economic well-being than work hours and the stuff that can be purchased with our earnings," he said.

Candidates optimistic on primary's eve

Democrat Tsongas leads New Hampshire polls, defying predictions

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CONCORD, N.H. — With a mix of pro-business economics and liberal social positions, former Massachusetts Sen. Paul Tsongas defies many of the traditional labels of the party he is trying to change — and lead.

Heading into Tuesday's New Hampshire primary vote, Tsongas also was defying predictions, polling ahead of rivals and confounding experts who believed he would be dubbed a regional candidate and shunned by voters looking for a winner.

Beating the odds is nothing new for Tsongas, who was written off in the elections he won to enter the House in 1974 and Senate in 1978, and who said he believed he was headed to death when diagnosed with cancer nearly a decade ago.

But should he win the New Hampshire primary, Tsongas would face longer odds than he has ever faced in a political race.

He has less money than most rivals, is hardly known outside New England and, albeit unfairly, would have to deal with sour memories many Democrats carry from the 1988 campaign of fellow Greek-American and Massachusetts liberal Michael Dukakis.

Tsongas shrugs off the obstacles with the dry humor the country will get a glimpse at if he holds his New Hampshire lead.

"I wish sometimes I was Swedish," he said.

How will he overcome them?

"People want the truth, and I am giving it to them."

Tsongas drew a large crowd Monday for his final rally of the New Hampshire campaign, and he all but predicted victory.

"Can't you feel it? It's really going to happen. The road we will all share tomorrow is historic," he said.

Tsongas spoke as aides indicated he was stepping up his efforts in South Dakota, which has its primary Feb. 25.

He has rearranged his schedule to make a trip to the state Thursday for an address to the legislature, an aide said, before returning Sunday for a candidates' debate.

To Tsongas, the son of a dry cleaner and a father of three who turned 51 Friday, the truth is that the United States is sliding economically because it has forfeited its manufacturing base in favor of a service-oriented economy.

"Manufacturing is the engine," he tells audience after audience, recalling the depression that followed the exodus of textile jobs from his native Lowell, Mass., and the boom that came when high-technology firms moved into long-abandoned mills.

In New Hampshire, Tsongas's economic views have helped him attract moderates and independents, while liberals like him because of his longstanding support of women's and gay rights.

His Senate leadership in the areas of solar power and conservation have won him environmental backing, despite his support of nuclear power.

However, he is lacking is any deep backing outside New England.

Should he win New Hampshire, Tsongas would become the favorite in Maine, Massachusetts and Rhode Island.

He then would need at least one win and competitive showings in Maryland, South Dakota, Colorado and Washington state before the primary calendar is dominated by the South on March 10.

Maryland is the prime target in this group, and on Tsongas's schedule the day after New Hampshire.

His delivery may be dour, but Tsongas predicts his economic message will resonate across regional lines.

"The people who say this is just a regional issue haven't traveled this country," he said.

"So, we are looking forward to taking it beyond New Hampshire into the rest of the nation."

His recent surge has triggered a modest boost in fundraising, and Tsongas had to take time out from campaigning this week to strengthen his modest organization.

Even if he carries momentum through the post-New Hampshire phase, many believe Tsongas still would face formidable obstacles in the South, where his liberal social stances and his Northeast roots are working against him.

Dukakis escaped the Southern primaries by winning the big prizes of Florida and Texas, states in which he had huge staffs and millions to spend.

"He's way behind in terms of money and organization," said Merle Black, Emory University political scientist, of Tsongas's prospects in the South.

Republican Buchanan claims momentum, in no-lose position, aides say

ASSOCIATED PRESS

EXETER, N.H. — Republican challenger Patrick Buchanan, wrapping up a high-energy 10-week campaign, on Monday claimed "tremendous momentum."

Aides said this momentum puts him in a virtual no-lose position for the nation's leadoff primary.

Buchanan has been finding enthusiastic crowds everywhere he goes in recent days.

And, unless the bottom falls out of his support, Tuesday's New Hampshire primary will propel his upstart challenge into next month's raft of Southern primaries.

For Buchanan, mustering anywhere from 25 percent to more than 40 percent of the vote against President Bush on Tuesday — which both the Bush and Buchanan camps now say is likely — would enable the conservative commentator to claim a symbolic victory.

Bush, hoping to head off the challenge from his right, got in a final round of long-distance campaigning Monday, phoning New Hampshire radio stations from the White House while first lady Barbara Bush stumped the state in person.

"The reason the president isn't in New Hampshire today is he has to work for a living," Barbara Bush told a neighborhood group in Concord.

At Concord Airport, several dozen supporters chanted, "We love Barbara. We love Barbara."

She put a finger to her lips to quiet the crowd, then started them in a new chant.

"We love George. We love George."

Several supporters shouted, "Barbara Bush in '96."

It was no coincidence that one of Buchanan's final stops Tuesday on a 14-town bus tour was Town Hall in Exeter, where Bush spoke in January.

On that visit, Bush told a skeptical crowd that he understood New Hampshire's economic distress.

He said he cared and would do something about it.

There was little skepticism evident on Monday as about 40 enthusiastic Buchanan supporters waved signs, cheered and hooted.

Buchanan said the warm reception, similar to that he has encountered at other stops, is a real sign that the campaign has tremendous momentum.

"The second sign is the fellow who was up here yesterday and left town a little disheartened — Mr. Bush."

Bush aides suggested during the president's weekend campaign trip that they expected Buchanan to get as much to 40 percent of the vote Tuesday.

White House political director Ronald Kaufman conceded Buchanan with at least 30 percent.

"We're very confident we'll get at least in the high 20s. If we break 30 percent, we'll be delighted and if we get 40 percent we'll be ecstatic," said Paul Erikson, a top Buchanan aide.

While no one really expects Buchanan to win in New Hampshire with that kind of a point spread, he probably would have little difficulty claiming success.

Minnesota Sen. Eugene McCarthy, a peace candidate, mustered a surprising 42 percent of the vote against incumbent President Lyndon Johnson in 1968, who got 49.6 percent.

This was one of the things that drove Johnson out of the race.

Buchanan, in the past, has held out McCarthy's 42 percent as a target.

McCarthy, campaigning himself in New Hampshire as a Democratic presidential candidate, on Monday said it wouldn't surprise him if Buchanan got 42 percent of the vote or more.

But McCarthy said he didn't think a big win for Buchanan in New Hampshire would make any difference.

"He's not going to beat Bush. All he can do is bruise him," McCarthy said.

Bush, meanwhile, was back at the White House Monday giving interviews to several New Hampshire radio stations and planning interviews by satellite with TV stations in Manchester, Boston and Portland, Maine.

Asked by Manchester radio station WFEA if his message had gotten through during his weekend trip, Bush said, "I guess I'll know tomorrow.

"I've been under fire by the Democrats. ... Apparently every single one of them was attacking me all day, so does the other guy.

"I don't know how to sort it out," Bush said.

"I am content that people in the final analysis will say, 'Look, we're not looking for a slogan. We're not looking for a quick political fix. We are looking for somebody to lead this country for four more years.'"

State busy on eve of primary

Presidential hopefuls canvass New Hampshire in last-minute efforts

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MANCHESTER, N.H. — Democratic presidential rivals roamed southern New Hampshire on Monday in a holiday hunt for votes, while President Bush phoned in a White House defense against his conservative challenger.

The political traffic was heavy on the eve of Tuesday's New Hampshire presidential primary election, the first balloting of 1992.

By bus, van and rented car, the candidates, their aides and throngs of reporters cruised town to town.

Their volunteers, many of them college students in a Presidents Day holiday mood, waved signs on downtown street corners, handed out leaflets, worked the telephones and rang doorbells.

At one point, while Bush was being interviewed by telephone on radio station WFEA in Manchester, Patrick Buchanan, his GOP challenger, was waiting on hold.

The polls begin opening at 6 a.m. Tuesday, although the north country hamlet of Dixville Notch was registering its handful just after midnight.

The pollsters rated Paul Tsongas, the former senator from Massachusetts, the late leader in the five-man Democratic field, with Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton running second.

While Bush was getting in his last campaign words by long-distance telephone, and with satellite TV interviews, his wife, Barbara, campaigned in Concord and Manchester.

Bush was asked on live evening interview with Boston station WHDH-TV if he had ever considered the possibility of a one-term presidency.

"It never has entered my mind," Bush said. "I'm not taking anything for granted, ... and I believe I'll be elected again."

On another station, WMUR in New Hampshire, Bush advised voters, "Don't worry about trying to send some message, and let's put the person in that has the proven leadership."

Bush had a hefty lead in GOP polling.

Both sides said he'd win, but Buchanan sought to come close enough to send the White House and the party a message of conservative rebellion — and to keep his challenge going in the South.

"I'd love to win," Democrat Tsongas said. But the frontrunner's lot can be worrisome.

"Look at the expectations," Tsongas said in Exeter. "The fact is that two weeks ago, it was first, second or a close third.

"Now I'm in a situation where I'm having to explain whether I have to win."

In Portsmouth, he urged voters to send Democrats a demand for change.

"I'm going to force the Democratic Party to once and for all take all that useless rhetoric, cast it aside ..., and let's have a partnership of labor and management and government so the average person in this country can have a job, provide for their family and look to a future that's viable," he said.

Clinton staged a dozen stops in his final sprint of a race in which he's been rated the leader before the controversies over a woman's claims of an illicit affair with him and his Vietnam-era draft status.

"The president has finished his mission," Clinton said.

"He is yesterday's man. He offers us no real hope and vision for the future."

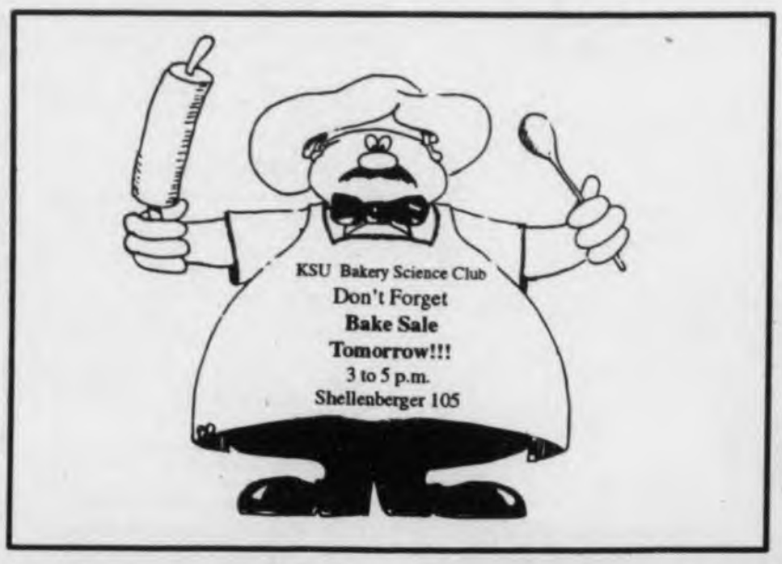
Sen. Bob Kerrey of Nebraska said he expects to do well because New Hampshire voters are beginning to realize he's not a single-issue candidate, despite his emphasis on national health insurance.

"National health insurance for me is a beginning, a beginning of fundamental change in the United States," he told a health-care forum in Concord.

He and Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa were ranked well behind Tsongas and Clinton in the polls.

The loser between them may have trouble raising the funds and gaining the backing to go on into the most costly campaign states to come.

"We are ready to go national better than any other candidate," Harkin told campaign workers at his Concord headquarters.



At the Allenstown town hall, he said he's the Democrat who would break with current economic policy, not just fine tune it.

"We won't wait for any tax breaks for the rich to trickle down," he said.

Harkin has been slapping at the other Democrats in campaign speeches and commercials, and Kerrey said that may hurt the Iowan.
